Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the honorable member either to debate the matter before the Chair or to discontinue his speech. He is distinctly out of order, and his attention has twice been called to that fact.

Mr. POYNTON.—Do I understand you to rule, sir, that it is out of order to use the words "hypocrisy" and "cant" in dealing with the matter under consideration?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member will recognise that the question is not as to any word that he may use, but whether he is dealing with the subject-matter of the motion, to which I have twice called his attention. He must debate the question as to the recommittal of clause 48, and that only. Any other matter is inadmissible.

Mr. POYNTON.—Do you rule, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot discuss the attitude honorable members who are opposed to the committal of the clause—

KER.—The honorable member has said clause 48, and nothing else.

TON.—In dealing with that clause, I am referring incidentally to the case of those who do not desire that it be committed. I wish to deal with the reasons which have been advanced in an attempt to defeat the Government proposal. If there is one thing more than another, it is honest fighting. I object to the methods, and exceedingly regret that those who desire to gain possession of the Treasury benches have not taken the more manly course. These unwise measures have been adopted in order that the Opposition may secure an additional vote through the question being put to the House instead of in Committee. An attempt has also been made to divide the Government pair. I refer to the right honorable member for the County of Devon, an honorable member who is a member of the Ministry.

KER.—I am sure that the right honorable member's parliamentary experience will convince him that he must confine his remarks to the clause under consideration, and not to a discussion of the conduct of the honorable members, whether it be wise or otherwise, is out of order. The right honorable member can deal only with the reasons for and against the committal. I am reluctant to say so often, but he must obey the Orders.

TON.—I regret, sir, that you will not be able to give the reasons—

WILLIS.—The honorable member may discuss the clause.

TON.—It is hardly likely that I shall be able to accept my instructions from the members of the Opposition. I know that the Opposition are not in a position to give a vote.

KER.—That is not before the House.

TON.—I am not making any statement.

I am not prepared to repeat what I was told of the incident which took place at the entrance to the Chamber. I have heard that the trades unionists should be treated in the way in which the members of the Opposition are told by the Opposition. I sympathize with trades unionists, but I think that sympathy is always wanting when a proposal is made to give them some practical support. At one time in the Parliaments of the States, one heard nothing but the cry of "property, property, property." That was the "gag," that was commonly used when efforts were made to extend the franchise to those who were termed "the lower classes." We are told to-day that we are seeking to interfere with the liberty of the subject. That is an old cry. It was raised when Lord Shaftesbury first took steps to improve the conditions of pauper children who were being worked in the factories of England to such an extent that many of them became cripples. It was then asserted that if the existing factory system were interfered with, commerce would be ruined; and we are told again to-day that if we grant preference to unionists we shall interfere with the liberty of the subject, and damage commercial interests. Some honorable members have no regard for anything but commerce. What have trades organizations done that they should be treated as the Opposition propose? Why should they be penalized? Have they not been in the forefront of every reform? Have they not had the courage to take up questions with which weak-kneed politicians were afraid to deal, and to boldly fight for reform? In England, America, and Australia, and indeed in all parts of the civilized world, we find members of trades unions bearing the brunt of the fight for reform.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—There is no compulsory arbitration in the United States of America.

Mr. POYNTON.—That might have been said a few years ago of New Zealand. Trades unionists were at the bottom of the agitation for the non-employment of women and children in the mines of England, and they were behind the great movement against the employment of children for unduly long hours in the factories of England. In every country they have fought for the improvement of the working conditions of the people. Have not many of them suffered for their efforts? Some honorable members would have us return to the days when certain miners in England were transported to Australia because they stood up for the interests of their associations. History tells us of case after case in which trades unionists sacrificed their liberty, suffered exile, and in some cases lost their lives in their efforts to secure the advancement of mankind. They have fought not only for themselves, not only for the workers with whom they have been immediately associated, but for the industrial classes generally. Yet some honorable members speak of trades unionists as if they were criminals. They have no consideration for any one but non-unionists.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Have not non-unionists a right to be considered?

Mr. POYNTON.—Have trades unionists never done anything for non-unionists? Has not every reform which they have secured—the better ventilation of mines, the improvement in the sanitary conditions of factories, and a thousand and one other things—benefited non-unionists as well as unionists?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—We agree that they have done good work.

Mr. POYNTON.—Some honorable members speak as if the Government desired to subject non-unionists to an injustice.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—No. Have we not made trades unionists Ministers of the Crown?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member did not give much assistance in that direction.

Mr. POYNTON.—In the fact that some of the members of the Ministry are trades unionists is to be found the root of the trouble. In the early stages of the present political unrest, the Government was referred to as a trades union Ministry. That is the only fault that can be found with them. It is because the present Administration comprises trades unionists that the Opposition are prepared to sacrifice not only them but trades unionists generally. They desire to make the Bill so useless that it will be a reproach to the Ministry.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Was the Bill designed in the interests of unionists, or of labour?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—In the interests of the public.

Mr. POYNTON.—The Conciliation and Arbitration Bill was designed in the interests of organizations. Can any honorable member point to an organization of non-unionists? That is why in New Zealand, in scores of cases, when other things have been equal, preference has been given to unionists. The New Zealand Court has recognised that the whole basis of this kind of legislation is the recognition of organizations.

Mr. JOHNSON.—According to the honorable member's showing, there is no need for the clause at all.

Mr. POYNTON.—I have not said though that may be the opinion of honorable member. I think that if clause is not inserted, great numbers of men will have black marks placed against their names. I have known men to be black-marked for miles and miles around. Employers may not have gone to the length of sending their photographs ahead of whom they deemed objectionable, but they have taken every other precaution to prevent them from getting employment. It is less the giving of preference is provided for, that state of things would exist under this measure. The honorable member himself knows that what I have described is done. The honorable member Mr. Dalley has repeatedly admitted that it is done, and the honorable member for Parramatta knows that men have been black-marked throughout a whole district, because they had been chosen as delegates to ask for some concession, not for unionists alone, but for non-unionists as well. I ask honorable members why they not make an example of these trades unionists? What have they done for society that they deserve consideration? Honorable members appear to prefer to go back to the old methods. Why are they not honest? Why do they not say that they do not wish to have an Arbitration Bill, and prefer to allow disputes to be settled by strikes? Let us make that issue. Although they profess to desire arbitration, they are not ready to assist the Government in passing a workable measure. Has any one of them been behind the scenes during a strike, and known the hardship, suffering, and loss which such occurrences bring in their train? Yet they wish to pass into law a measure under which, as it stands, not one organization in Australia would register. One Ministry has been placed in difficulties, and another has been sacrificed already, in connection with this Bill, and the better part of the sessions has been spent in discussing it. The last five months have been occupied in the miserable pretence of doing something in the public interest, but the real desire of honorable members opposite is to secure possession of the Treasury bench. They are ready to neglect the interests of industrial organizations, and to forego the opportunity to secure industrial peace.

in possession of the Treasury do not care who occupies those dy.—Then why all this

TON.—Have we not a right we think that an important d be amended? It is astont a small pretence some per-from grace. The honorable surprised me. I remember he would not have treated lightly. No one knows bet-the need for establishing for the settlement of indus-He has been in the thick bles. He is not like honor-who have had no experience.
his duty, as it is the duty House, to try to place upon ok a workable measure to al peace—not a mere rotten, ce such as this is.

dy.—I am not going to assist coerce a majority.

TON.—The honorable mem-a Ministry which, during its e, was in a minority.

dy.—That Ministry retired when the fact was proved.

TON.—I admit that they re-nity; but the members of the nment did nothing unworthy possession of the Treasury eed, they tried to avoid tak-n attempt has been made to present position is similar to sulted when the Deakin Go-defeated; but on that occano underground engineering.
ent were twitted a short time ng tried to persuade men to otes on this subject, and yet orable member for East Sydthe charge, had sitting alongonorable member who intends vote, and who was no doubt do so by his leader. It will to this Parliament if it places book an unworkable measure.
dy.—But the Government are the insertion of a provision of ority has approved.

NTON.—We object to the h are being adopted. There an opportunity to consider in e advisability of amending the ost any amendment would make the provision better than it is now.

Honorable members are not prepared, however, to give an opportunity for reconsideration. They will not allow even a comma to be added to or taken from the clause. They have got their numbers.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Ministry have, ever since they took office, been asking us to take action against them.

Mr. POYNTON.—The two leaders of the Opposition have, day after day, and week after week, threatened the Ministry with no-confidence motions.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—They were always to be moved next week.

Mr. POYNTON.—Yes. Now, however, they are trying to defeat the Government by a miserable subterfuge. They have not had the courage to fight them on a straight-out issue.

Mr. TUDOR.—Neither of the leaders of the Opposition has yet spoken on this question.

Mr. POYNTON.—No. They are not game to take the risk of challenging the Government. Therefore they have put up a novice like the honorable and learned member for Corinella. The Age says that the amendment was fixed up at an interview between the honorable and learned member and the two leaders of the Opposition; but they were ashamed to be present yesterday when he was moving it.

Mr. WEBSTER.—As well they might be.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Was not the motion moved by the honorable member for Gwydir this afternoon fixed up after consultation with the Government?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It was not a motion to gag honorable members.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Did the Ministry not mean their statement that they would retire if defeated on this clause?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Yes.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Then why do they complain?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We complain of the methods by which it is sought to defeat us.

Mr. POYNTON.—If we go to the country we shall be asked, "What is all this fuss about? Why are certain honorable members so anxious to get on to the Treasury benches? In what way does their policy differ from that of the Labour Party?" The Age, on the 18th May, published the two policies side by side, to show their striking similarity. The Government are not being criticised for either their policy or their administration. What reason have the Opposition for their attitude other than the desire to obtain possession of the Treasury benches?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member expects other honorable members to reverse their votes in order to save the Ministry.

Mr. POYNTON.—What about the honorable member for Dalley? We desire an opportunity for reconsideration and second thought on a very important provision.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Have not any of the honorable members who intend to vote for the Government changed their views?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Yes; two or three.

Mr. POYNTON.—There is always some change on occasions of this kind. No man is so perfect that he has never reason to change his mind. Does the honorable member for Macquarie dare to say that he never changed his mind, or tried to get other honorable members to do so, when he was a Minister?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—But the honorable member complains that the honorable member for Dalley has changed his mind.

Mr. POYNTON.—I regret the fact.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—We have a right, therefore, to ask, what about those on the Government side who have changed their mind?

Mr. POYNTON.—It was the right honorable member for East Sydney who complained in effect of the bad taste of the Government in trying to secure the recommendation of the clause, in order to get members who had voted in a certain direction to change their votes. There is nothing disgraceful about that, nothing more than has been done on a number of occasions.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The honorable member would not consent to a recommendation of the salt duty.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member knows the reason. An honorable agreement had been entered into for the imposition of a 12s. 6d. duty; instead of either a 15s. or a 10s. duty.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the honorable member not to enter into a discussion upon that point.

Mr. POYNTON.—Those honorable members who vote against the Government on this question will have a very hard row to hoe. The people of Australia have demanded a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, and honorable members are pledged to give them one. Such a measure must be passed, whether it be by a Reid Government, a Reid-Deakin-McCay Ministry or a Watson Administration, and until it is done there will be no rest for this Parliament. I complain of the attitude taken up by honorable members, not only in this case, but on previous occasions. They are now absolutely refusing to afford honorable members an opportunity to discuss the Bill in Committee, and ascertain if it can be made workable. This conduct is comparable with the tactics which have been used by some honorable members ever since they have been here. I would ask how many times the right honorable member for Sydney has voted in favour of the Bill which was introduced by the Ministry of which he was a member; also, how many times he has had the support of the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, or of the honorable member for Denison.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—A number of clauses had been passed without division.

Mr. POYNTON.—The attitude assumed by some members of the late Ministry has introduced a new feature into political life. They have made it appear that a man's convictions will depend upon the side of the House on which he sits. The position which some honorable members occupy is a contemptible one, and is entirely new in my experience. In other Parliaments, honorable members have always had the courage and manliness to give their support to the measures to which they have committed themselves. Are we to assume that the measure has become objectionable merely because it is being handled by the Labour Administration? We have been told that it is desirable, in the interests of some persons, that there should be a change of Ministry. It has been pointed out that if a new Ministry came into power, there would be no necessity to introduce a measure to amend the Immigration Restriction Bill, because all that was desired could be effected by a change in the administration.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is proceeding beyond the scope of his motion.

Mr. POYNTON.—I am endeavouring to indicate the nature of the tactics adopted by honorable members towards the present Government. No Ministry has ever received such wretched treatment. A month ago I expressed the opinion, which has since become a conviction, that the Bill as it stands is unworkable. I should have been prepared to accept it in a modified form as a basis upon which we could work.

passed in its present shape the work will be rendered nugatory. Not one organization will support it.

MR. JOHNSON (Lang).—So far as I am concerned, I am thoroughly in favour of the action taken by the hon. member for Corinella. The present opportunity should be taken by honorable members to express their opinions, and to deal with this in a manner that will insure a permanent unnecessary waste of money. I see no practical difference between the Government proposal and the amendment in the Bill. The omission of the word "substantial" from the amendment proposed by the Government would put it on the same footing as the proposal for the retention of that word. The vagueness of expression has been expressed by other members with other portions of the Bill. All along objected to the proposal to give preference to unionists, and the delegation of the fundamental rights of citizenship and equal opportunities. Unfortunately, the amendment to which I proposed, was lost, and I regretted the amendment proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corinella because it appeared to me to be the right thing to do. I am unwilling to support the present provision, but if it is recommitted, I should certainly support an amendment upon the lines of which I previously proposed. The provisions of the Bill are really against the interests of the community in the light of the principle of majority rule. That is a delicate position for them to take, and it will be exceedingly difficult for them to defend it. Honorable members sit behind the Government and speak with one voice. The party of the proposed party, which has one member non-unionist, and another for the unionists, are for use to catch the votes of the unionists, the other to dish the votes whose votes have largely put the party into Parliament. The hon. member for Hindmarsh defended the preference on the ground that it was as well as the members of the union. It must be obvious that preference is to be given to one party and another, equal benefits cannot be conferred upon both. The honorable member for Darling contended that only unionists had any right to derive benefit. Here we have two diametrically opposite statements coming from two members of the same party. The honorable member for Darling contended that the benefits of the preference provision should be restricted to unionists, because they, and they alone, had been responsible for bringing about the adoption of this class of legislation. The honorable member has, at other times, told us that the party to which he belongs does not advocate the interest of any particular section, but of the whole of the workers of the Commonwealth. Apparently, he is now prepared to ignore the rights of workers who are outside the unions, because he says that, from the point of view of the advocates of the Bill, they are not entitled to any benefits. Those honorable members who are opposing the recommittal of clause 48, take the view that all citizens have equal rights in the eye of the law. We are advocating equal rights of citizenship. That is a position which I regard as absolutely unassailable. I wish to direct attention to a case, which came under my notice no later than last Monday, which indicates the disastrous effects of this class of legislation upon a great number of those persons who are outside the trades unions. The statement which I am about to read, and which was taken down in writing by me, was made by a man who called at my house last Monday morning, and asked me, "for God's sake," to try to do something for him.

MR. CROUCH.—Was he a trades unionist?

MR. JOHNSON.—He had been, but had fallen into arrears through illness and lack of employment. He is an educated man, and has been well brought up, and he feels his position very keenly. He said—

I was at one time a member of the Wharf Labourers' Union, but through illness and loss of employment, was unable to keep paying into the union; and I got work from time to time at other occupations. For months past now, however, I have been unable to get work, because I am not a unionist, and cannot afford to pay the fees to become one. My wife, therefore, has had to go to work, while I have minded the house and the children, much to my own sense of humiliation. However, my wife took ill, and after a period of semi-starvation, I at last obtained, through the Peninsula and Oriental Steam Navigation Company's wharfinger, a job on the wharves as a labourer, after the usual hands had been taken on. I had not been at work very long —about one hour—when the union officer demanded to see my ticket. I, of course, had none, and explained matters. I offered to rejoin the union if they would accept my signed order on my wages, countersigned by the wharfinger, for the entrance fee and a month's subscription, as I was starving, and had no money. This was refused, and I had to knock off, and after having walked five miles to my job, had to trudge five miles home to my sick wife and starving family.

Mr. FRAZER.—What is his name?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I will not divulge his name, but would not give the statement to the House unless I was fully convinced of the substantial accuracy of these statements, because they were made to me by a man whom I have known for years.

Mr. FRAZER.—Is the honorable member aware of the fact that a union does not collect subscriptions from its members when they are out of employment?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I doubt if the honorable member can speak for every union in Australia. That is the statement which was made to me, and I have every reason to believe that it is true.

Mr. FRAZER.—When a unionist is out of employment, he is not called upon to pay his subscriptions.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I cite that instance to show that the effect of legislation of this character is to create a close corporation of labour unions, and to displace from employment a large number of men whose only crime is that they are not attached to these organizations. The idea that unionists only should participate in the benefits conferred by such legislation is a most selfish and narrow one. What would be thought of the missionaries to the heathen if they invoked salvation only on behalf of the members of their own denominations? What would be said if they urged that only their own particular sects should receive the benefits of the work which they professedly performed in the interests of humanity at large? That is exactly the position which the honorable member for Darling is taking up to-day. Because trades unions have been pioneers of the movement for the up-lifting of the workers, he wishes the members of those organizations to secure all the advantages which may result from improved conditions, to the exclusion of that large class in whose interests honorable members opposite are accustomed to declare upon the hustings they have been unselfishly working. I have no desire to prolong the discussion of this question, which was fully debated when the clause was considered in Committee. I merely wished to draw attention to a case of hardship which had come within my personal knowledge, and which had resulted from legislation of this character, which seeks to create special privileges for some workers, and to impose great disabilities upon the majority. Whatever legislation may be passed, it should be the duty of honorable members to see that it is based upon equality of opportunity for all, just to all, and special privileges to none.

Mr. FRAZER (Kalgoorlie).—I may preface my remarks by an expression of regret that the field of this discussion is so limited. In the past, it has been used to extend to Governments, whose rights remain upon the Treasury benches has been challenged, the privilege of defending the policy upon a motion which enabled the whole of that policy to be debated. I do not compliment the Opposition upon the way in which they have endeavoured to "gag" honorable members—

Mr. REID.—I rise to a point of order. I desire to know whether a reference to the "gagging" of honorable members is relevant to a question of this sort?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The statement is strictly relevant, but if the right honorable member objects to it, I must ask the honorable member to withdraw it.

Mr. REID.—I do object to it earnestly.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Then I must ask the honorable member for Kalgoorlie to withdraw it.

Mr. FRAZER.—Certainly. The right honorable member for East Sydney does not relish heavy criticism. No doubt he finds himself in such an awkward position that he realizes it would be inadvisable to allow honorable members too wide a field for discussion, lest they should be in a position to fire too many effective shots. At this stage I think I am justified in referring to the circumstances which have led up to the present Government's assumption of office. It will be recollected that when this Parliament assembled, it was for the purpose of that a majority of its members were in favour of extending the provisions of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill to public servants of the States and of the Commonwealth. The Government of the day refused to give effect to the wishes of that majority.

KER.—I must ask the honorable member to confine his remarks to a discussion of the 48.

KER.—I was just about to vote upon the proposal to bring amendments within the scope of this Bill in the position in which the Government find themselves to-day.

KER.—If the honorable member is satisfied, he will be in order.

KER.—With the assistance of the Government wreckers, the present Labour Government will be into power.

HONORABLE MEMBER.—What are the grounds?

KER.—In that term I include honorable members who are prepared to give any opportunity which presents itself out of a Ministry to which they are opposed. The present Government went into office upon the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, they announced that they would proceed with that measure, and if necessary, they would relinquish it. Thereupon, assurances were given by the right honorable member for East Sydney and the honorable member for Ballarat that fair play would be accorded to them.

KER.—I rise to a point of order. I do not know whether this question as to the fate of the Ministry, is open for discussion at the present time?

KER.—Certainly it is not. I do not intend to draw the attention of the honorable member to the fact just now, and I do not intend to connect his remarks with the Government before the Chair.

KER.—I trust that I shall not be misunderstood from the matter which is under consideration. I desire to show that the Government are not the Government which the Government are the reverse of creditable to the members opposite. The Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, in the form in which it was introduced by the Deakin Government, provided that, other things being equal, a preference should be given to the unionists. Upon its advent to the present Ministry accepted that it was a reasonable one. But what has happened since? The members of the Government have absolutely deserted the Bill.

KER.—Some of them.

KER.—With the exception of the honorable member for Hume, they have forsaken their own measure.

KER.—The honorable member has deserted some of its principles.

Mr. FRAZER.—The honorable member for Hume has always been prepared to adhere to the provisions contained in the Bill as it was introduced by the Deakin Government. There has been a remarkable change of front on the part of members of the late Administration. When we find them playing fast and loose with the electors, I hold that it is our duty to show the public of Australia the attitude which is adopted by them. In my judgment, unionists are certainly deserving of some consideration at the hands of the Government in a measure of this description. We must recollect that if it had not been for their strenuous and self-sacrificing efforts, compulsory arbitration would have been impossible in Australia to-day. It is very easy for honorable members to declare their belief in that principle upon the hustings, because they know that the majority of their constituents uphold it. It is very significant, however, that in Parliament these very individuals are prepared to vote for proposals which render industrial peace absolutely impossible. So far no objection has been raised to unionists as such. Even the right honorable member for East Sydney has admitted that the trades unions comprise the very cream of the working men, and that, if he were a working man himself, he would be a unionist. Honorable members opposite admit that these organizations have rendered invaluable service to their fellows, and yet what do they offer them in return? Absolutely nothing. They say in effect, "By refusing the Court the power to grant you a preference award, we shall make you the victims of unscrupulous employers." When the Bill was under consideration, on a previous occasion, the honorable member for Maranoa produced a black list, bearing the names of most of the pastoralists in the western districts of New South Wales and Queensland. On its title page was the following statement:—

REGISTER OF SHEARERS WHO SHORE FOR THE MEMBERS DURING THE YEAR 1895.

This register has been compiled at the office of this association for the information of members only, and in accordance with counsel's opinion taken as to its legality.

This register must be kept strictly private and confidential.

N. J. WESTERGAARD NEILSEN, Secretary.

The object of this register may be briefly explained. If any man who shored in those districts was prepared to stand out for reasonable conditions, or dared at any time to dispute the will of the boss of the board, he was described in this register as "a good shearer, but strong unionist." In other words, such men were black-listed. On leaving a shed, a unionist shearer might receive a reference setting forth that he was an excellent shearer, and could "do a good tally," but in the private list circulated among the different station managers the statement would appear opposite his name that he was a strong unionist, and therefore an undesirable character. It is necessary that we should provide for preference to unionists, in order to guard against such tactics. In Western Australia, certain men who brought a dispute before the Arbitration Court, and obtained a settlement by peaceful means, found, on returning to places at which they had been employed for a number of years, that it had suddenly been discovered that they were not competent, or that some other reason was forthcoming for the refusal to further employ them. They were dealt with in this way, merely because they had taken part in the effort to secure an award of the Court granting reasonable conditions to those engaged in the industry. These cases illustrate the object which we have in view in urging that the Court should have power to grant preference to unionists. Without a preference clause the Bill would be useless. If we thought that unionists would even be placed on an equal footing with non-unionists we should not be found fighting so strongly for preference, but it is because we know that without a reasonable provision for preference unionists have been and will be victimised that we deem it necessary to fight so strongly against the clause as it stands. It has been asserted during the course of this debate that the policy of the unions is to starve the non-unionist. I deny that that is so. Every precaution has been taken to safeguard the interests of workers, whether they be unionists or non-unionists. The Bill already provides that a man shall not be refused the right to join a union. That provision was insisted upon, and was rightly inserted. In providing for preference to unionists, we shall assist in the building up and maintenance of those organizations which are absolutely necessary in order that the Bill may be a workable one. It is admitted on all sides of the House that without organizations it is not likely that any satisfactory means of submitting disputes to the Court will be obtained. We hope that by granting preference to unionists, and holding out an inducement to men to join organizations, and to take an interest in this measure, we shall conserve the industrial peace of Australia. The cry which is so glibly uttered that unionists desire to deprive non-unionists of the means of obtaining a livelihood has no foundation in fact. The honorable member for Lang has referred to a poor unfortunate fellow, who alleges that he was compelled by stress of circumstances to leave the ranks of unionists, and that the unionists subsequently refused to allow him to work on the wharfs, although his wife and children were starving. That is a cowardly charge to make in this House, unless the name of the man be given. If the name were disclosed it would be possible for us to trace the story to its source, and to ascertain whether it was accurate or not. I have heard many complaints made by disappointed persons against unions and unionists, but on investigating them have invariably found that they could not be substantiated. The case to which the honorable member has referred may possibly come within the same category. The clause as it stands would make it absolutely impossible for the Court to grant preference to unionists. The experience which I have had in gauging the number of persons engaged in a particular industry convinces me that it would be impossible for an organization to obtain evidence showing that the majority of those affected by the award desired that preference be granted. It has already been explained by several honorable members who are associated with the great bush unions that the number of persons engaged in the shearing industry varies very considerably from time to time. In addition to that, we know that when men are scattered all over the country it is impossible to ascertain their opinions on a given question. A union might be able to ascertain the opinion of the workers when they were congregated in large centres, but it would be almost impossible to ascertain the opinion of every man connected with an industry carried on in scattered districts. Under the clause as it stands, it would be absolutely impossible for an organization to ascertain the views of a majority of those likely to be affected by an award. I have no hesitation in saying that the Government proposal is not one that I should like it to be.

Mr. Fraser.

Mr. WILKS.—The Prime Minister has said that it is substantially the same as it and learned member for Corinella.

MR. FRAZER.—If the Prime Minister's statement, I have reason to doubt. While I do not like the proposal, I feel that it is inferior to the amendment carried by the honorable and learned member for Corinella. I believe that it is a remarkable, while the clause, as it stands, did not; and, consequently, I do not accept that which is the approach to perfection that we are in from the Committee.

MR. KELLY.—Does the honorable member think that unionists would register their opposition?

MR. FRAZER.—I see nothing in the event of them from registering.

MR. KELLY.—But what about clause 62?

MR. FRAZER.—We are dealing with the clause and the honorable member has decided to vote in a way that prevents the reconsideration of clause 62. The clause adopted by the honorable member is certainly remarkable. He finds a variance with the old adage, "The loaf is better than no bread." The effect, "If I cannot secure the clause as originally introduced, I cannot obtain an undisputed clause for unionists—I shall accept the clause as it stands."

MR. KELLY.—I made that statement myself.

MR. FRAZER.—Whether that be so or not, the honorable member has certainly made a remarkable process of reasoning, and that his constituents will receive a reasonable explanation in regard to the clause.

MR. KELLY.—I shall not receive any explanation from the honorable member in regard to the clause.

MR. FRAZER.—If I were one of the members for Dalley, I should endeavour to get the honorable member to treat the clause as it stands and undoubtedly do so.

MR. KELLY.—Labour men have been so for years.

MR. FRAZER.—That is not a question that we can now discuss. The fate of the clause really hangs in the balance between honorable members opposite and those who do not think the motion should be discussed from that stand-point, but are hiding behind a most miserable excuse.

I am certainly surprised to find in the Australian national Parliament a number of honorable members who are prepared to introduce what, in my opinion, is an undoubted gag. I should have thought that honorable members would endeavour to secure the passing of any measure designed in the interests of the people who are looking to this Parliament to save them from so great a disaster as another maritime strike, or any other Inter-State industrial dispute. It appears to me that the Bill is to be thrust aside simply because certain honorable members are anxious to obtain possession of the Treasury benches. The fate of this Bill is nought to them as compared with the question whether the right honorable member for East Sydney is to be Prime Minister. This is a most unfortunate state of affairs, and when the people of Australia learn, as they will in the course of the next few days, of the reasons leading to the downfall of the present Administration, and of the sacrifice of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, they will entertain nought but feelings of disgust towards those who have brought about the present situation. I have little further to say. The clause as it stands does not meet with my approval, and I should have been better pleased had we been permitted to consider it in Committee once more. Had the course proposed by the Government been adopted, we should have been able to avail ourselves of the advice of honorable members on all sides of the House, and, possibly, some amendment might have been suggested and have received the approval of the majority of honorable members.

MR. KELLY.—And have saved the Government?

MR. FRAZER.—That seems to be a matter of great importance to the honorable member.

MR. KELLY.—The Prime Minister says that the Government proposal is practically the same as the honorable and learned member for Corinella's amendment.

MR. FRAZER.—I can assure the honorable member that the fate of a Government is not so important, to my mind, as is the placing of a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill on the Statute-Book of Australia.

MR. KELLY.—Hear, hear.

MR. FRAZER.—In view of their present attitude, I do not know why honorable members opposite should applaud that remark. The Bill is to be thrown aside and its ultimate fate to remain undecided for weeks. We do not know what the defeat of the Ministry may mean. There is always the possibility of a dissolution. I do not hold that out as a threat to any honorable member, but it is possible that within the next month or six weeks we may be engaged in contesting our constituencies, and in the interval there may be an Inter-State strike. If that happens, the responsibility will be at the doors of those whose action has caused us to be without the machinery to effectually settle such industrial disputes.

Mr. KELLY.—In any case, the Bill could not receive the Royal Assent for probably six weeks.

Mr. FRAZER.—The delay will be much longer if there is a general election. The Opposition are trying to defeat the Government on a false issue. The honorable and learned member for Corinella has fired the gun for the leaders of the party, who do not seem disposed to show themselves. I do not wish them success; but if the Ministry are defeated, I hope that there will be an appeal to the people.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—It is quite refreshing to hear the comments of Ministerial supporters upon the action of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, who is desirous of preventing a waste of time by the reconsideration of a question which has already been finally settled by a majority. For the past three months the Ministry and their supporters have, by means of press interviews and speeches from the public platforms, been inviting the Opposition to a trial of strength. They have taunted their opponents with continually deferring this trial. But now that they are actually put on their defence, it is they who cry, "Give us until to-morrow." A great deal has been said from the other side of the Chamber about the underground engineering, and the going back upon electoral pledges which has taken place on this side of the Chamber; but if honorable members refresh their memories by referring to Hansard, they will see that some of those who were once ardent supporters of the Deakin Administration, and are now sitting on this side of the House, have before this said clearly and distinctly that, when the opportunity offered, they would attempt to tone down several of the extreme proposals in the Bill. Reference has been made to the attitude of the members of the late Government in reference to this Bill. There are one or two of them against whom the charge of inconsistency cannot be made, but certainly the honorable member for Hume for whom the present Ministerial supporters claim such wonderful consistency, not one of them.

Mr. MALONEY.—He has been a protectionist all his life.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am dealing with the attitude of the members of the Government towards this Bill. The honorable member for Balaclava has been consistent all his political life, and I believe would have shown his consistency in this matter had he been able to attend sittings of the House. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat has also been notably consistent.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Inconsistent.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No; consistent.

the occasion when the honorable member for Hume refused to support the Bill, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat stood loyally by its provisions, and I think he has proved, even to the satisfaction of the Ministry, and their supporters, that he has been consistent throughout. What fault is it if the fate of the Government hangs on the question now before the House? Their present position is due to their own voluntary act. I have no cognisance of any attempts to form combinations on this side to secure a majority against the Government, nor do I think that the honorable and learned member for Corinella, who has moved the amendment which is said to place the life of the Government in jeopardy, acted after consultation with either of the leaders on this side.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member will admit that the original proviso was fully discussed.

Mr. KELLY.—It might have been discussed. It was printed and circulated day before it was moved.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Reference to Hansard will show that a number of honorable members referred to it before division was taken. In any case, the Government had control of the business, and are responsible if they allowed a division to be taken on a matter of vital importance before honorable members were thoroughly seized of the importance of the question. Moreover, why have they slept in regard to the matter for a month? Why have they not taken an earlier opportunity to try to convert a minority into a majority?

are they squealing now, like so red rats?

ONEY.—The honorable member is a unionist rat.

KENNEDY.—I take no exception to the statement emanating from such a source. I am responsible for my utterance. I am responsible for the election of the electors of Moira only, and the honorable member has any fault to find with them, let him, when the dissolution comes, oppose me at Moira.

ONEY.—The honorable member has a walk-over.

KENNEDY.—I have enjoyed that.

ONEY.—Not so often as I have.

KENNEDY.—I do not claim to be as good as the honorable member, but I possess his political virtues. All the Ministers and their enthusiastic supporters have been looking for trouble, and for a fight, they are now, after the underground engineering and mining, howling about the tactics of the Opposition, which is strictly parliamentary. Are we to believe that they did not see that the honorable and learned member for Corinella would stand in support of his provision? Was he not to allow another fortification of underground engineering to go on in its defence? Surely we have no more such guilelessness to honours than the Opposition. We have been in the Opposition since they obtained possession of the benches in an honorable way. I am not that. To some extent I admire the honorable member, which they have taken up. Although the numbers are against them, as though dynamite would blow their tentacles from the Treasury. Has any Ministry cried louder than they have done to be in the Opposition at the earliest opportunity.

DR.—We have not had an opportunity to discuss the position.

KENNEDY.—Honorable members have had a full and free opportunity to discuss the situation, and to put forward their stand-point.

DR.—Why do not some of the members of the Opposition speak? Why are they sitting up "squibs"?

KENNEDY.—I am not responsible for the actions of either the right honorable member for East Sydney or the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat has always taken direct courses, and those who stood loyally behind him have no reason to regret their allegiance to him. It has been suggested that if there is a dissolution, our seats will be in jeopardy, but that is a question for our constituents to determine. What is the use of honorable members saying, "We will send you to the country?" We have also been told that if we refuse to amend the clause so as to give absolute and complete preference to unionists, industrial warfare will spread over Australia. Why are these threats made when an important matter of this kind is being discussed? I was amongst those who, with the late Prime Minister, voted for the insertion of sub-clause b, to give preference to unionists. The only qualification I desired to see attached was the proviso that the unions should be wholly industrial organizations, and not political machines. So long as they were unions, whose funds were not to be used for purposes other than the purposes of the Bill, I was ready to give them a preference. I cannot be charged with being opposed to the granting of preferences.

Mr. TUDOR.—The members of the Opposition tried to undo what had been done in regard to the giving of preferences by adding a proviso.

Mr. KENNEDY.—We were told by the honorable member for Barrier that he would be ready to reject the Bill if unions were not given the right to act as political party machines. Under those circumstances I felt justified in the action I took, with a view to preventing the minority comprising a political party machine from dominating the majority under the provisions of a measure to secure industrial peace. That was why I supported the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. The members of the Ministry and their supporters accuse the honorable and learned member and those on this side of the House with having acted dishonorably; but has not the Prime Minister been continually telling the country during the last three months that he wishes for a trial of strength—simply that he wanted a test of strength? The opportunity which he has desired is now presented to him. Ministers took possession of the Treasury benches upon a question of policy in connexion with this Bill. Did any Ministers ever retire with more dignity—with one notable exception—than did the Deakin Government. The present Ministers took office in an honorable and straightforward way, and I regret to say that they are not continuing in that path, now that their existence is being threatened upon a matter of policy. Why should they complain? They must admit that the question on which they are being challenged is purely a matter of policy, and yet they appear to want more time for the purpose of playing to the gallery. A great deal of time has been wasted already by the honorable member for Gwydir in dealing with the whole range of politics of the last three or four years. The sole object was evidently to gain time.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member must not refer to another debate.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The threats which have been made by the honorable member for Gwydir cause a feeling of resentment on my part, not against honorable members opposite personally, but against the line of action which they are following in dealing with a question of policy affecting the whole industrial life of Australia. It is beyond question that an important principle is embodied in clause 48. I have nothing but admiration to express in regard to the action of the honorable and learned member for Corinella in bringing this matter to an issue in the way he has done. I have already stated that the Government have had practically a month in which to think over the situation, and, if possible, improve upon the proviso now in the Bill. What do we find? After a month's stewing over the situation, the Government now submit a proposal which is substantially the same as that embodied in the Bill. I venture to say that greater discretion would be vested in the Court under the present proviso than if the Government proposal were adopted.

Mr. CROUCH.—Under those circumstances, the honorable member ought to support the Government proposal.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable and learned member for Corio voted against any preference whatever. He voted to strike out the clause altogether.

Mr. KENNEDY.—What is the explanation of the honorable and learned member's sudden conversion? Is he afraid of a possible dissolution upon the removal of the present Government from the Treasury benches?

Mr. CROUCH.—I was returned as a protectionist, and I am concerned as to the fate of the Government.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am just reminded that, in the event of the House refusing to consent to the recommitment of clause 4, Free-trade Ministry may assume it, and in that connexion it would be pertinent for me to direct attention to fiscal views entertained by members of present Ministry. The honorable learned member for Corio has overlooked the divergent fiscal views of members of the present Ministry.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That has nothing to do with the matter under discussion.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I do not think so. I was simply replying to the remark of the honorable and learned member for Corio, and I do not propose to pursue the matter any further. I will direct the attention of honorable members to the question immediately before the House. The Prime Minister tells us that the amendment which he suggests is substantially the same as the proviso inserted at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. Those who say that it is impossible to ascertain what number of employes in any particular industry will constitute a majority, forget that we have statistics available, which are, for all practical purposes, absolutely reliable. We know that we can rely upon the figures given in the Statistical Register from time to time with regard to the number of miners engaged in coal mining, or in mining, or other branches of that industry, and that we can also arrive at a very good idea as to the number of hands engaged in the various factories in our cities. We can even ascertain approximately the number of bush workers.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—There are statistics showing the number of bush workers.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Take the case of shearers, by way of illustration. We can arrive at a fairly good idea as to the number of shearers engaged in the different States, and it is absurd to confuse the number of men actually engaged in that occupation with those who were shearing fifty or twenty years ago.

Mr. POYNTON.—It is not a question of those who were working fifteen years ago only, but of those who were working last year, and who may be shearing next year.

Mr. KENNEDY.—We were told by the Prime Minister that those who were shearing fifteen years ago were still shearing for the purposes of the Bill. If that was correct, I might be regarded as a shearer, because the honorable member for Grampians has promised, if necessity arises en in his shed. If the hon- intends to ship all his wool it may not be advisable for that opportunity. There is phraseology, but not in substance the Government proposal now in the Bill. The stands, provides that before ts a preference to unionists fied that a majority of those the application. It will be cretion of the Court to say t a majority is represented nts. Under the Government tically the same provision with regard to the numbers any organization that might ference. The Court, before preference shall be given, d that the organization sub- esents the industry affected mbers.

ER.—And what else?

EDY.—I am now dealing ers, because, as the provision o reference is made to com- n dealing with the points of een the Government proposal o in the Bill. The clause, as resent, provides that the ma- ssent before the Court can- ence. I contend that exactly ition must prevail under the ggested by the Government.

THOMSON.—Then why should e made; why do not honor- accept the Government pro-

EDY.—I want to know what s about. Is not the amend- d by the Government intended n an easy stairway by which pe from a difficult situation? me to be that, and nothing

THOMSON.—No. We think ference.

NEDY.—I grant that there mate grounds for a difference

as.—Does the honorable mem- t there is no difference?

NEDY.—Substantially, I do e is any difference with regard rs who will be required to in- lication for preference. There a difference between the Go- posal and the provision in the ar as the Government amend- o the question of competence.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member has already been told that the provision which the Government propose is based upon the practice adopted by the New South Wales Court.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It does not follow that we should adopt the provision because it is contained in the New South Wales Act.

Mr. HUGHES.—I did not say that. I said that it followed the practice adopted by the New South Wales Court.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Even so, it does not follow that we should adopt it.

Mr. HUGHES.—No; but that affords an excellent reason why the Government should bring it forward.

Mr. KENNEDY.—There is no provision for preference in the Western Australian Arbitration Act.

Mr. CARPENTER.—That is a great defect in the Act.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It may be. I have already stated, in connexion with clause 48, and my vote on a former occasion proved the truth of my words, that I am prepared to give preference to members of organizations. I think that it is essential to the efficient working of the Bill that practically every person engaged in any industry should become a member of an organization. The Bill can never really be made effective unless we can deal with the workers as members of organizations. I differ from the Government and their supporters, however, with regard to the provisions which should be embodied in the rules of industrial organizations. I do not think that the organizations should be permitted to coerce persons to subscribe to objects other than those which are contemplated by the Bill.

Mr. POYNTON.—The provisions relating to that matter have been omitted.

Mr. KENNEDY.—They have not been omitted. The Government refused, point blank, to adopt a provision to the effect that the funds of the industrial organizations under the measure should not be used for purposes other than those contemplated by the Bill.

Mr. POYNTON.—That condition has been imposed in the case of those unions which apply for preference—that is in the Bill.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is not in the Bill, and I hold that such a clause should have been contained in the measure. The rules of an organization should not contain any provision which could have the effect of coercing any of its members in regard to matters of principle, unless the purposes of this Bill were at issue.

Mr. POYNTON.—Look at sub-clause b of clause 62.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have read that provision, in addition to all the other clauses. It was only after I had voted in favour of extending a preference to unionists, and after the Government had refused point-blank to safeguard the interests of non-members of any organization, that I reserved to myself the right to achieve that end, by any subsequent proposal. That was why I supported the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, which to my mind will prevent a minority from coercing a majority.

Mr. WEBSTER.—An unorganized majority.

Mr. KENNEDY.—They may constitute an unorganized majority simply because some provision may be embodied in the rules of an organization, which is repugnant to the mind of any fair individual. Upon a previous occasion I quoted an instance in which a union that was registered under the New South Wales Arbitration Act applied to the Court for the cancellation of the registration of another union. What happened? Its application was refused, because its rules were deemed to be repugnant to any fair-minded man. That, I think, is sufficient justification for my attitude upon this question. Honorable members opposite have threatened us with all sorts of pains and penalties because of our action upon the present occasion. We have been told that a dissolution of Parliament will follow the defeat of the Ministry. I have contested three elections within a period of twelve months, and have had an appeal lodged with the Elections and Qualifications Committee against my return thrown in. Consequently, threats of that sort have no terrors for me. When I go down, I shall do so with a clear conscience. Now that this issue has been raised, I do not think that the Government or their supporters can show us any justification for the lamentations which we have heard from every speaker upon the other side of the chamber. The gauntlet has been thrown down. It has been thrown down upon a question of policy upon which the Government have had a month to reflect. During that period they have been constantly inviting the Opposition to meet them in mortal combat. But now that political scalps are at stake they would defer a decision upon the issue for an week. Their constant cry is "Wait to-morrow."

Mr. TUDOR.—The Opposition have "Wait until next week," ever since Labour Ministry took office.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Now that the issue is being made, whence do the lamentations proceed?

Mr. CARPENTER.—They are all on the opposite side.

Mr. McDONALD.—We are quite happy.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The great trouble with the Government supporters is that they are not to be allowed sufficient time to effect the conversion of some of those who are inclined to vote against the recommitment of the clause. Only yesterday they, in effect, claimed, "Are we to be tested upon this question at once. Let us have another week for underground tactics."

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member seems to be experienced in underground work.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have been accused of engaging in it, but I confess that I have yet a lot to learn. When honorable members opposite charge others with underground engineering, it would be just as well if they supported their statements with facts. It is not sufficient to make assertions. It has been urged by the Government supporters that they have been deprived of an opportunity of putting the question fairly. But I would ask, "Are they not exactly the same opportunity as have honorable members on this side of the chamber?"

Mr. SPENCE.—Our side do not fear light being shed upon their actions.

Mr. KENNEDY.—When the final appeal to our masters comes, there will be no shuffling upon my part. From the point of view of honorable members opposite one may imagine that in the event of the Government proposal to recommit this clause being defeated, none of those upon this side of the House would see the interior of Parliament again. It is beyond their power to determine whether we shall or not. If any of those honorable members who have me with having abandoned my pledge to my constituents to oppose my election should find the time to do so arrives. I candidly say that if my return were opposed by any honorable member opposite I should find myself a worthy opponent. I was pledged to conciliation and arbitration bed public life.

FER.—And now the honorable king to kill it.

NEDY.—That statement canted by facts. I heard a simiwhen the fate of the Deakin was at stake. Those who would the amendment submitted by Minister of Trade and Customs as traitors to the cause of con-arbitration. I can speak upon one who has had some experi-es and of the evils resulting No sane man who is familiar ditions which obtain amongst ts of the workers during the ich a strike is in progress can be the evils attendant upon it.
fair-minded individual—no at class he may belong—who ly welcome any legislative en-h will have the effect of pre-industrial troubles, with all s consequences that follow
. We have been assured that ial of the Government be not in three months, we shall ex-petition of the well-rememe strike. Surely it does not e mouths of honorable mem-to make a threat of that sort.

ES.—Who made that state-

NEDY.—The honorable memoorlie and the honorable memdir.

FER.—I did not.

NEDY.—I accept the honors denial, and I am prepared to e records of the House to deher his statement or mine is ose who affirm that I am op-principle of conciliation and ght to be in a position to prove ion. I voiced my objection to this Bill upon the very first that presented itself. Upon I took exactly the same stand o-night. I have no desire to sion. The issue before us is ed.

ER.—The statement which the mber made just now is absoct, so far as I am concerned.

NEDY.—I accept the honor-
's denial. To my mind, we are not burking discussion by dealing with this question in the manner that has been adopted. We are asked to decide whether we shall impose a limitation upon the preference provision.

Mr. WATKINS.—The amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella will have the effect of robbing unionists of all preference.

Mr. KENNEDY.—A similar statement was made in the earlier stages of the consideration of this Bill. It was urged that if honorable members opposite had to choose between depriving unions of the power to utilize their organizations for political purposes and offering them this Bill, they would throw this measure to the winds.
Is it the desire of any fair-minded man, whether he be in the ranks of the workers or the employers, that the organizations to be constituted under this Bill, in order to secure industrial peace, shall be used for party political purposes? That is the point on which I join issue with honorable members opposite.

Mr. SPENCE.—But it is not affected by
clause 48.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is affected by the Bill, of which this clause forms part.
When we were dealing with the clause on a previous occasion, I said that, unless the Bill safeguarded the rights and political convictions of individual members of organizations, I should be no party to giving the Court power to grant unqualified preference to unionists.

Mr. McDONALD.—Is not the provision safeguarded by the amendment which was carried on the motion of the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs?

Mr. KENNEDY.—No. I have spoken at greater length than I had intended.

Mr. McDONALD.—Go on.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am delighted to think that I have interested honorable members opposite, and I trust that I have not said anything that may be considered to be in any way personal.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—We are only surprised at the views which the honorable member holds, knowing what he does of the situation.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have not turned any political somersault. The position which I now take up is that which I clearly put before my constituents, and it will require something more than a threat on the part of any honorable member to induce me to go back on my principles.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The somersault will come later on.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have placed before the House the conclusions at which I have arrived, and, come what may, I shall go down smiling. I shall not ask any honorable member what might be the effect of any vote that I might give upon any action contemplated by Ministers.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—The honorable gentleman is going to become a free-trader.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is again suggested that I am to be converted into a free-trader. I have yet to learn, however, that my views on the fiscal, or any other question, are likely to be affected in any way according to the side of the House on which I sit. I do not think that there is any justification for the charges which have been levelled against the honorable and learned member for Corinella. I believe that he is fully justified in the course which he has adopted to uphold the position originally taken up by him. He has taken an action which is sanctioned by our rules of procedure, and, as I agree with the object which he has in view, I shall be found voting for the amendment.

Mr. FRAZER.—I desire to make a personal explanation. The honorable member for Moira has accused me of having stated, in the course of my speech, before the adjournment for dinner, that if the Opposition did not accept the Bill in its present form there would be a strike within the next three months. That statement is inaccurate. I did not say that there would be an industrial dispute within the next three months, but I did say that in the event of a strike occurring, as the result of the action of honorable members of the Opposition in hanging up this Bill, they would have to accept the responsibility.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume).—I trust honorable members will bear with me to-night, as I am suffering from a very severe cold, and can scarcely speak. I do not intend to detain the House at length, but I cannot refrain from making a few comments on some of the extraordinary phases of the speech made by the honorable member for Moira, who preceded me. He is an honorable member for whom I have the greatest respect.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—So we all have.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I admire his consistency, but on this occasion he appears to have allowed his feelings to run away with his judgment. He has accused the Ministry, and those who support them, of inconsistency in objecting to the unprecedented course which has been adopted by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, prompted, I have no doubt, by the right honorable member for East Sydney. When an honorable member, whom I have always regarded as a fair-minded man, makes such a charge, I cannot help thinking that on this occasion something has gone wrong with his reasoning faculties. I do not think the honorable and learned member for Corinella, the right honorable member for East Sydney, and, indeed, any member of the Opposition, to bring forward a precedent for the action now being pursued by them. They cannot refer me to any parallel case. I do not admit that occasionally, when a Minister has proposed to recommit an unimportant clause, they have met with opposition; I do not know of any case in which a proposal by a Government to recommit a clause involving so important a question as this has been treated in this manner. I have been in public life almost as long as any honorable member in this House. I cannot say what is the position of the representatives of Victoria, but I have had longer unbroken public career than any other honorable member for New South Wales; yet I cannot call to mind one case which approaches the technically tricky position with which we are now faced.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I remember a tricky one.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No; the honorable member remembers—

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—When the honorable member came into office as Premier of New South Wales.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member remembers that when I discovered that a sum of money had been paid as a bribe to an honorable member I made it the subject of an amendment to a substantial motion, as soon as I ascertained what was the reason for the giving of that bribe. Honorable members know that it was the right honorable member for East Sydney who gave that bribe, and that, in consequence of that action, he went out of office. What was the history of that bribe? £350 to which I refer?

AKER.—I must ask honorable to interject so loudly and so and I appeal to the honorable Hume to confine himself to the other discussion, which is clause

WILLIAM LYNE.—In justification on, Mr. Speaker, I would point as induced to make these observations the interjection of the honorable North Sydney.

OLD THOMSON.—The honorable discussing the point before I

WILLIAM LYNE.—No. The honor is mistaken if he thinks that point in view when he inter- shall not make any further re- matter, but I repeat that the now before the House has been omitted. The position is a grave use who are prepared to allow t of day to shine on all their g a public career extending over feel that it is degrading that members should be afraid to ne Government in a pro-

There are two ways in deal with a question of It is open to the Oppo- allenge the Government by a n of want of confidence, or to defeat them by a side-wind; ways been understood that when a Government is at stake the le discussion should be allowed.

history of this attack on the The Conciliation and Arbitra- introduced by the Deakin Ad- of which I was a member. ble member for Moira has ay consistency with that of le and learned member for nd I therefore feel con- deal with a matter which ot otherwise have mentioned. think that there are not many e me. have risked their advance- lic life before entering this use, and are prepared to do so f they stand alone. rather than ght honorable member for East The right honorable member's shed in smiles.

—Tell us—

WILLIAM LYNE.—The right honor- er will have an opportunity to I have concluded.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—He has not the pluck.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Sometimes he has courage, but on other occasions his heart fails him. Let me deal with the course of events leading up to the present situation. This Bill, as introduced by the Deakin Government, did not apply to the railway servants of the States, and it was because of their defeat on the amend- ment to extend its provisions to those public officers that that Government went out of office. I presume that the hon- orable member for Kennedy was referring to the attitude which I took up in regard to that question when he compared my consistency with that of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. But my late colleagues know that from the very outset I was in favour of the extension of the Bill to all railway servants, and that I told my constituents so. Had it not been for a statement made by the Premier of Victoria, I should not have been compelled, as I was, in loyalty to my colleagues, to vote for the Bill as it stood. When the late Government retired I was free to exercise my individual judgment and to give effect to the view of the ques- tion that I had put before my constituents. My colleagues knew that I favoured the extension of the Bill to the railway servants of the States and of the Commonwealth, and surely when I was at liberty to give effect to that view, I had a right to do so, and, therefore, should not now be charged with inconsistency.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I was referring to the vote on the amendment to exclude agri- cultural and horticultural labourers from the operation of the Bill.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think that I voted against the inclusion of agricultural labourers.

Mr. MCCOLL.—That is so.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—As a matter of fact, when the Bill was being drafted, I was opposed to their inclusion, and there- fore was not inconsistent in voting in that way.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—But the Bill, as introduced by the Government of which the honorable member was a member, ap- plied to them.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member knows very well that one member of a Cabinet cannot expect to have his own way in regard to every clause in a Bill. He must vote with the Government, or else retire from the Ministry. That was my position, and when I found myself at liberty to exercise my individual judgment, I did not see why I should not do so. The right honorable member for Swan knows that what I say is correct.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is, and it suits my position exactly.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—As soon as the right honorable member was out of office, he went round like a whirlwind, and we have not yet felt the last whirl of that whirlwind. The late Prime Minister recommended the Governor-General to send for the honorable member for Bland, much to the chagrin of the right honorable member for East Sydney, who expressed his disappointment in the public press in the most childish manner.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—This is not in clause 48.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Nor is it likely to be.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am afraid that there is not likely to be an Arbitration Bill at all if honorable members on that side have their way. The present Ministry, before they accepted office, and after they took their seats on the Treasury benches, were promised by the late Prime Minister—and the promise is reported in Hansard—that they and their party would be given fair play.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—What has this to do with the question?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It bears on the question, as I shall show. I wish to know where is the consistency of honorable members on that side of the House, and of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat? It was through his instrumentality that the present Ministers were placed in office, and he promised to give them fair play.

Mr. TUDOR.—Why is he not present?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I regret that he is not present. Until to-day the right honorable member for East Sydney and his following were absent, too. If there is one thing which I like in public life, it is open, fair play.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member gives us a shock when he talks in that way, because we know him so well.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member for Macquarie is not a judge of fair play.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I would not go to the honorable member for it. We know his tricky ways.

Mr. REID.—What is the use of making such a fuss about this matter?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I never knew any Premier make such a fuss as did the right honorable gentleman when he was put out of office. He went into a certain room the Labour room—and on his bended knee begged for a penny.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am sure that the honorable member for Hume must be aware that he is wandering from the question. I ask him to set a good example to young members.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I always do, but when interjections are made I am tempted to reply to them, and you must blame me, Mr. Speaker, if my retorts are rather caustic.

Mr. REID.—Hear, hear. The honorable member has had the gout.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I wish the right honorable member had the gout in his tongue. The present position has been brought about by the intrigues of the right honorable gentleman, supported by 50 per cent. of those who voted to displace the Government. They wish to destroy the Bill, lock, stock, and barrel, and at all costs.

Mr. REID.—One would think that the honorable member was himself a Minister. I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, as to whether he is observing the ordinary Parliamentary rule which requires debate to be confined to the question before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have twice, if not thrice, called the attention of the honorable member to the fact that he is travelling beyond the question. I ask him to confine himself strictly to it. If the right honorable member will not interject quite so frequently, it may not be so difficult for the honorable member.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I will endeavour to confine my remarks to the question. The honorable and learned member for Corinella was quite justified, viewing the matter from his stand-point, in moving the proviso which was added to the clause. The Government, however, consider that it destroyed an important and practically a vital principle of the Bill, and they took what was about the only course they could take short of actually resigning, in regard to it. They intimated that they would ask the House to recommit the Bill, with a view to reconsidering its decision in regard to the clause. That was the proper constitutional course to take. The Prime Minister, shortly after making that announcement, said that it would take a week or two for the Cabinet to consider it.

which would probably have to the recommittal, and I was therefore, to hear the honorable Moira to-night accuse the Government having deliberately delayed the of the measure.

EDY.—I did not say that.

WILLIAM LYNE.—The Government being pestered by honorable including the leader of the Opposition party—

—I did not say a word to

WILLIAM LYNE.—The right honorable and his supporters asked the to deal with the Seat of Government in the interim. That measure considered to be of the gravest and the Ministry, true to their introduced it, and carried it now, however, the honorable Moira twits the Government delayed the consideration of present before the House.

EDY.—No.

WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable in effect—"Why did not submit the recommittal for on at an earlier date?"

EDY.—I said that they had for the consideration of the carried by the honorable member for Corinella, and could of his present action.

WILLIAM LYNE.—I have great honorable member, and there surprised at the construction ned to me could be put upon remarks which he made to Ministry could not have done they have done. They have marvellous work in passing the Government Bill, a measure which circumstances might have up" for months or years, will now become law with days. Although I was in obtaining the adoption which I favoured, I submit mbling, and give the Ministry having stuck to the measure. will give them credit, too. the last two days when it was ssion, I felt that there was the wind, and when I tried er vote on the Welaregang site, at honorable member who was the cross-benches asked, "What f talking? I will give you a y one who is away"—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order!

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I felt that there was something behind the beautiful smooth tones of the right honorable member's tongue.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If an honorable member of the experience of the honorable member for Hume does not confine himself to the question at issue, I ask him how is it possible for me to require other honorable members to do so?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Although I know that technically our remarks should be confined to clause 48, I have listened attentively to the speeches of many of those who have preceded me, and I have heard many divergencies from strict relevance to the question. I shall, however, try to obey your ruling. I was only incidentally describing the thoughts that entered my mind on the occasion I speak of. Then, next day—

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—What about clause 48?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have a perfect right to say what I am about to say. Next day I ascertained what was the matter, because the "cat was out of the bag." The antics of the right honorable member for East Sydney are amusing, but he should remember that he is not now in the Tivoli Theatre.

Mr. REID.—Worse luck.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is where they would like to have him. If he is not careful, I will tell the House a little story about Harry Rickards' views on the matter. Under present circumstances the Government will not have an opportunity to defend its policy and its administration.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What opportunity did our Government get?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think that the right honorable member has had a pretty good show since.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What show did we get when we were being put out?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That was the right honorable member's fault. The case was altogether different then. There was no catch-penny business about what then occurred. The great fault was with the late Prime Minister. The present Government, however, are not, in my opinion, getting the fair play which should be extended to them. I am not with them on many of their principles.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable member only votes with them.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I vote according to my conscience, which is what the honorable and learned member does not do. Although I may be opposed to the present Government in regard to many matters, I think that they are entitled to fair play before they are displaced from office. Although what is being done now is technically correct, and according to the rules of the House, the country will know that they have never had fair play since they have been sitting on the Treasury benches.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member is worse than a Minister.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—They have not had fair play from those who were attending to the work of Parliament. The right honorable member has not been here until recently. If I am any judge of the opinions of the country, however—

Mr. REID.—Are we discussing the opinions of the country or clause 48?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think that honorable members may safely leave questions of order to me. If anything takes place which is contrary to the Standing Orders I will myself, as I have done many times already, call the honorable member who offends to order.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I would ask whether it is not competent, sir, for any honorable member to raise a point of order when he thinks that the honorable member addressing the Chair is straying from the point at issue? If honorable members have not the right to do that, they may be placed in a very awkward position. For example, you may not hear some unparliamentary language; but surely honorable members who do hear it should be allowed to draw your attention to it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I should be very far from stating that any honorable member was not free to raise a point of order whenever he pleased. Every honorable member has that right, and if, at any time, I miss a remark honorable members may properly call my attention to it. I suggest, however, that they should abstain, as far as may be practicable, from taking points of order again and again, and rely upon my watchfulness.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The action taken by the Opposition will have the effect of preventing the Government from placing before the country anything more than their policy with regard to clause 48. They cannot discuss such matters as preferential trade, or the offering of the iron and other bonuses. If the result of the vote on the present occasion is, as expected, to displace the Government, and to hand over to a new Ministry the administration of all such matters as those relating to the maintenance of a White Australia—

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Hume is entirely out of order.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I shall do everything I can to keep the honorable member to the point.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have doubt that the honorable member will decline to extend to me the courtesy that would exhibit to any other member of the House; but I can put up with that.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member for Macquarie will get his thirty pieces

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If the Government are defeated, and ejected from office the new Ministry will take charge of a number of important matters, with regard to which we are unfortunately unable to lighten the country at the present time. With regard to the statement that a threat had been made that if the Bill were lost a general strike would occur, I may say that I listened attentively to the statements of the honorable member for Kalgoorlie, and he certainly did not make any threat. What he said was that those who would destroy the Bill must bear the responsibility if a strike unfortunately took place. It is not fair to endeavour to fasten upon the honorable member for Kalgoorlie, or upon any other honorable member, a statement which he did not make. I think that honorable members generally would regret with sorrow anything in the shape of a great industrial conflict. The object of the Bill is to prevent the possibility of anything of that kind. I support the proposal of the Government, first, in the interests of fair play, and, secondly, because it is based upon the practice followed by the Arbitration Court in New South Wales. The Arbitration Act in that State goes a great deal further than is proposed under the Bill before us. For instance, farm labourers are brought within the jurisdiction of the Court, and there is practically no limitation to the scope of the measure in that regard.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. I would direct the honorable member's attention to the fact that he is referring to agriculture are not in any way dealt with in clause 48.

JAM LYNE.—I was certainly surprised by the casual reference to them, but I do not object of acting contrary to the usual practice.

I simply wished to point out the fact that notwithstanding the dreadful consequences which some honorable members apprehend from the passing of the Bill, it is not nearly so serious as the New South Wales Act. I do not do it to do is to make my position clear. I feel that I cannot, under the present circumstances, support the Bill as it is composed as it is, and led by the Government who is at its head. What is the result, even though I support the Bill? I shall be consistent—I shall be consistent in my inconsistency. I do not intend to sacrifice my principles for office, and I do not intend to support a protectionist tail under a free-trade leader.

MR. NEDDY.—As a matter of explanation, I desire to say that the honorable member for Hume had accused him of inconsistency with the vote which he gave in reference to the extension of the Bill to public servants. What I did say was that the honorable member voted for the exclusion of labourers from the operation of the Bill, although, as a member of the Government, he was one of those who supported the Bill, which originally applied to the agricultural industry. The honorable member also stated that I had accused the Government of undue delay in passing this Bill. I made no such charge. I commended the Government for the watch with which they had dealt with the matter, but I did say that since the Bill had been previously been before the Government they had had some time for reflection, and that the proposed amendment represented a judgment.

MR. G. O'MALLEY (Darwin).—I do not see so much heat imparted to the Bill by some honorable members. There is no necessity for any extraordinary action in the matter. As a party, we do not die to-night. There is no on our part. For the three years during which I have been sitting in the House I have felt like a Rocky Mountain tiger cat, and I can go over to the Opposition, the better I shall be pleased.

I do not see why the prospect of the right honorable member for East Sydney coming over to this side of the House should arouse any great excitement. What we object to is the way in which the Opposition are taking advantage of the Government. No opportunity is being afforded to honorable members to discuss the vital issues before the country. If the right honorable member for East Sydney had moved a no-confidence motion, and succeeded in ejecting the Government from the Treasury benches, we should have been satisfied. Under present conditions, however, we are absolutely muzzled, because we are prevented from discussing anything but clause 48. The action of the Opposition might be all right, viewed from the stand-point of the Tammany Hall bludgers or the sand-baggers of Pennsylvania or the Louisiana Kuklux clans, but it is altogether out of place in a British Legislature. Ever since I have been here, British institutions have been held up to me as the glorious apotheosis of liberty and righteousness. We are not troubled at the prospect of crossing over to the other side of the House, but we should like to have an opportunity to discuss clause 48 in Committee. How can we go into Committee, when the numbers are against us? I do not blame the right honorable member for East Sydney. He is playing the political game.

MR. HUGHES.—He is playing a very dirty game.

MR. KING O'MALLEY.—It is a Tammany Hall game. I had hoped that there would be no political trickery or dodgery in this Parliament, but we now have presented to us a sorrowful and pathetic sight. When I look across the chamber and see the sadness depicted in the faces of honorable members opposite, I realize that in their heart of hearts they feel ashamed of what they are doing. I ask them to repent.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—Ask them to testify.

MR. KING O'MALLEY.—I do not ask them to speak, because they have the numbers. It is for those who have not the numbers to speak. The essence of democratic government consists in the preservation of human rights, and no scheming or trickery should be indulged in which would endanger those rights. Honorable members opposite have set themselves up as the party of negation. In this great Parliament of the Commonwealth we are absolutely tied up. I have known nothing like it in the United States Congress. When that body was discussing the great Ben Butler case, there was nothing like that which we now see here. I admit that the Labour Government have not occupied the Treasury benches for any great length of time.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That has nothing to do with clause 48.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I quite agree with you, sir; but nearly all the great discussions that we have had in this House have turned upon matters that have had nothing to do with the question before the Chair. I understand that a majority of honorable members are opposed to the recommitment of this clause. It is absolutely certain, therefore, that it cannot be recommitted, and if that be so, what is the use of endeavouring to recommit it? It must be painfully evident to all that there is a section of this House which does not exactly know where it is. Either honorable members or the Ministerial supporters are at sea. After the skipper of a vessel has been drifting at sea, in storm and darkness, for a prolonged period, what is the first thing which he endeavours to do? He endeavours to ascertain his bearings. I wish to ascertain our bearings, so that we may determine exactly our position. When speaking upon this question, some time ago, the honorable member for Franklin declared that the miners of the West Coast of Tasmania are not in favour of granting a preference to unionists.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I did not say that.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Well, the honorable member said something to that effect. I hold in my hand a letter which I have received from the secretary of the Amalgamated Miners' Association, at Zeehan, bearing upon this point. This communication is important, as showing that the people of the West Coast of Tasmania are favorable to the extension of a preference to unionists.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—How many persons resident in that locality belong to that union?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—There is a great crowd in Zeehan.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—No objection can be urged against a preference being granted to them if they constitute a majority.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I am not prepared to say that they do constitute a majority. The letter to which I have referred reads—

Mr. K. O'Malley, M.H.R.

Dear Sir,—During the debate on the Arbitration and Conciliation Bill now before the Federal House, a statement was made by Mr. McWilliams that the workers of Tasmania were satisfied with the existing state of affairs, and did not desire arbitration. This has caused a great deal of adverse comment here on the West Coast, where the population is more or less of a cosmopolitan description, being composed of workers who have travelled the whole, not only of Tasmania, but in most cases of the Commonwealth. The feeling here, which, I believe, is shared by the workers throughout Tasmania, is that the passing of the Arbitration Act will mark a new era in the history (industrially) of every portion of Australia; and in place of wishing to revert to the old order of things, we look forward to the passing of the Arbitration Bill as a further step in the march of progress and democracy. I trust that if this expression of dissent from the opinion expressed by the member for Franklin will assuage you or any member of the Ministry in their efforts to place this important and progressive measure on the Statute Book of the Commonwealth, I will not hesitate to use it. With every good wish for your continued prosperity, and regards from inquiring friends,

I am, yours sincerely,

S. FORD,
Zeehan

Mr. SPEAKER.—Does the honorable member say that that communication relates to the proposal to grant a preference to unionists?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Indirectly does. It is not couched in the language of a lawyer, but in that of the ordinary miner.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The question immediately before the Chair is not the passing of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, but the recommitment of a clause which relates to the granting of a preference to unionists.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Exact. That is the position which these miners take up. They say that without a preference to unionists the Bill will prove inoperative.

Mr. TUDOR.—Many honorable members will vote against that clause from a desire to kill the measure.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I would not say that, because I do not think that we have a right to attribute ulterior motives to one another. I wish to put the position as fairly as possible. In the absence of this provision, can any honorable member assure me that there is any power on earth to enforce an award against an individual workman? If a wealthy individual against whom judgment led in a civil action fails to judgment, his property can be auction. But if a preference to unionists, how can any arbitration Court be enforced individual workman? Such a t be granted, because the represent the capital of their personally, I should much pre- an action against a strong ation than against a solitary w can we extract blood from orable members are being stipend of £400 a year; but know is how we can enforce st the individual workman. A member of Parliament still strike.

O'MALLEY.—I am not at rike. That liberty was from me, when I had much money in fighting I do not think that my nds opposite have studied They have been consumed an anxiety to displace the know that the right honor- or East Sydney is usually a e individual. But, reason- who has renounced his readministering medicine to a t is inefficacious. No man expressing an opinion unless or himself.

oy.—A man requires some- with.

O'MALLEY.—My honor- ll never be troubled by his more we examine this a financial stand-point, shall come to the conclusion ust be organized. I firmly onorable members opposite under a frightful hallucina- r anxiety to jump the seats Ministry they have neglected uestion.

—What question?

O'MALLEY.—The honor- should go home and sleep lieve that he is open to rea- ould recollect that prejudice enemy of investigation.

EDWARDS.—Four twelves.

O'MALLEY.—I do not the honorable member has e Rocky Mountains, but if probably familiar with the n flea. With that insect, it is a case of "Now you have him, now you haven't," but he is always bothering one. I am anxious to put this matter so clearly that even the most unintelligent may understand it. There is no reason why we should attempt to destroy each other. This is a socialistic House, and we are all partners.

Mr. WILKS.—Except in the matter of allowances.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—The time will come when Ministers will have to divide with the brethren.

Mr. REID.—There will be no trouble then.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I shall not deny the fact that I believe that the Labour Party have, in one respect, set a bad example.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member must discuss the question before the Chair.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—It is remarkable how a man will wander away from the question. I believe in preference to unionists, and think that we should give effect to that principle in the Bill. I am anxious that honorable members should consider this question in an impartial manner, and, banishing all sordid considerations, endeavour to deal with it on its merits. I appeal to honorable members to say how an award could be enforced if each individual in the land had to be dealt with separately?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—No one proposes anything of the kind.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—If it were merely necessary to found organizations consisting of 100 members each, and having only a few pounds at their disposal—the moneys of the unions on which they were based being kept entirely apart from the organizations themselves—it would be impossible to give effect to any award imposing penalties upon them. That, however, would be the position if the course proposed by the Opposition were adopted. I should like honorable members not to be carried away by the awful fears which some appear to entertain in regard to members of the Labour Party. They are no more dangerous than are members of any other party in the House. They are endeavouring to carry out that which they believe to be in accordance with the principles of justice. Some persons have not so clear a conception of the principles of justice as have others, but every member of the Labour Party is filled with his mission to repletion. So far as this question is concerned, the Labour Party are missionaries among the heathen. Honorable members remember that the cannibals in Fiji used to eat missionaries—

Mr. SPEAKER.—That question has nothing to do with the matter before the House.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I bow to your ruling, sir.

Mr. WILKS.—It shows a preference.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—A preference to unionists for white men, as missionaries are unionists. After cannibalism was abolished, they had to substitute mutton for missionary.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is out of order.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I agree with you, sir. Unions may exist among savages. We had various unions among the Yaqui Indians in Mexico, and the Grand Sagamore used to sit back in his chair, while the members fell at his feet to worship him. We are making a great mistake in proposing to deal with this question without carefully investigating it. It is proposed to turn out of office a Ministry which, during its short career, has set a splendid example to the world. I should not object so strongly to their defeat if it took place after the presentation of our case in the clearest possible way, so that the people might judge for themselves of the attitude which we take up. But I seriously object to the action of the Opposition, for we have no such opportunity to discuss the general question as we should have if a straight-out motion of want of confidence were submitted. Many persons condemn the Labour Party—men who have no chance to place their views before the country by means of the press. Could the evil which is in the minds of our opponents die with them, and their bad example also, we might enjoy the luxury of forgetting all about them. That, however, cannot be, because the evil which men do must live after them. The action which honorable members of the Opposition are now taking against the Government may recoil on them with tenfold strength long before they anticipate anything of the kind. Evil and the example of evil acquire tenfold strength when they speak from the grave. We have good memories, and we shall never forget this night. It may be necessary for us to metaphorically gibbet those who are treating the Government in this unchristian, righteous, and dishonorable manner, so with the steel pen of a century to cut their names will be written so high, and letters so black, that their children's children will be ashamed to bear their names am sad to-night. When I think of honorable members opposite, after a struggle for protection—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is again wandering away from the subject.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I admit, that I am. It is because I cannot to the main question that I feel so sad. To-night we see among the ranks of the position honorable members, whom we invited to carry the great policy of protection, standing up and denouncing us.

Mr. MAUGER.—Not all of them.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—No; but the Lord, there is one saved. I have witnessed sad scenes in the United States of America, but have never seen so sad a spectacle as that which now confronts us. We may be mistaken, we may feel that cannot endure it—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the honorable member to debate the clause, and cease speaking.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I come to the consideration of clause 48. I do not desire in any way to come into conflict with the Chair, but I should like to point out that there is at least one essential difference between capital and labour. Labour is an organization possessing a heart, and a conscience, while capital is an organization that is soulless, heart-grasping, and vicious.

Mr. HIGGINS.—There is no soul in clause 48.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I am sorry to say there is not.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It has been torn out of it.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—That is what I am really amazed that Ministers should have been so foolish as to make this a question. If ever I obtained office the Opposition would have a difficulty in replacing me. They would not put me in such a light and easy way.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I desire to be absolutely fair, and I wish to know what the Opposition propose in lieu of the Government amendment.

EDWARDS.—The proviso alone.

O'MALLEY.—But it will round. It certainly does not unionist shall have preference. The members opposite any contention that which the workers are engaged in submitting themselves to a High Court? We know that the High Court is nurtured, trained in a school remote from the vast multitudes who toil in the year. These people are surrender the right to strike themselves to the Court, and even them in return? At the attack on labour there is the for some reason or other, an man is made of inferior clay with that of which the so-called are composed. The gold-diggers, whose bank overdrafts are nobility, think that the ideal of workmen is that of a hater; and that they should in hopes and prospects to the unattached slave masters. Throughout the world awakened people to a sense of community sentiments of comradeship, and of associated effort to such an end as day philosophers and other who are devoting themselves to one of the troubles caused by arrived at the conclusion that the arch-enemy of the workers is the State. If that be the case, and have worked to secure the up-lift of wage-earners, why should they be side and branded as bodies of that is what the clause, as it do.

EDWARDS.—Preference is

O'MALLEY.—It would be a vast aggregation of money; a monopoly when you say to men, "Organize, and form associations, so that we may" There is no greater union-honorable member for South to-night he has wandered from of unionism, as even the best go astray when he gets into. The honorable member ask that I have not a great reason however. We ought not to take this vote suddenly. We ought to try to look into the question.

Mr. McDONALD.—Why should not the vote be taken?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Are honorable members anxious for it?

Mr. McDONALD.—Yes.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—If they are ready to die, it is all right. I do not wish to talk for hours, if there is nothing to be gained by doing so.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The honorable member is delivering the funeral oration of the Government.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—The Ministry is being sacrificed to the commercial and corporate greed of Australia.

Mr. TUDOR.—At the mandate of the Employers' Federation.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—I would not say anything like that. But the liberty-loving, truthful workers of Australia, the great toilers of this country, if they cannot get justice from this House, may eventually be forced to demand the restoration of the Mosaic law, which requires "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." During the three months that the Ministry have been in office, they have proved themselves to be as good administrators as we have had in Australasia, and as there have been anywhere else in the world. In this southern, sunny land we may yet see a monument erected which will for ever perpetuate the era when corporate and commercial aggression met its doom, and humanity achieved its regeneration.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne—Attorney-General).—I considered that the few words which I may say were ill-suited to so warm a temperature as we had in this Chamber a short time ago; but now that the honorable member for Darwin has brought the House again into good humour, what I have to say may not be so inappropriate. The limits of the discussion have, if I may say so, been very rightly narrowed by your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and in my remarks I shall narrow them still more. The question before the House is simply whether the Government shall be granted leave to recommit one of the gravest and most difficult clauses to frame which there is in the Bill. Some honorable members wish to refuse the request for recommitment, and they are, of course, perfectly entitled to do so. But the effect of their action will be that a proviso, which all must admit was inserted without argument and without discussion, by a snatch majority, when honorable members were hurrying away to catch the trains to other States, cannot be re-discussed.

Mr. ISAACS.—Discussed, not re-discussed.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes, discussed; because it has never yet been discussed. Honorable members who were present on the occasion, remember that the Committee had been wearied with the discussion of other amendments.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—With the discussion of clause 48.

Mr. HIGGINS.—With the discussion of amendments in that clause. The Prime Minister at last arranged to allow a certain amendment to be accepted. Another amendment was rejected, and then the honorable and learned member for Corinella moved the proviso of which he had given notice. It is quite true that it had been printed and circulated; but he said, "I will not argue it, if Ministers will not do so"; and Ministers did not argue it. There was a division forthwith, and the Government were beaten. That proviso has not yet been discussed. Any one who wishes to refer to the proceedings will find them recorded on page 2689 of the Hansard report for the current session, so that I am speaking by the card. Ministers who are responsible to the House and to the country for this grave measure ask the House, under these circumstances, not to merely consider the amendment which they propose to move, but to see whether some device cannot be found, by the ingenuity of honorable members, which will make the proviso workable. Apparently a majority, led by one or two, are inclined not to give us leave to do this. If the action of the House is meant to be an insult, a slap in the face to Ministers, we must take it as such. Honorable members are quite entitled to act as they have acted; but it is not the way in which statesmen act. It is not right to refuse to discuss the amendment of a proviso which was inserted in such a grave clause as that now before the House under the circumstances which I have detailed. I assure honorable members that I have studied the proviso with the utmost care, and I have to warn them that I have come to the conclusion, which is shared by others whose opinions I regard very highly, that it is most unskillfully drawn, and if passed into law is likely to cause great difficulty to the President of the Court. Furthermore, it certainly will not carry out the object which its mover has expressed himself as desirous of carrying out. I say that, knowing that I am speaking in some respects to deaf ears; but I think it is my duty to let the House know that the proviso will not achieve the object which its mover, and those who have supported it, think it will achieve. If honorable members will look for a moment at its concluding words, they will see that before a preference is granted there is required a majority, "of those affected by the award who have interests common with the applicants." Who are those who are "affected by the award"? I should think that they are not merely those who are bound by it, but their families and others as well. But, in order to come to graver matters, I will assume that "affected by the award" means "bound by the award." The proviso, however, assumes that it is only by the award that preference can be given. That is a mistake. Preference may also be given by an order. Clause 48 itself allows preference to be given by an order, but there is no proviso that there must be a majority of those who are to be affected by the order. That is not the way of it. Let us go a step further. The proviso says, "those who have interests common with the applicants." Who are they? The words used are not "those who are in the industry," but "those who have interests in common with the applicants."

Mr. WATKINS.—Every workman in Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That may or may not be; but let me give the House a concrete instance. Let me assume that an award is made affecting all seamen amongst whom are unionists and non-unionists, including lascars in receipt of, say, 15s. per week. Incidentally, I may observe that honorable members who say that where workmen are not united they do not get fair play are perfectly correct. Suppose that an award is made affecting all seamen, and application is made for the granting of a preference to unionists. Who will be "those who have interests in common with the applicants"? Surely the lascars, and those who are not unionists but the unionists themselves, and it will be easy to obtain a majority of unionists in favour of the granting of the preference. The honorable and learned member is not now present, is a man who deserves great credit for which he prepares his work. The first to admit that the Bill should be reconsidered.

EDWARDS.—So does the honorable and learned gentleman who is more slovenly drafting in the House "the industry affected" on both sides.

INS.—The honorable member to express his opinion on the Bill which he alludes to. I am quite responsible for it, though I did not draft it. It was not mine. What the Government are not at all anxious to do is to amend any amendment down the honorable members. We wish the Bill shall be recommitted and we are determined that the House shall know what our position is.

Y.—Is it not monstrous that the Bill should be asked to reconsider and may take the bread out of the mouths of the people?

INS.—I wish that we could get out of some men's mouths. I shall respect that the phrase "the industry affected" is obscure. Honorable opposite, however, do not ask the House to put it right. I will even allow their own meanly expressed, and to be so. They say, "We are opposed to it." We shall not have any limit to the debate, we shall let the Ministerial supporters from their minds with regard to the Bill that has been pursued, and we shall secure the vote of one honorable member whose vote will count two votes, and that will give us a majority.

COOK.—Does the Attorney-General intend the recommitment merely in order to delay the drafting?

INS.—I wish to remedy the Bill in order to effect my object, and I am sure my honorable and learned member for Corinella, to delay the drafting of his amendment to prevent the provision being nonsensical. The only question is, are we going to trust the honorable member for the task of converting a stupid amendment into one which will be effective? When we come to the clause which we get to it—some honorable member says that they wish it to read in one way, whilst I may wish to adopt another phraseology. Surely that will be the time to discuss it. A number of honorable members have sought to persuade us that we should have no alternative but to adopt the Government proposal, or allow the proviso to stand. That, however, is not the case. The question is, is the House to be trusted, or not. Is it to be allowed an opportunity to put the clause right, and to make its meaning clear? I feel that I have no right to complain of the action taken. As a Ministry we can submit. We came into office without seeking it, and we shall go out without having disgraced ourselves. We came into office without cadging, and we shall go out without cringing. All that I can say is that our occupancy of office has provided a beneficial lesson for the country, which will see that a Labour Ministry has been displaced before it has committed any fault of administration, before it has proposed anything contrary to the programme put forward by its leaders at the outset. I must say that I think it is fortunate for us that the present course has been followed by the Opposition. It might have been difficult for us to explain from the platform, to those who are not versed in the intricacies of unionism and arbitration, the difference between the clause as it stands and as it would appear if the Government proposal were adopted. When, however, it comes to a question of taking the conduct of the business of the House, and the ordinary machinery of Government out of the hands of Ministers, we can make our position clear to the constituencies. We can show that, because the Ministry has been sneered at as a Labour Ministry by snobs, therefore, it has been regarded as not entitled to fair play. If the clause be not re-discussed, we shall be able to go to the outside public untrammelled. Our hands will not be tied, even by the amendment which we have put before the House. We shall be absolutely free. I think we went to the utmost limits in that amendment. I am not at all sure that we did not go too far; but we went so far in order to save the Bill from being wrecked. Whenever the people ask for bread, whatever we do—no matter what the consequences may be—we shall not give them a stone. When the people are asking for an Arbitration Bill which will work, we shall not give them a Bill which will not work. We were quite willing to exclude from the scope of the Bill for the present the agricultural industry, domestic occupations, and so forth, to which the House did not think the Bill should apply. But when it becomes a question of amending the Bill in such a way as to make it useless for any industry we hold our hands and say, "No; we will have nothing of the sort." I regretted to hear the speech delivered by the honorable member for Moira, whom I have respected extremely in the Victorian Parliament and here. I did not understand the unjust way in which he treated the action of the Ministry in regard to the Bill now before us and the Seat of Government Bill. I ask any fair man if we have taken any unfair advantage, or have been guilty of any trickery. I am quite sure when the honorable member comes to think of it, he will see that this Ministry, whatever its faults may have been, has acted honorably and above board, and has not been guilty of any underground engineering; that it has fought for its principles, that it has not sought office, and that it will leave it with a good record and an unstained flag. The right honorable member for East Sydney is not here. He has always spoken of this measure as one embodying "a great reform." A certain air of cynical irony has characterized the right honorable gentleman, but still that is the expression that has been recorded in Hansard, and that can be referred to when there is need. He has spoken of this as a great reform. I suppose because it is a great reform it is to be whittled away as much as possible—the greater it is, the more can be cut off. I am surprised at the position taken up with regard to clause 48 by my friend the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, whom I have followed with great interest and great enthusiasm. The honorable and learned member voted for the insertion of the proviso proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corinella.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable and learned member said that he had not voted against a single line of the Bill he introduced.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is true, but although it is literally true, it conveys an impression which I am sure the honorable and learned member would not wish to convey.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I said that I had voted for two alterations.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes, but the point that it is not necessary to cut a clause, even a line, out of a Bill in order to injure it. You may kill a man as well by poisoning him as by cutting a piece out of him and you can kill a Bill as effectually by inserting a proviso as by taking one out of it. We never entertained the least idea that the honorable and learned member would favour the proviso. He never suggested in his great second-reading speech on the Bill. We brought down clause 48 in the exact form in which it had been proposed by the honorable and learned member, without any warning to us, the proviso was inserted, with the assistance of the honorable and learned member.

Mr. CONROY.—The Attorney-General blaming the honorable and learned member for making two alterations, whereas three alterations are proposed by the Government.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I can assure the honorable and learned member that I was referring to him when I was speaking just now. The best test of the present situation is this: Let us talk of this great reform. The right honorable member for East Sydney frequently reiterates that this is a great reform. Let us see upon which side those who are honestly opposed to all arbitration matters are going to vote on this occasion.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member who proposed arbitration—the honorable and learned member for Ballarat—voting on this side.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member is very ready at edging away from the point. The point is, upon which side are avowed opponents of the Arbitration Bill going to vote?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—They are wrecking the Bill.

Mr. LONSDALE.—They put the Ministry on the Treasury benches.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We did not do them for it.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Ministers were pleased to accept their assistance.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That is not true.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the Minister to withdraw that remark.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I withdraw.

Mr. HIGGINS.—All I desire to say is that not only will the proviso not have the effect which the honorable and learned member for Corinella wishes, but it will prevent

The majority of those en-industry cannot be ascertained us is taken. It will be neve practically an electoral roll, revision court, and practic-ndum, and all the machinery ascertaining who are on this
t. Other honorable members
th this measure with a grasp ch only experience can give,
in the position to follow them.
ow myself to be convinced by e gained in New Zealand, Vales, and Western Australia best thing for Australia is a ion Bill, with a very strong use. I do not think that an easure can be worked without unionists. I know enough rience in regard to union dele-been "spotted" by employers, they must stand down without ing given. I feel convinced ference is given to unionoyers will be able to weed out uits them those men who stand hts of their fellows. I thank mbers for having listened to ng. I do not speak at any s a rule, and I do not propose y remarks beyond reiterating e is vague and imperfect, and y out the purposes of its

ONEY (Melbourne). — I am honorable member for Moira
. Before he left I directed to certain remarks which he gard to the honorable member and he was manly enough to n. He declared that he would rty to voting for preference to ss it was qualified, after hear-able member for Barrier say s should be political machines, nds should be used for poli-
s. As a matter of fact,
e member for Barrier did
, and did not speak be-te for preference to union-vote for the qualification.
sely refrained from speaking in order to facilitate its pas-he House. I do not suppose rable member will deny that peeches which have been deli-have emanated from the Op-of the Chamber. A reference will establish that fact. Another reason why I did not address myself to this measure was that the other Chamber is absolutely unable to proceed with its legislative work for lack of business. At the present time it is anxiously waiting for this Bill. That House represents the democracy of Australia by the votes of the whole of the States. Shall it be said that honorable members denied to the other branch of the Legislature an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon this Bill? I confess that I was fairly staggered by the incontestable proof which the Attorney-General advanced that this very provision has never been debated. In the Victorian Parliament I have seen many Ministries displaced from office, but I have never known methods to be employed similar to those which are being adopted in the present instance. This Government would have welcomed a straight-out want of confidence motion, the discussion upon which would not have been limited. During the two election contests for the representation of Melbourne in this House, the dominant questions raised had reference to protection and the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. After having had two elections and a law suit crammed into the brief space of two and a half months, honorable members will understand that a a little rest would be acceptable to me.

Nevertheless, so fond am I of fighting, that if honorable members opposite are willing to appeal to the country, I shall gladly welcome the opportunity of again facing my constituents. Who is responsible for the delay in the passing of this Bill? The columns of Hansard will show that the fault does not rest with the Ministerial supporters. Is it not a significant circumstance that upon an amendment affecting the existence of the Government, neither of the two leaders of the Opposition have uttered a single word?
Where are those leaders now? They should be seated at the table of the House.
It seems to me that the honorable and learned member for Corinella must have studied the words of the great American jurist—one of the greatest jurists in the world—who said that—

For the betrayer of a country or of a great cause we have not far to seek. We shall find him in the lawyer ready-made.

I know that the honorable and learned member for Corinella acted in a similar manner in the Victorian Parliament, and I am sure that he regretted his action. It is true that by Act of Parliament

he could call himself, as Minister, "honorable," but his constituents did not indorse his right to that title. I am sorry to have to say that. No man ever entered parliamentary life with better opportunities. His keenest admirers, however, will experience a feeling of regret when they see him attempting by a legal quibble of this kind, to oust the Government from office. Personally, I should much prefer to support the right honorable member for East Sydney, because I have studied a record of the measures which he passed when Premier of New South Wales, than the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. The former, with the assistance of the Labour Party, was instrumental in placing some very good laws upon the statute-book of that State. But I cannot find any record of a single good measure which has been passed at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, and I challenge anybody else to point to one.

Mr. McCOLL.—Who introduced the first Factories Bill?

Mr. MALONEY.—But did not I receive my first cold douche when, a few weeks after the magnificent meeting which he addressed in the Melbourne Town Hall, I asked him if he would make an attempt to put down sweating? His reply was, "How can we put down sweating?"

Mr. McCOLL.—What about the Factories Act?

Mr. MALONEY.—The honorable and learned member for Ballarat never accomplished as much good in the Victorian Parliament as did the honorable member for Echuca. Does any honorable member of this House affirm that it is possible to give effect to the principles contained in this Bill unless a preference be granted to unionists? Why do honorable members object to the Government proposal? I do not believe that there is any member in this House who wishes to see a continuance of the accursed system of strikes. The legal union is the strongest union in the world.

Mr. FISHER.—But the learned professions are privileged.

Mr. MALONEY.—They will not be privileged when the proletariat obtain the voting power, when the universities of the world are thrown open to the children of the workers. The honorable member for Franklin declared that it was slavery to compel a man to conform to the judgment of the Arbitration Court. I admit that the honorable member is an honest opponent but his criticism of the Bill reminds me very forcibly of those persons who used to argue that the prosperity of England would disappear if the employment of child labour were prevented by the Factory Act. I am sure that if he had read the words used in this connexion by one of the greatest of English nobles—I refer to Lord Shaftesbury—he would never forgo them. In volume I., page 418, of Life by Edwin Hodder, his Lordships says:—

We were told that without the employment of child labour the pits could not possibly be worked with a profit, for after a certain age the vertebrae of the back do not conform to the required position.

The backbone of the child—if it were old—could not bend to the proper position. Consequently, children of five years of age were preferred, and they died like flies in a summer swamp. The honorable member for Dalley, in his straightforward way, has declared that he is not a member of the Labour Party, and that he always has to fight its candidates. I trust that they will always fight him fairly. He says that he wishes to secure a workable measure. But is he not aware that this particular clause has never been properly considered? How does he propose to secure its amendment. Would it not be better for the Bill to be reconsidered in Committee, and afterwards transmitted to the other Chamber, so that its members might have an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon it. The Senate is a more democratic Chamber than is this House. Why should we prevent its members from voicing their opinion upon one of the most important questions which could possibly occupy their attention? What is more important than the avoidance of strikes? I hold that nobody can advocate that method of settling industrial disputes without doing violence to his intelligence. I am perfectly satisfied that if the electors were consulted as to what they would prefer this Bill in the form in which the Government desire that it should be passed, or in the form which its opponents advocate, they would unhesitatingly declare in favour of the Ministry. They wish to obtain a workable Bill. Since it was returned to this House, upon 31st March last—some four months ago—I have not occupied ten minutes in discussing proposals contained in this measure. It is now to be thrown aside, the fault of the Ministry, or with their chiefly rests with the honorable member for Ballarat. One where he is going, because he more backbone than does a jelly —That is a most improper remark to make. He is than is the honorable member. NEY.—I do not think that know that in every way I am than is the honorable and er who interjects. With the which the honorable and er for Ballarat had behind have passed an Arbitration a years ago. The mightiest oria was at his beck and call ars, and had he desired he en Premier of Victoria years

—He might have had the ar.

NEY.—He might, at all een a kind of dictator. There er as that to which I am re- w South Wales, and during s the honorable and learned s full support. I wish that bkbone of the grey-haired man ng exercised that power; if racy would be the better for t months which we have de- nsideration of this Bill are t wasted. I could have wished Government had been able ll into law. One honorable aid that all should be equal f the law. It was because t that we endeavoured to ex- nsions of the Bill to the public e States and of the Com- Wou'd it not have been be- lfare of the Commonwealth become law long ago? Do at many cigar-makers are to- the streets of Melbourne in oyment, and that their posi- the absence of such a law id I not meet last week a ho had found it necessary to e for Sydney to earn a liveli- of the action taken by a a monopoly in this State? e is employing girls in South manufacture cigars at such many men in this city have out of employment. That e been possible had this Bill nto law. Men are being deprived of an opportunity to earn a livelihood as cigar manufacturers simply because of the action of this syndicate, which would rob any one in the tobacco trade. If a Royal Commission were appointed to deal with the industry the disclosures which would follow would be almost as bad as the iniquitous and infamous proceedings which have been brought to light by the Butter Commission. What will be the result of the consideration which we have given to this Bill during the last four months? I suppose that if the Government be defeated, and a dissolution does not follow, the incoming Ministry will require an adjournment of something like three weeks, and that we shall then be called upon to go over the whole fight again. If we succeed in carrying the Bill into law by December next we shall be fortunate.

Mr. GROOM.—We shall not see the Bill again.

Mr. MALONEY.—I am sure that the honorable and learned member hopes with me that that will not be the case. It is only by such a Bill as this that we may avoid strikes.

Mr. McDONALD.—The honorable member need not expect to see such a Bill supported by the incoming Government.

Mr. MALONEY.—I hope that if, as the result of the attitude which we have taken up in regard to clause 48, the Bill be lost, our masters — the public — will take action. If a referendum were taken the whole question would be very speedily settled. The people of Australia would demand the passing of this Bill, and we should have to carry out their behest. If there is to be a dissolution, I shall gladly welcome it. I shall go into the fight with a light and happy heart; but I do hope that, if we are returned, we shall come back pledged not to grant a preference to unionists subject to all sorts of restriction, but to give the unions some tangible security. We have no desire to lean to either side. Those who ask for preference to unionists are willing that the Bill shall be so framed as to provide that, when unions are in the wrong, they shall be liable to punishment. We are quite willing that, when a union is at fault, it shall be liable to be fined, just as an employer, who is in the wrong, should be liable to punishment. I have to-day experienced the bitterness of seeing in our gallery some of the men who organized the system now in operation in Adelaide, which has had the effect of robbing many men of their means of employment.

This state of affairs would not be possible if a Commonwealth Conciliation and Arbitration Act were in operation. There is no cigar-maker in Australia who does not deplore the absence of such a measure, and I believe I may say the same of those engaged in every industry. I cheerfully face the vote which is to be taken on this question, and I am sure that the Government do not fear it. If a dissolution be granted as the result of the defeat of the Ministry, I am sure that the honorable member for Moira will cheerfully face the consequence, and that even if his constituents wish him to object to the passing of the Bill in the form which we desire, they will admit that we should at least have had an opportunity to fairly discuss it.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—I wish to state in a very few words why I propose to vote against the honorable and learned member for Corinella's amendment. There are two considerations which appeal to me in connexion with this question. The first relates to the merits of the amendment which has been inserted in clause 48, and has given rise to this discussion, while the second deals with the merits of the amendment now before the Chair. With regard to the desirableness of preserving the amendment carried on the motion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, as contrasted with the Government proposal, I think that there are various points which some of my honorable friends, who base their opposition to the recommitment of the clause upon their regard for non-unionists, would do well to consider. There cannot be the slightest doubt that whether we consider the interests of unionists or non-unionists, a fair comparison of the two amendments must tell heavily in favour of the Government proposal. Both proposals would permit preference to be granted. It cannot be too distinctly emphasized at this stage—having regard more particularly to the possibilities of the situation in the near future—that both proposals assume preference to be given to unionists under certain conditions. There should be no misunderstanding in regard to that point. It is a question not of refusing preference, or of voting that there shall be no preference, but of admitting preference, and of saying what are the fair terms under which it shall be allowed. From the stand-point of the unionists the Government proposal is infinitely superior, because it is workable, while the clause as it stands is open to the animadversions we have heard to-night from the Attorney-General—animadversions which, to my mind, are nearly all, if not all, thoroughly well founded. The clause as it stands a provision that may be evaded, and if evaded, may render the whole proposal to preference either illusory or harsh. As far as non-unionists are concerned the proposal of the Government is much fairer and much more liberal. The clause, as amended, on the motion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, prohibits the granting of preference where it is not proven to the satisfaction of the Court that organizations making application represent a majority in number of the workers of the industry. It says nothing about competency. A mere majority of one, without any other condition, would enable the Court to give any preference that it pleased. On the other hand the Government proposal, while being more workable in the interests of unionists, would conserve the interests of non-unionists. It provides that the Court shall merely have regard to the bare majority number; but that it shall see whether the unionists making application substantially represent the industry, both in number and in competency.

Mr. LONSDALE.—How would the Court decide the question of competency?

Mr. ISAACS.—The Court would be required to decide what is competency.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Then the Government proposal is only a make shift?

Mr. ISAACS.—The Court will not be required to decide the competency of employers, but to determine whether the unionists substantially represent the industry in number and in competency.

Mr. LONSDALE.—What is the meaning of "substantially?"

Mr. ISAACS.—Something more than the honorable member's interjection.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It is too substantial for the honorable and learned member to answer.

Mr. ISAACS.—If we compare the merits of the two proposals—I was going to say before the House—one of which is embodied in the clause, while the other cannot be brought before us, although it is within our cognisance, I have no hesitation in saying it must be recognized that the Government proposition would be fairer to the Bill, fairer to unionists.

rer to non-unionists. If, honorable friends on the House, who pro-inst the Government on this cerely actuated by a desire interests of non-unionists, t their votes with the other r phase of the question is, al meaning of the amend-ly before the House. I rse what has been said as to y nature. I cannot conceive ble member, desiring fairly estion as a matter to be dee determined, could refuse overnment an opportunity to ause in Committee. The of Parliamentary procedure a such a question in Comis to happen if that course
?

—In this case a full House ssion to its opinion. Every ted for.

CS.—The honorable and has, perhaps, forgotten that the knowledge of the House, been repeated to-night—that rich led to the amendment of the motion of the honorable mber for Corinella, was taken s of the week. It was taken The proposal of that honored member was that the vote ace without debate. The expressed the view that he efficiently met the wishes of he consented courteously, to nience of the honorable and r and others, who desired to wed the division to be taken

Whatever the decision may as unfortunate that so impora matter—for it was a vital r we may regard the merits of should have been determined and ordinary consideration.

WILLIS.—Is not the House

S.—If the honorable member sified of the strength of his does he not allow the Goke the Bill into Committee, e clause there? Of what is he is satisfied of the strength r, why does he not welcome the take the Bill into Committee matter discussed? I never yet stance in which a man who was convinced of the strength of his argument feared to put it to the test. I have had some years of experience in parliamentary government, and I have never yet known an honorable member who was convinced that his position was right, and who yet refused to his opponents the opportunity to test it.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—We are testing the matter now. Let us get to the vote.

Mr. REID.—The Government cannot turn any more votes, so what is the use of wasting time?

Mr. WATSON.—The right honorable member is afraid of light being thrown on this subject.

Mr. ISAACS.—He must not be in too great a hurry to wear his crown.

Mr. WATSON.—He is very anxious; he has been out of office for a long time.

Mr. ISAACS.—We should have regard, not to the desire of any honorable member to sit upon the Treasury benches, but to the interests of hundreds of thousands of our fellow countrymen; and any course which burkes deliberation, which blocks improvement, and which amounts to the application of the closure, is not one which should commend itself to those who support and admire representative institutions. There is only one course marked out by our parliamentary procedure as a proper one to be followed in the present instance. If the only desire of honorable members is to fling an insult at the Government, and to oust it from office, whether it be in the right or in the wrong, the course now being taken may be the right one. But it is the invariable practice of Parliaments to allow a Government to take its proposals into Committee, and to deal with them there upon their merits. In Committee objections can be answered, suggestions may be made, and there are no limitations beyond those imposed by his own reasonable discretion upon the number of times which a member can rise to discuss the matter. No one would grudge any honorable member the opportunity to speak more than once in Committee on a question of this magnitude. Yet, we are now discussing it in the House, where honorable members can speak only once. An honorable member who has spoken may hear arguments adduced in opposition to the views which he has put forward, but he has not an opportunity to reply. Beyond all other considerations, the course which is now being taken abridges the ordinary rights of debate in regard to the question.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Will the honorable and learned member give an interpretation of the words "substantial majority"?

Mr. ISAACS.—I should say that they mean a greater majority than will vote against the Government upon this question. I do not wish to occupy more time than is necessary for the expression of my views. The strongest reason I have for voting as I intend to vote, is that I think it is only just that the Government should have a full and fair opportunity to place their proposals before honorable members. I do not think that they will have the opportunity which they should have, and which the country desires that they should have—which perhaps, in the interests of fair play, the country will see that they have in the future—if they are blocked from taking this question into Committee. I know that it will be said of some honorable members that they were so satisfied with the correctness of their views upon this question, that they felt that there was no need for debate; that they were so imbued with the feeling that non-unionists are the persons to be protected, that they were prepared to go to any lengths, and beyond the fair limits of parliamentary warfare, to protect them.

Mr. LONSDALE.—No. Fair play to all.

Mr. ISAACS.—Fair play to all! Then why not give the Government fair play?

Mr. LONSDALE.—We have discussed this matter over and over again, and the honorable and learned member knows it.

Mr. ISAACS.—I do not think that the Government have had fair play since they have come into office.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That is perfectly true.

Mr. MCCOLL.—The honorable and learned member's statement is a mere assertion, and requires proof.

Mr. LONSDALE.—They have had fairer play than they gave to the last Administration.

Mr. ISAACS.—I think it is common history that before the Government had done one single public act, efforts were made to dislodge them. I regard the amendment as the culmination of such efforts, and therefore I feel bound to give them fair play in this case, and to let them deal with the question on its merits.

Mr. CONROY.—The Government have been perpetually saying that we will not challenge them.

Mr. WATSON.—The Opposition game to meet us openly even now are creeping in.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is the game which the last Administration got.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—No.

Mr. ISAACS.—I intend to vote for the amendment. I feel as strongly as any honorable member can that there is no coercion against any worker.

Mr. LONSDALE.—No coercion against unionists.

Mr. ISAACS.—No coercion against unionists.

Mr. LONSDALE.—That is what the honorable and learned member is getting.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member forgets that the power which we place in the Bill is a power which has been confided to the Judges in the States. No one has yet been brought against them the charge that they have done anything socialistic, or to the detriment of non-unionists. Surely, we are not afraid to confide to a Justice of the Court of Australia the power that has been confided to the Judges in the States. Can anybody believe that that high authority, clothed with all the power and full command, who will be under the sanction of no party, who will have no bias for any party, nor hope of benefit from one, will do anything socialistic when we frame an Arbitration Bill? We do not say that preference will be given, but merely that the Judges will have power to give preference under strict conditions, to prevent an evasion of the Act, and so that it may not be a dead-letter—who is there in the House who can say that we are doing anything to coerce non-unionists? We are doing nothing of the kind. But by whom does that said?

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—By the opponents of the Bill.

Mr. ISAACS.—Let me remind the House that, in the interests of the employed, we have framed clauses in this Bill to drive men into unions, in order that they may bring industrial disputes before the Court. All workers must join the union if they wish to bring their disputes before the tribunal. No dispute can be brought before the Court, except by a union. We were to propose to disband the tribunals and to provide that any number kers should be able to bring es before the Court, would members of the Opposition be provision? Of course, they ay would say that unionists ave the opportunity to submit e Court. When the Court is y grant preferences under cer- ences which commend them- ood sense—and the proposal nment is that the appli- he preference shall sub- resent not only in num- a competency, the whole ave my honorable friends ere is the coercion of non- ? If I were to speak for a not more fully express my ave done. Although I feel not be superior in numbers ion is taken, I trust that we satisfaction of knowing that the right course, and have to the country and to the

M (Darling Downs).—Mr.

Bridge-builder number two !
[Bill-wrecker number one !
ere a desire to prevent the ng into Committee for the his clause, but there has been tion on the part of some bers from the discussion of f the proposal of the and when an honorable s to discuss it a taunt him the moment he rises s is done by the members of claim to give fair play to at in this matter the Govern- receiving fair play from the d particularly from those esirous of having the prin- ulsory arbitration placed on k of the Commonwealth. nister has treated the House with a degree of fairness r been surpassed in this Par- position he has taken up in Bill is that there are certain hich are vital, and other ch may be modified. One ovisions is that which gives nionists. But the honorable allowed modifications which hinted at during the second-
The leader of the Opposi- ed himself as a firm believer in compulsory arbitration. He is not going to his constituency as an opponent of that principle. He does not believe in voluntary submission to a self-constituted board. He stands before the public of Australia as a believer in the principle of compulsory arbitration. He is also pledged to a coalition with the party led by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, who is also a supporter of compulsory arbitration. Therefore, should we go to the country, there will be no misunderstanding as to the issue. It will be not whether there shall or shall not be compulsory arbitration, but whether there shall or shall not be fair discussion. That is the sole issue now. It is not a question of preference or no preference to unionists. The House has affirmed the principle of preference to unionists, and the question is now whether a small modification shall be made, and whether we shall have in the Bill a proviso which is workable or a proviso which is not workable. What position has the Prime Minister taken up in respect to the clause? The Bill was first introduced by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, as Attorney-General in the Barton Govern- ment, and on each occasion on which the Bill has been before the House it has embodied the principle of preference to union- ists, unmodified, and in exactly the same terms that are adopted in the New South Wales, Western Australian, and New Zea- land Acts.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is no provi- sion for preference in the Western Aus- tralian Act.

Mr. GROOM.—Perhaps the terms are not the same, but the effect is the same.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Court has re- fused to grant preference.

Mr. GROOM.—Yes; the Court, in the exercise of its discretion, has refused to grant preference, but it has the power to give it all the same. The right honorable member has all along supported the prin- ciple of the Bill, and I respect him for it. He has always been a liberal man, and he is not in his right place among the Conser- vatives.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I never intended to give preference to unionists.

Mr. GROOM.—I am sorry to hear it. There is no doubt that the clause, as in- troduced by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, contained pro- vision for preference without any modi- fication whatever, and, further, the honorable and learned member recommended the Bill to the House on two occasions. It is also well known that the right honorable member for East Sydney supported the Bill, and never asked for any modification of the preference clause. The measure was not attacked by any responsible member of the Opposition on the ground that it contained provision for preference to unionists; but when the Bill was considered in detail, after the defeat of the Deakin Ministry, honorable members attacked the principle. A great many of those who opposed it desired simply to knock out the Bill, whilst others, like the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, who throughout has been a conscientious and consistent believer in the Bill, honestly desired some modification. I do not for one moment question the motives of my honorable friend, because I know he is still a firm believer in the Bill.

Mr. WATSON.—He is not a believer in his own Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am not a believer in the Bill of the present Ministry.

Mr. WATSON.—Nor in the Bill as first introduced, either.

Mr. GROOM.—When the Bill was discussed in Committee, the Prime Minister showed that he was prepared to accept certain amendments. He agreed to a proviso that before any preference was granted notice must be given to all those engaged in the industry affected, so that any persons interested might appear before the Arbitration Court, and raise objections. That was absolutely a new provision that was not to be found in any existing Statute, and yet the Prime Minister was prepared to accept it. Again, it was urged that men might be forced to join unions with objects repugnant to them, and the Prime Minister expressed himself as willing to accept an amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, to enable the Court to suspend its award in cases where it had directed that preference should be given, and review the rules of the unions concerned. At the instance of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, a provision was made that if any rules of an organization proved to be oppressive or obnoxious, the person aggrieved could make application to have them cancelled. That was the third modification accepted by the Prime Minister. It was urged by honorable members that some of the unions were political organizations, and that men might be compelled to join those bodies against their inclinations. Again, the Prime Minister was prepared to meet the objection in a fair and reasonable way. He accepted an amendment to the effect that, before preference could be granted, the Court must be satisfied that the rules of the applicant union were of a non-political character. I contend that he has treated the Committee with the utmost fairness. Even at this moment, he says, "I am willing to go a step further stage, and to provide that before any preference can be given, the Court shall be satisfied that the organization applies for it substantially represents the majority of the persons affected, both as to number and competency." Let us compare the state of the clause as introduced by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat and the provision as it now stands with modifications agreed to by the Prime Minister. It contains no less than six conditions and all that the Prime Minister asks is that at least the House shall do him the courtesy of considering the justice of his proposal.

Mr. KELLY.—What is the proposal?

Mr. GROOM.—The honorable member must know it.

Mr. KELLY.—Yes; but what does "substantially represents" mean?

Mr. ISAACS.—That is a matter to be considered in Committee.

Mr. GROOM.—If it is only a question as to the particular words to be employed, let us consider the clause in Committee, and adopt the right phraseology. I am sure that the Prime Minister will take up too rigid an attitude with regard to that. If other words would have the same effect as those which he proposes, they could be substituted. I think that the Prime Minister has treated the Committee with every courtesy and respect, and that he is perfectly justified in asking that honorable members shall have an opportunity to consider a proviso which was inserted as a result of a snatch vote, and without any previous consideration.

Mr. MCCAY.—That is not correct.

Mr. GROOM.—The amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Corinella is nothing more nor less than subterfuge. It is a want of confidence in motion in disguise, and is being supported by honorable members who are not prepared to attack the Government upon the weakness of their administration. I am not appearing here as a defender of the Government, but I claim that every honorable member should receive fair play, a fair opportunity to consider. The Opposition have taken on that those honorable members have not already expressed their will not have an opportunity to commit, and shall not be consider the rival proposals, any other amendments. They are applying the closure. They are in a majority, and they are going to use power for the purpose of the Bill. There is a desire on the part of the honorable members, whose antagonistic to the feelings of the majority of the electors, to take possession of the Treasury benches; and, under the cover of the present majority, are carrying with them men who sympathize either with their methods or with their methods. I feel on an occasion upon which we are expressing our opinions, we are entitled to know the truth. We are actuating honorable members against the Government. We are attacking the Government by a motion of this description. The rival proposals were put forward, and would be found that the proposed Bill would not compare with the one suggested by the Prime Minister. Even if the clause were passed in its present form, there would not be any objection for throwing the Bill on one side. It would simply make good the principle which has been in the States Acts, under which the Government is exercising a reasonable discretion. It does not give mere arbitrary power in each case require that evidence be given which would justify granting a preference. They are not intelligible principles. It is not grant a preference unknown that the organization substantially represents those industries affected. Judge Edmonds' judgment in the New South Wales case, in one case refused preference, and found that the union did not get the greater number of orders in the trade. I have seen the decisions of the New South Wales Court, and I find that the Prime Minister acts on the same principle. The Prime Minister says that the law has been in operation for years, and that the Judges have acted on definite principles which he is prepared to embody in the Bill in black and white.

Mr. WATSON.—We already have a practice established.

Mr. GROOM.—Yes, and we know that the Judges will be prepared to follow the precedents already laid down. There has been a great deal of press criticism with regard to the granting of preference, and Judge Cohen has directed attention to it, and has stated that persons who were affected by the awards should have come to the Court and represented their case before the award was given, instead of complaining afterwards.

Mr. WATSON.—He has also stated that if there is any complaint it should now be made to the Court.

Mr. GROOM.—Exactly. The Court can always vary its award, and the Prime Minister has anticipated many objections by accepting a provision under which notice must be given to the persons likely to be affected by an award, so that they may have an opportunity of representing their case before preference is granted. Therefore, every safeguard is being provided. We should make it perfectly clear that in this Bill the granting of preference is to be purely discretionary. Several articles have appeared in the newspapers, and several speeches have been made at banquets and elsewhere, from which it would appear that preference to unionists is to be made compulsory. That is an absolute misrepresentation. I should not like to see preference unduly given or granted without discrimination.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable and learned member said that he would vote for absolute preference. Why has he not the courage of his opinions?

Mr. McDONALD.—The honorable and learned member for Werriwa has not the courage of his opinions. He sits like a dumb dog.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! Interjections are disorderly, but conversations across the chamber are grossly disorderly, and I must ask honorable members not to further offend against the rules of the House.

Mr. McDONALD.—I apologize, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GROOM.—I was pointing out that the granting of preferences was to be purely optional, and that the Court would not act until a full investigation had been made. The discretion to grant preferences is to be given to a Judge who is to be selected on account of his integrity, ability, and learning, and also because of the confidence which he will command from all classes of the community. Further than that, we shall know that he cannot be removed from his high office unless for some proved misconduct. Therefore, the discretion will be exercised by a reliable and responsible person, to whom we may fairly look for fair and impartial decisions. Some of the greatest strikes have arisen owing to unionists being called upon to work with non-unionists, and some honorable members desire to take away from the Court the means of disposing of one of the most fruitful sources of trouble. It is desirable that we should proceed to a division as soon as possible, and also that the attitude of honorable members upon a principle which has been approved by the whole of the constituencies of the Commonwealth should be fully understood. Our constituencies sent us here to pass an Act dealing with compulsory arbitration. That measure has been before us upon two occasions, and, with the exception of one amendment, it has been fully discussed. But at this stage honorable members who desire to do what is fair and just are blocked by an intrigue to displace the Ministry. I shall not lend myself to such a proceeding, and, therefore, I shall vote for the recommitment of the clause.

Motion (by Mr. McDONALD) proposed—

That the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—I should like to know when the Government propose to conclude this discussion. The Opposition have no desire to avoid fair debate. On the contrary, we wish to do everything to facilitate discussion.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The Opposition have a peculiar method of showing it.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—There has been no attempt on the part of the Opposition to prevent full discussion. I understand that the Prime Minister desires to bring the debate to a conclusion, and, under the circumstances, I think that my question is a fair one.

Mr. MAUGER (Melbourne Ports).—I sincerely hope that the Prime Minister will not consent to curtail this debate in any way. A number of honorable members upon this side of the House are desirous of speaking, and the question involved is too important to be rushed.

Mr. WATSON (Bland—Treasurer).—The Government have no desire to prolong the debate unduly. It is a fact that the evening the right honorable member for East Sydney made a most insulting insinuation in this connexion, and one which resents. At the same time, the Government would not be justified upon an occasion of this sort in attempting to close the mouths of honorable members sitting behind them.

Mr. CONROY.—It is just a little too early to adjourn.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not think so. I have to reassemble at half-past ten o'clock to-morrow morning, and I do not suppose that all honorable members possess the pliancy of the honorable and learned member.

Mr. POYNTON.—It is quite refreshing to see all the members of the Opposition present.

Mr. WATSON.—I admit that that is rather unusual; but I suppose they think that the end justifies the means. The Government feel that it is their duty to facilitate the delivery of any remarks which their supporters may desire to make. The present is an important occasion, and I do think that honorable members opposite take the slightest exception to a reasonable statement of the views of Ministerial supporters upon this subject. The procedure which has been adopted on the present occasion very considerably limits the scope of the debate, so that honorable members do not make very long speeches. For that reason we need not fear that the discussion be unduly prolonged.

Mr. KELLY.—Will the Prime Minister promise to close the debate to-morrow?

Mr. WATSON.—I shall not attempt to close it before all those honorable members who desire to speak have had an opportunity of addressing themselves to this question. I have asked Government supporters to curtail their remarks as far as possibly can, with a view to bringing the debate to a close as early as possible.

Mr. KELLY (Wentworth).—I can assure the Prime Minister that I have no desire to add to the present embarrassments of the Government in any way. I merely wish to draw attention to the fact that when we were discussing the preference clause the Committee the honorable and learned member for Corio asked for an adjournment of the debate some time after 11 p.m. The Prime Minister thereupon replied—

We have been dealing with this clause for the past three days. That cannot be called a

... The principle underlying the discussed on the second reading upon other occasions, so that it is much to ask for a division to-er, I am prepared to adjourn upon ing that there will be a division out taking into consideration speakers, the Government sup-occupied 280 minutes, and members only 78 minutes.

NALD.—Why will not the Op-k?

LY.—It seems to me that, judg-speeches of Government sup-quite unnecessary for mem-position to say anything upon

I only rose to point out me Minister's present attitude ly discounted by the attitude Committee on this same clause numbers lay with him, and not

O (East Sydney).—I regret bsent from the chamber when ent of the debate was moved.
that there can be no possible such a motion. Every honor-has a perfect right to an ad-enable him to speak on this fully as he may desire. Of adjournment will be till tomorrow?

ON.—Certainly.

O.—In the heat of debate we observations that would be said, but I wish to say at once not, for a moment, seriously Government as has been sup-

ABLE MEMBER.—But the right member did.

O.—And I regret it. I sup-n I may be allowed to express etimes much smaller men than not humble themselves to do

ER.—Will the right honorable what he meant?

O.—When I am endeavouring my honorable friend may just make such observations. I can either way—I can give him e pleases. It is a perfectly proposal to adjourn the debate, not offer the slightest objection
e. That is all. I hope that ive.

AKER—

R.—I understood the right hon-er desired to make an explanation and withdraw certain statements. This afternoon he made the statement that the Government were endeavouring to remain in office a day or two longer, thereby insinuating that Ministers were guilty of cupidity. Such a suggestion is beneath the dignity of the right honorable member.

Mr. REID.—Surely there may be some other motive for such a desire than that of cupidity.

Several honorable members interject-ing—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. I shall have to name honorable members who distinctly and repeatedly disobey the Chair.

Motion agreed to; debate adjourned.

POSTPONEMENT OF BUSINESS.

Motion (by Mr. WATSON) agreed to—

That Orders of the Day, general business, be postponed as follows:—

Order of the Day No. 1, till the 25th August.

Order of the Day No. 2, till the 8th September.

House adjourned at 10.52 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Friday, 12 August, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 10.30 a.m., and read prayers.

CONCILIATION AND ARBITRATION BILL.

Debate resumed from 11th August (vide page 4197), on motion by Mr. WATSON—

That the Bill be now recommitted to a Committee of the whole House for the reconsideration of clauses 4, 37, 38, 39, 46, 48, 52, 67, 68, and 90 and schedule B and the consideration of proposed new clauses 52A and 95A—

Upon which Mr. MCCAY had moved by way of amendment—

That clause 48 be omitted from the clauses proposed to be recommitted.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON (Barker).—There is no reason why I should detain the House at any length by my contribution to this debate; but I feel that it is desirable that I should avail myself of the opportunity which now presents itself for explaining my position. That position, I might say, I stated to a very prominent member of the Opposition more than a week ago. I told him that I could not vote against the proposed recommitment of clause 48. I was paired, as honorable members know, in favour of the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella.

Mr. FISHER.—How did the honorable member get to know that the Opposition were going to do this?

Mr. WATSON.—Yes. That is a very interesting question.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—At any rate, I did know it. I am now prepared to re-affirm the vote which I gave when clause 48 was under consideration in Committee. I cannot, however, vote with the honorable and learned member against the recommitment of the Bill for the reconsideration of the clause, because I feel that to do so would be unfair. I admit that the action which has been taken by the Opposition is good party tactics; but I think that the Government are entitled to more consideration, and, personally, I shall do what I can to extend that consideration to them. There was nothing dishonorable in the way in which they obtained possession of the Treasury benches. Indeed, their action in the matter was distinctly honorable, and since they have occupied those benches they have, I think, done credit, not only to the party of which all except the Attorney-General are members, but to the Commonwealth as well. Although I am prepared to vote against the Government on this clause in Committee, I cannot give a vote against the recommitment of the Bill for the reconsideration of the clause, because I feel that to do so would be to act contrary to my instincts of fair play.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I shall not detain the House very long, because I understand that it is desired to finish the debate to-day; but if, as one of the steerage members of the Chamber, I may be permitted to make a few remarks on the question at issue, without being accused of speaking merely to give the Government an extra day's pay—an imputation which has been made by some honorable members opposite—I desire to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That was not stated.

Mr. SPENCE.—They judge us by their own standard of action.

Mr. McDONALD.—It was stated by the supposed leader of the Opposition.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The honorable member knows that there is not a member here who thinks it.

Mr. McDONALD.—The right honorable member for East Sydney stated and he apologized last night for having done so.

Mr. REID.—Does the honorable member expect me to make another apology? That is most ungenerous.

Mr. McDONALD.—All I said was that I hope that I shall not have the imputation cast against me if I make a few remarks, even though I may be in the steerage.

Mr. REID.—There is no reproach in being in the steerage.

Mr. McDONALD.—No; but it has been spoken of as a reproach.

Mr. REID.—It does not affect one's moral character.

Mr. McDONALD.—There is no need to review the whole history of this measure. The trend of industrial development in Australia, and in other parts of the world, in years past has caused industrial organizations to recognise that a better method of settling of disputes than the barbaric method of striking is to refer them to conciliation and arbitration; and to enable this to be done, the Bill which we have under consideration has been framed, having as its foundation the recognition of industrial organizations. It will be only organizations which can bring disputes before the proposed Arbitration Court, and coming to the particular clause about which so much has been said, it will be only to organizations that preference can be given. When the Act recognises the existing unions, it requires the formation of other, and, perhaps, bogus organizations, whatever preference may be given by the Court must be given to organizations. It is useless to say that the proviso which has been so much discussed during the past day or two was inserted in clause 48 only to kill the Bill. I do not think any intelligent man who knows the circumstances would deny that. A number of honorable members, indeed, have openly stated that they would give all the opposition they could to the measure in order to wreck it.

Mr. McCOLL.—Not many honorable members have said that.

Mr. McDONALD.—The honorable members I speak of are sufficiently numerous to enable the Opposition to carry the amendment now before the House. Without their assistance it could not be carried. I am, however, finding fault with those honorable members, nor do I find fault with the members of the Opposition who are now taking a certain course in order to defeat the the Government. They are their rights under the Standard I hope that when those on opposition, and are fighting sole members opposite, except taken to our tactics.

—They are not in our places

ALD.—No; but I am speaking when they will be here. If that the course which they are a better way to defeat the an to carry a direct vote of have a perfect right to take ne time, I admit that those red themselves to be opposed e justified in attempting to while I admire the conduct are openly opposed to the eelings are different with re- who profess to be in favour have voted to try to kill it. ent desire that preference to the labour organizations, organizations are giving up perful weapon against oppres- to strike. The organizations give up that weapon in order enefits which they think they om the judicial settlement of utes, and I think that in resurrender I speak of, they the fullest preference asked. It has been said that, if given to unionists, non-starve; and we have been ne man in seven is a unionist. it affect the non-unionists to e to unionists? Let us sup- are 700,000 workers in the , of whom only 100,000 are he Court gave preference to ould the other 600,000 be out of work? To say so ulous. I do not think any ber would make such a state- ue that the majority of the ustralia are not organized; ast becoming so.

N.—In New South Wales f of the members of the h unions exist are members

NALD.—Yes. Then, too, of the shearers, the seamen, labourers of Australia, are ne members of those three obtain preference under the ands now. But my point is the majority of the workers of Australia are not members of industrial organizations, the experience of the last ten years shows that they are drifting in that direction. It seems to me that the proviso was inserted in the clause in order to hinder this tendency to organize, because it is seen that the organizations are realizing that political as well as industrial action is necessary for their salvation. It is because it is realized that we are prepared to fight politically as well as industrially, that an attempt is being made to prevent the further growth and extension of our organizations. In spite, however, of all the opposition that is now being directed to the labour movement, it will gather strength. The political organization to which I belong has been subjected to the very strongest antagonism, and the most despicable methods have been adopted to break it down, but its growth has been stimulated by oppression. One of the results is that seven out of the nine representatives of Queensland in this House belong to the Labour Party. One other member—I refer to the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs—is a strong sympathizer with many of our aims and objects; and the only representative of Queensland who is opposed to the political aspirations of the Labour Party is the honorable member for Oxley. What was the result of the anti-Socialist laws passed in Germany under Bismarck? At the time that legislation was adopted, only 800,000 Socialist votes were recorded, but within ten years the number had increased to 4,000,000.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—What caused the increase?

Mr. McDONALD.—The oppressive laws directed against the Socialists.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Was it not the excessive military expenditure?

Mr. McDONALD.—No. I am surprised that the representatives of New South Wales should take up an attitude of opposition to the Bill. In Victoria, the Wages Boards control only a very small number of industries, whilst in Queensland, where manufacturing and other industries are being developed to a very large extent under the Tariff, there are no restrictions upon employers, who can sweat their workmen as much as they please. A similar condition of affairs obtains in South Australia and Tasmania. In New South Wales, the Arbitration Act compels employers and employés to submit their case to the Arbitration Court, and in most instances the former are required to pay much higher wages than those prevailing under the ordinary competitive system. The result is, that the New South Wales employers are being placed at a great disadvantage, as compared with manufacturers in other States who are subject to no restriction as to the terms and conditions of employment. Honorable members must know that the effect of clause 48, as it now stands, will be to render it impossible to give preference to unionists, and that it will practically kill the Bill. The object of some of those honorable members who are supporting the proviso introduced at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, is to weaken the unions; but if the Bill is passed in an ineffective form, the opposite result will be brought about. If this Parliament refuses to afford the workers the means of redress that would be given by a good arbitration law, they will organize their unions more strongly than ever, in order that they may be able to attain their ends by means of strikes. If honorable members believe that the methods of the strike are to be preferred to those that are provided for under the Bill, I can quite understand the position they take up, but, otherwise, it is difficult to conceive how they expect to accomplish any good purpose by rendering the Bill ineffective. If the Government are defeated on the present occasion, they will have no recourse but to resign. As I have previously stated, I do not blame honorable members opposite for trying to defeat the Government. They are quite within their rights, although I think they might have adopted fairer methods of accomplishing their object. I am very pleased that a Labour Government has been able to retain the Treasury benches for even such a short time as they have done, because I believe that their administration has reflected credit upon the labour movement, and has established the party in the public confidence. They have taken an honorable and straightforward course in connexion with this matter, and I hope that their successors will follow an equally commendable line of conduct.

Mr. RONALD (Southern Melbourne).—In dealing with this amendment, honorable members are required to keep rigidly to the question before the Chair, and I think we may congratulate ourselves upon the fact that you, sir, whilst allowing a certain amount of latitude, have displayed appropriate firmness in exacting respect for the rules of debate. Still, whilst forms of procedure and rules of debate have to be recognised, we have to pay some regard to the laws of reason, logic, and ethics, and we are entitled to examine the motives which underlie any action that may be taken upon an occasion of this kind. The proviso introduced at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella has for its avowed object not the amending of the Bill, but the defeating of the Bill. Members of the Opposition, after having voted for the second reading of the Bill, and having affirmed general principles, are now seeking to defeat the Bill by stealth and stratagem, to make it null and void, and the politest phrase I can use to describe their conduct is that of unadmitted political hypocrisy. Their conduct reminds me of the practice which used to be followed by ship-owners who had complete and useless ships. After insuring them, they sent them to sea with explosives in hold, so placed that when fired they would knock the bottom out of the ships and sink them. Some honorable members opposite have been guilty of unparalleled political hypocrisy. Whilst professing to approve of the principle of the Bill, they have assisted to eject the Deakin Minister, and put the present Government in their place, and they are now seeking to retain in the measure a provision which will make it utterly useless. Such conduct is anything but fair, straightforward, or manly, and I would remind honorable members not to further degenerate the traditions of Parliament. If honorable members are opposed to the principle of conciliation and arbitration, let them, as men, stand up and say so. Without a provision for preference to unionists the Bill would be utterly useless. Why should not preference be allowed? As an illustration of the position in which the Opposition would place all unionists, I would remind the House of a short beautiful story told of Beethoven. After he had composed his great cantata, became stone deaf. When the cantata was produced in Berlin, he acted as conductor, and as the vast audience came to cheer to the echo his magnificent production, some one turned him round to see the effect of his handiwork. But though he had composed the music, he never heard a note of it. And so with the trades unions. They have brought conciliation and arbitration within the sphere of practical politics, and now, forsooth, propose that they shall not the fruits of their years and denial. Trades unionists who about such a state of affairs become rational in politics, settle industrial disputes by men who have fought far have done, although we a, to achieve this result—are date in the fruit of centuries ought, and of travail towards prosperity.

WILLIS.—They have already uit of their toil.

LD.—They are to have the striking, and of endeavouring r their rights just as any other ection of the community might ISON.—And the privilege of rved.

LD.—The privilege of being n the process. The condition h the Opposition seek to bring confusion worse confounded. e be a party to such hypocrisy? posed to conciliation and arbi- say so in a straightforward have no hypocrisy in such us rather have that hon- y, and earnestness, which ged to be an ornament sphere of activity. If honor- opposite are opposed to the nciliation and arbitration, let e decency and honesty to against it. As a matter of , they voted for the second e Bill, and by so doing com- elves to an affirmation of the ple. That being so, what ld think of these honorable , giving with the one hand, back with the other? I was e the scriptural quotation in If a son ask bread of any of father will he give him a he ask a fish will he for a fish erpent" ? I said that the for bread, and it was pro- them a stone; that they asked d the Opposition would give nt. That has been repeated ain. The workers ask for he Opposition are offering but, instead of giving it to owing it at their heads.

WILLIS.—What are the non- ving?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—All that the unionists have gained for them.

Mr. RONALD.—The honorable member for Hindmarsh has anticipated my reply. The non-unionists would have participated in the good results that we hoped to secure from the passing of this measure. They have toiled not, neither have they spun for these things. They hope to reap where they have not sown, and to gather where they have not strawed. It is permissible that they should share with others the fruits of what has been the work of centuries; but it is not reasonable that they alone should reap and enjoy those fruits. It is right that at this stage, in speaking of trades unions, we should consider what they have done. Those who know anything of sociology, and especially those who have a knowledge of the causes responsible for that amelioration of the lot of man which has taken place during the last century, must admire the splendid work that has been done by trades unions. When one recalls the position of the workers in the earlier years of the nineteenth century, and remembers that the average working day was then one of fourteen hours, while to-day it is only one of nine or ten hours—when one remembers that something like 90 per cent. of the workers were toiling seven days in the week, and had no time to attend to the sacred duties of domestic life, no time to devote to culture, education, or recreation—what must he say of trades unionism? The workers of those days were as much galley slaves as if they had been chained to their oars or their work. I have lived in the great shipbuilding centres of the old world, and have witnessed the effect of piece-work and other abominations in cities where there was no limitation of working hours. I worked among these men on Saturday afternoons, and know that when Sunday came round they were prostrated by their labours, and unfit for anything but the mere animal repose that their systems demanded.

Mr. CONROY.—Clause 48.

Mr. RONALD.—This state of affairs has ceased because of unionism. The connexion between it and clause 48 is that those who wish to prevent the reconsideration of that clause are seeking to shut out unions from the benefits of the Bill, and would deny that they have been one of the biggest factors for the amelioration of the lot of man that the world has ever known. Greater than our churches, our Parliaments our press, or any other institution, has been the combination on the part of men to lighten the load of life, to brighten its conditions, and to make it worth living. Under the conditions which the Opposition would impose life would not be worth living.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Unionists now wish to spoil their career by seeking to stand on velvet.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member for Robertson would spoil their career by feeding them on stones.

Mr. RONALD.—That is so. A great naturalist has said that the very essence of existence is the struggle and the fight. That is true. If we could bring about such a state of affairs that there would be nothing for which to fight, the world would be a poor, monotonous place. The struggle and the fight are the very essence of life. But there are higher aspirations than even the betterment of the working classes for which we may fight, and we should endeavour to rise higher and higher; "Excelsior!" being our motto. If the Opposition have their way, however, unionists will be shut out from the benefits of this Bill. The cry on which we shall go to the country, and which will cause us to come back with an increase in our numbers, is that, if the Opposition have their way, those who have wrought, fought, and struggled for such a condition of affairs that there will be no strife, no war, and no animosity, are not to participate in the realization of the great industrial ideal which has been kept before them for at least a century. We can be no party to anything of that kind. I sincerely trust that honorable members of the Opposition will throw aside their rags of hypocrisy, and say straightforwardly that they do not like this measure, that they do not believe in Conciliation and Arbitration, and that they will adopt the direct and open course of voting against the principle rather than the subtle devious methods to which they are now resorting—giving with one hand and taking back with the other.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—We are seeking to amend the Bill.

Mr. POYNTON.—On the contrary, the Opposition refuse to permit it to be amended.

Mr. RONALD.—We are told that the Opposition wish to preserve the amendment which has been made. We have to remember, however, that a Bill is only a means to an end. The Bill is not in itself the end. It may be possible to improve the measure, but will it be the better for the amendment which has been carried on the motion of the honorable and learned member Corinella? Will it be followed by better fruits? Will it, in fact, be of any service whatever?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—It will give birth instead of a stone to the non-unionists.

Mr. RONALD.—The honorable member will surely allow that the working-men know what is bread, and what is a stone. Surely he would not dictate to them the difference between the two. What might be a stone from the honorable member's point of view would be bread from the point of view of the workers, and vice versa. The workers are the best judges of that which is for their good.

Mr. FRAZER.—They ought to be proud to have as their champion the honorable member for Robertson.

Mr. RONALD.—Quite so. The people know what is best for themselves. In matters of life and death, we appeal to the common sense of men. The late William Ewart Gladstone, who was one of the greatest students of mankind the world has seen and a better judge of human nature than any other man of whom I have heard or with whom I have come in contact, has shown down the rule that a true verdict on a question of fact or policy is more likely to be obtained from among the masses than from among the classes. He pointed out that as we ascend in the social scale, we generally find a greater percentage of mistakes, and that that fact is recognized in our jury system. We do not choose specialists—from the classes to deal with a matter of life or death; we select juries from the masses. In such cases ordinary common-sense men are availed of, because it is from such men rather than from those among the classes that it is possible to obtain a verdict on matters involving the exercise of common sense. That principle applies to the matter now under consideration. The workers know what they require. They desire Conciliation and Arbitration, and know that union is absolutely indispensable, not only to the passing of this measure, but to enable it to work satisfactorily. Those who are averse to granting preference to unionists also know very well what object they have in view in opposing the Government proposal. They know that this Bill would be rendered nugatory if the clause be passed which it stands. Preference to unionists is er that men may despair of union. If the object of the w before the House were to enable amendment of the Bill ally entertain it. We are ex- out to conserve the rights of destruction of unionism would ew method of reform. If ave rights, and we do not y have, have not unionists The right of the non- join a union. That is the ch every man possesses. He isolated; no man can live this world. Unionism is in the very essence of progress. to obtain any ideal, even if vative ideal, he has to form we are aware that even the arty have unions. We know ill be if we discourage the unions. So long as we en- ns, and encourage those heir trust in the law, so long n that they may organize and eason one with another for of their conditions, so long away the motive that has bred others who have despaired of reform by law. The day n Governments will thank God ight of entering into union, nise that unions have more or urpose in view. What we not to set ourselves against o endeavour to guide them. e members opposite wish to unions. They seek by stealth o compel the working men of se all faith in unions, to em- . They do not believe in go- ordinary progression. These y objections to the amend- onorable and learned member I think that the alternative e Government is all that preserve the admitted and un- s of non-unionists.

ns.—But it goes too far.

LD.—My only objection to es too far. No one will deny exhausted the resources of n our endeavours to meet our site. Now, I desire them to uestion—"Are they in favour ation of the principle of con- arbitration to industrial dis- I have said again and again, the general principle, the cosmothetic ideal of arbitration, is to substitute a rational legal and sane way of settling disputes for the old time-dishonoured method of deciding them by force and strife. We desire to bring about that better time depicted by the late poet laureate, when he sang—

That God, which ever lives and loves,
One God, one law, one element,
And one far-off divine event,
To which the whole creation moves.

That divine event is represented by the peace which will exist between man and man, class and class, and nation and nation, when strikes are spoken of as amongst the things of the past, and when in the archives of an ancient people, future generations will read of industrial animosity and strife, of which the world knows naught. This Bill marks the beginning of that era. Our gospel is one of peace, progress, and rational development. Those who believe in the old time-dishonoured method of settling industrial disputes by brute force are endeavouring to nullify our efforts to give to the people a machine which shall render strikes and industrial strife for ever impossible.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The principle of compulsory arbitration will continue to be upon its trial in New South Wales until 1906.

Mr. RONALD.—I am often assured that legislation of this character is yet upon its trial. Let me remind the House that it has been tried and not found wanting. My indictment against the alternative policy, is that it has been tried in all ages, and amongst all people, and has been found utterly wanting. The alternative must lie between the old laissez faire method of allowing things to right themselves, and the new method of interference by the Government for the good of the whole community. It is true that no good can be conferred upon the community without cost. Incidental evils accompany every reform. But we ought not to be discouraged upon that account. Undoubted hardships were imposed upon the aged workers of Victoria in connexion with the Factories Act in which the Legislature made provision for the payment of a minimum wage. No sane man would ever dream of looking for a perfect instrument which was framed by human hands. There is nothing perfect in this world. I freely admit that there are incidental evils connected with the adoption of legislation of this character. But I hold that the general trend of such legislation is for good. That fact has been established by experience. I trust that honorable members will discard the sham and hypocrisy of pretending to give this Bill a fair trial, whilst inserting in it a provision which will destroy its whole intention and purpose. Not long ago, I read a very fascinating story, and one which was quite worthy of the imagination of a French sensationalist. It related how a courtesan in Paris had sent to her rival a beautiful bouquet, in which a miasmatic poison was so concealed that, when the string of the bouquet was broken, the fumes escaped and killed the recipient. That is what the opponents of this measure seek to do. They pretend that they are giving to the workers of Australia a beautiful bouquet, in the shape of this Bill, knowing full well that the means of its own destruction are contained within it. The Government propose to induce non-members of unions—not to compel them—to join organizations where there will be a rational development of their aims and ideals. The very essence of unionism is progress, order, and good government. Honorable members are the living representatives of unionism in one phase or another. Without unionism, we should have no State. Without unionism, those engaged in industry would be merely a mob. The final intention and purpose of the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella is to destroy that in which the workman glories.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Organization of the workers is the basic principle of the Bill.

Mr. RONALD.—The basic principle of the Bill is the organization of the workers.

Mr. KENNEDY.—But not necessarily trades unions.

Mr. MAUGER.—Yes it is, necessarily.

Mr. RONALD.—That brings me to a point which otherwise I might have forgotten. No difficulty would be experienced in circumventing the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, if it were inserted in the Bill. Every Victorian representative knows that in connexion with the Trades Hall there is a political labour league and the trades unions proper. There is a distinction between the two organizations.

Mr. KENNEDY.—A distinction without a difference.

Mr. RONALD.—Exactly. Honorable members opposite wish us to perpetuate that hypocrisy by compelling men to draw a technical distinction between the political labour league and the trades union. If we were organized for the purposes of the Bill only—

Mr. KENNEDY.—The party to which the honorable member belongs refused to insert such a provision in the Bill.

Mr. RONALD.—We did not. We say that however reasonable the provision may appear from some points of view, it would constitute a piece of hypocrisy. We have no desire to perpetuate shams of this sort. Nevertheless, such a distinction could be drawn without seriously inconveniencing us. We wish the world to know that we are inspired by high, noble, and patriotic motives—that we wish to benefit all mankind. Whilst men declare in the programme the rules and objects of the organizations, and the methods by which they seek to attain their ends, those who disagree with them have nothing to fear. But when we drive them into secret political combinations there is danger. We do not wish to be obliged to carry on a dual organization merely for the satisfaction of those who believe that there ought to be a technical distinction between trades unions and organizations which are constituted solely for the purposes of this Bill. I sincerely hope that the proposal of the Government will appeal to the rational and moderate members of this House, to those who are prepared to confirm their consent, who after professing to be favourable to the principle of compulsory arbitration, and wishing the ship bon voyage, are not prepared to send her away with a dangerous explosive concealed on board for the purpose of wrecking her. Away with such contemptible, sinister methods in politics. Let the opponents of this Bill declare themselves. They had an opportunity of voting against it upon the motion for the second reading of the measure. Immediately after its general principle had been affirmed, honorable members opposite seek by a hypocritical and sinister amendment to destroy the benefits which would accrue from its operation. I trust that we shall never again descend to such base tactics in politics. I hope that in the future we shall be called upon to face those who are prepared to nail their colours to the mast—that we shall know them by their second-reading speeches. I trust that they are opposed to the principle which is contained in any measure, they will honestly declare themselves, but that they do not, by indirect methods, seek to im-

our corners a provision calculated to destroy its value to render it of less value upon which it is printed. The Ministry hangs upon the House in this matter. I take issue with the act of any man or woman who is at liberty to take no consideration. I cannot see how we can logically discuss any subject unless we are perfectly satisfied that the honorable members opposite are right against the Ministry particularly against the Bill itself. If we have arbitration legislation is the honorable members opposite are to delay it as long as possible; motive for their present action is contemptible, lacking, as it is, in honesty and courage. I can admire a toryism which declares boldly in favour of innovation; but I find no reason in my heart for a toryism which delays legislation of this kind by professions of friendship. Sympathy with those whose only motive under this Bill absolutely useless idea is to ridicule legislators of dealing with industrial questions profess to make concessions, without any serious good care to load the amendments which can lead to confusion and legal technical amendment shows the mark of a foot.

MR. WILLIS.—Does the honorable member refer to the Government pro-

MR. ALD.—I am not condemning the Government proposal.

MR. WILLIS.—I thought all the honorable member's remarks applied to the Government proposal, and I regarded them

MR. ALD.—I cannot supply the honorable member with ordinary intelligence has failed to do so. For the last forty minutes I have been speaking in condemnation of the amendment of the Bill by the honorable member for Corinella, and I thought the honorable member for Corinella does not seem to be aware of the fact that the cumbersome amendment of the Bill by the honorable member for Corinella has any final purpose in the Bill. I think it is to make work for the Government. I hope that simplicity and common sense will always characterize our legislation. Sir George Grey once said that the Government should be so drafted that he who runs might read; our whole aim should be simplicity and perspicuity. We ought to say on the face of a Bill what we mean, and nothing but what we do mean; there should be no provision which an ordinary artisan jurymen is not as well able as the most skilled and learned lawyer, to construe and apply. This amendment, which emanates from the legal profession, is evidently intended to give work to the lawyers by causing endless disputes and delays. If that should be the result of this legislation, workmen will despair of the law, and fall back on the old direct method of strikes. If we wish to make the measure useless—if we wish to disgust workingmen with legislative remedies for their grievances—there is no better way than by raising intricate, complex questions, such as are foreshadowed by the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. The Government, in their proposal, have hit upon the proper phrase when they provide that an organization shall "substantially represent the industry affected in point of number and competency of its members." I am perfectly well aware that lawyers will argue and make trouble—and exact fees—no matter how clear and plain a law may be. I can quite see that even the proposal of the Government may lead to days of expensive argument as to the meaning of "substantially represent." That, however, is part of the price we must pay for the evil of having lawyers, rather than the result of endeavouring to say exactly what we mean. The proposal of the Government satisfies all that is openly demanded by honorable members opposite, and, in every respect, is infinitely superior to that of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. At the same time, whether intentionally or not, the clause drafted by the Government places certain obligations on trades unions, by the use of the words "competency of its members." My great belief in trades unions in the past has been based on an idea that there should be some such obligation—that a trades union, properly organized and properly worked, ought to take care that those who become members have properly served their apprenticeship and learnt their trade. This is a highly important matter to which great prominence ought to be given. An onus is thrown upon trades unions of seeing that all the members are first-class tradesmen—competency as well as numerical strength ought to enter into consideration. The Government proposal is an amendment in the literal sense of the word, while the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Corinella does not amend, but seeks to end—to make null and void the whole measure. Under the circumstances one would have been glad to see a little political heroism. We should have liked to see honorable members opposite come boldly to the front and declare themselves against conciliation and arbitration root and branch.

Give me th' avowed, th' erect, the manly foe,
Bold I can meet, perhaps may turn his blow;
But, of all plagues, good Heaven, thy wrath can send,
Save, save, oh, save me from the candid friend!

Those who are now playing the candid friend seek to insert an amendment which will sap the very vitals of the measure; and my voice shall always be raised in protest against the hypocrisy of those who in public life have not the courage of their convictions. But the tide of public opinion is against honorable members opposite, while it is flowing with those who advocate this legislation. When the day comes, there will be heard a rising murmur like that of distant wind, gathering in volume and strength; and the oftener the people are appealed to, the greater, and the more sure and certain will be the sound, until it bursts upon us with a roar like that of the ocean on the beach. The people desire a rational method of settling industrial disputes; they are tired of the animosity and strife of social war. The people believe that the reign of peace is at hand; that this measure is an augury of a better age, when we shall regard industrial strife as a quaint relic of barbarism and fossilized torism. I trust that the well-worded proposal of the Government will receive the unbiased consideration of this House. I confidently leave the decision in the hands of all fair and unprejudiced members, whatever opinions they may entertain in regard to the existing Government. In taking my present attitude, I have no personal end to serve. I neither have, nor expect, pension, post, or pay, from one party or the other. My only desire is to pass a Bill that will redound to the credit of the Commonwealth Parliament. I hope that in ages yet to come, measures such as these will be a worthy monument of our patriotism. and that, on their being read by our descendants, it will be admitted that we did what we could to avoid unnatural and disastrous struggles between the class and the masses. I trust that it may be said that we brought into existence a moral political force which tended to the settlement of disputes for all time, so that Australia may justify its appellation of Australia Felix, the land where there is no industrial war and, God grant, no national war.

Mr. Ronald.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Is the honorable member opposed to war?

Mr. RONALD.—The honorable member ought to know my feelings on that subject. I am a servant of the Prince of Peace, and wear His garb; and, therefore, I am against all strife and war. I ask honorable members to bring their best powers to bear upon the consideration of the relative merits of the two proposals. I leave the question to be settled by men who are not tied to a party and soul to party—I leave it to those men to decide which proposal will commend itself to posterity as being in harmony with the tenor of the Bill. My only object is to have a measure which, characterized by political consistency and moral intent, will promote the greatest happiness of the greatest number of the citizens of the Commonwealth.

Mr. WATKINS (Newcastle).—I have not a word to say against honorable members who have openly declared themselves as opposed to compulsory arbitration, but I am bound to say that some honorable members, who have from time to time in the Chamber told us that they favoured trades unionism and compulsory arbitration, are now taking a course which is not honorable to themselves as politicians, and which is not fair to trades unionism in Australia.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—They are coming out in their true colours now.

Mr. WATKINS.—As the honorable member says, certain honorable members coming out now in their true colours, they will find that they have failed to convince the workmen of Australia that they any longer believe in the principle of compulsory arbitration.

Mr. WATSON.—It is just as well to let them placed.

Mr. WATKINS.—About two years ago I declared protectionists in this Chamber claimed that a preference, in many cases of forty per cent., should be given to Australian industries. They believed in a preference for the Australian producer against the foreign producer. They at that preference should be any qualification whatever. It to them to ask that those who ve in their protectionist policy consulted before that preference

When the same honorable now asked to accord a preference whose duty it is to toil in s which they have protected, they are prepared to cross the o follow the arch enemy of olitical faith in an endeavour e very Bill which grants the What does the amendment of e and learned member for an? It entirely destroys the ill as a compulsory measure. It ited by every honorable mem- legislation, to be successful, ased upon compulsion and sm. Of what use can we measure to be when we ren- ible for the Arbitration Court s awards? The amendment ver the whole of the Common- f an award is asked for involv- ce to unionists, it will be im- he Court to discover the opin- e people throughout Australia concerned in the matter until aised will have been forgotten. merely my opinion, but it is hich has been expressed by the er of the Opposition, the ole member for East Sydney. eference clause was last be- mmittee, and the Government first part of the amendment the honorable and learned Corinella, the right honorable East Sydney said that he was overnment had accepted the e because it was something e doubted whether it would e clause as it stood. I shail honorable gentleman no injus- I propose to quote exactly the d. At page 2689 of Hansard, he right honorable gentleman ghly in favour of the amendment, that the Government have accepted o point out that it would practi- effect of hampering the operation t the clause.

AM LYNE.—Who said that?

WATKINS.—The leader of the

ON.—Which one?

Mr. WATKINS.—The right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. WATSON.—I am not surprised at anything he says.

Mr. WATKINS.—The right honorable gentleman further said:

It will involve a harvest for our literary friends that I do not grudge, but the time which the Court would have to allow, in order to permit any one living at the Gulf of Carpentaria, or in the pearl fishery settlements, or other remote parts, to come in, would lead to so much delay that when it expired the whole matter would probably have been forgotten.

Yet to-day the right honorable gentleman leads a party who are prepared to prevent the Government from having a reconsideration of this amendment, which he admits will nullify the whole effect of the clause. Honorable members are prepared to refuse to the present Government the right to have the amendment reconsidered in order that it may be put into some practical shape. The right honorable member for East Sydney and his party are evidently determined to wreck the Bill. Has not the right honorable gentleman on many occasions, as Premier of New South Wales, found it necessary to recommit clauses which, in his opinion, required further consideration and remodelling; and was he ever refused an opportunity to reconsider a clause which he believed required amendment? To prevent a reconsideration of this amendment in the way proposed, is to prevent a discussion upon its merits or demerits. Apart from the honorable and learned member who moved the amendment, not one honorable member has attempted in any way to justify the position taken up in this regard. I repeat that if the preference clause, as amended, is adhered to it will render the Bill inoperative. Honorable members who have had any experience of the working of arbitration laws will know well that if a preference is not given to trades unionists, it will be possible, on the one hand, for any employer to supplant every man in his employ who has stood up for what he believes to be his rights in connexion with a particular dispute, by engaging other labour to take his place; and, on the other hand, it will permit of equal injustice being done to an employer. Let me say, in reply to those who have stated that the trade unionists of Australia do not represent the majority of the workers, that that is only because in many parts of the Commonwealth workmen have had no opportunity to organize. Although a great many are not absolutely within the ranks of trade unions, the very great majority of working people believe in the essence and principle of trade unionism. I am satisfied that not 10 per cent. of the working people of Australia would openly declare themselves against trades union principles. Honorable members who, from time to time, have admitted freely that trades unionism has done much, not only for those within its ranks, but for workmen generally over the civilized globe, are now prepared to deny to trades unionists a fair meed of justice under this Bill, though the workers are prepared to give up every weapon that they have hitherto exercised to secure their due. Where it is popular to do so, they say that they believe in trades unionism, but they are nevertheless prepared by legislation to do everything they can to prevent its success in ameliorating the conditions of the workers. We know what struggling there has been in the past for the rights of trades unionists. Men have had to secure those rights by the only weapon in their power. They have, by strikes from time to time, been successful in improving the condition of the masses; but because of the turmoil and distress necessarily occasioned by the use of the methods which they were forced to adopt to secure their just rights they have been told time and again that they should go to Parliament to obtain a legitimate means of ameliorating their condition through the laws of their country. Now, when they are following the advice given them, and are endeavouring to secure necessary reforms by legislation, they are blocked in every direction. They are blocked here, not in connexion with a measure which provides direct reform for the benefit of the working people in Australia, but a measure which goes only so far as to set up a Court of Justice to hear their claims, and to which they can appeal for just conditions. The Court, it is admitted, will be absolutely unbiased, and it is expected to put an end to industrial struggles. With regard, again, to the question of preference, honorable members are aware that it can only be given where organization has taken place, and men have registered their unions. How can we give preference to those who will not take the trouble to organize and combine? The object of the amendment against which I protest is simply to provide, when trades unionists, who have taxed themselves to defray the expenses connected with their organization, have secured an award, that, before any preference in employment can be given them, every man throughout Australia has not taken the trouble to organize, in order to secure an amelioration of his conditions, is to be allowed to say whether or not only union shall be employed. If honorable members insist upon carrying the Bill without any modification of the amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, we may as well throw under the table at once. The present position has, in my opinion, been reached because the Government, in order to meet views of the so-called friends of compulsory arbitration, have yielded too much. On three important principles in connexion with this legislation they have accepted amendments. They have yielded to the so-called friends of compulsory arbitration only to be stabbed in the back when the moment has arrived at which it is thought that that can be done effectively. I have had honorable members say that they believe in trades unionism so long as trades unionism can be carried on on the voluntary basis. In my experience of trades unionism, when it is a voluntary matter for a man to join a trades union, once he has become a member of it his voluntary action ceases absolutely, and he yields up his individuality for the benefit of his union. There is no voluntary principle in trades unionism in the full sense of the term. Let us consider the history of voluntary arbitration in these States. It has been tried time and time again, and has succeeded so long as awards given have suited the employer. It has failed when the award has been given in favour of the workers. Reviewing the legislative history of the subject we find the right honorable leader of the Opposition introduced legislation providing for voluntary arbitration in New South Wales, and that after three years' experience of this legislation, such was the ineffectiveness of the Arbitration Court provided, that the State Parliament absolutely refused to vote the money necessary to carry it on. In view of the results of past experience, we have come now to ask the Federal Parliament to give us a measure providing for compulsory arbitration. Men of common sense, we have come to the conclusion that this legislation cannot be successful with the enforcement of awards and preference to trades unionists. Just as no effect can be obtained from legislation unless it applies compulsion ce, to some section or to the nity, so it is with this legislative preference to a trades but hampering him in any way that which is fair and reason-present Ministry attempted to a measure which was fathered overnment, and I ask whether members opposite would have defeat that Government by they are now adopting. The uced by the late Government, in the proviso which was in-honorable and learned mem-ella; but if that proviso had while the measure was under of that Government, would members opposite have tried to from securing the recommittal are in order that the clause onsidered? I say that they

Mr. Watkins.

In my opinion, it would be honorable members to come pen, and to meet the Govern-clear vote of censure. Why challenge the Government upon or upon their administration?
that they are not able to do ly fault which can be found esent Administration is that elded too much to their opin order to secure the pas-particular measure, have ac-ment after amendment in the meet those whom they thought d to proceed some distance d of reform with them. Honor-opposite cannot challenge any istration by this Government, be taunted with having gained the Treasury benches by un-
The late Government announced would accept defeat upon out vote in regard to d they made no attempt able members to reconsider
I do not think that the vote een reversed if they had done certain that no attempt would ade to prevent a reconsideralabour Party would not have Government with an amends that now before the House.
n of honorable members oppo-They wish to destroy the defeat the application of the compulsory arbitration. Those r the amendment range them-who are opposed to the peaceful solution of industrial troubles by a judicial tribunal.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—I wish to say a few words on this question, and I trust that I shall not wander from clause 48 in doing so. The honorable and learned member for Corinella, whilst professing to be in favour of the Bill, has moved an amendment, the effect of which will be practically to kill it, and I believe that he has done so with that intention. If he alone were concerned, of course his action would not be important; but, as a matter of fact, his action was instigated by those supporters of the late Government, and the members of the Opposition generally, who wish to kill the Bill. I believe that all those who vote against the recommittal of the measure will be actuated by that motive.
When the late Prime Minister introduced the Bill a year or so ago, he made a statement as to his policy in regard to it, and that statement should stand good now. He said—

Any changes that I have proposed will be few, will be small, and will relate only to drafting.

But, notwithstanding that statement, a proviso was inserted in clause 48, on the motion of one of his followers, the only purpose of which was to kill the Bill. Is it not an astounding change of front for the honorable and learned member for Ballarat to be now attempting to choke discussion, by refusing to allow the Government to recommit the measure? In his present action he shows himself to be worse than the Chinese, who kill their superfluous female children, because he is killing the most virile progeny that he has yet fathered.
The right honorable member for East Sydney, when the Bill was introduced, said that he hoped that we would cheerfully pass it; but he also is now attempting to kill it.
Honorable members are, of course, used to the right honorable gentleman's ways, and are not surprised at anything he may do in this direction. The honorable member for Ballarat also promised to give fair play to the present Government; but he has not given them any more fair play than he has given to the Bill which he fathered. The proviso requires that applicants for preference must prove that they represent "a majority of those affected by the award who have interests in common with the applicants," while the Government wish to substitute for that provision an amendment requiring them to "substantially represent the industry affected in point of the numbers and competence of its members." The method of electing Members of Parliament may be referred to to illustrate the difference between the two propositions. If honorable members could take their seats in this chamber only when they had been elected by a majority of the whole of their constituents, in such case that requirement would be similar to the requirement of the proviso inserted in clause 48 by the honorable and learned member for Corinella; whereas the Government wish to provide that a majority of those who take sufficient interest in the subject to vote upon it shall decide the question. That is the present system of voting. If the Bill is to be effective, it must safeguard the liberties of those connected with the industrial organizations. The men who require protection are not those who are content to be trodden down, and who only squirm and sink lower, but those who have the manliness to fight for higher wages and better conditions. The unions are to be deprived of the weapon of striking which they now possess, and preference is therefore a necessary protection to them. Honorable members who are opposed to the granting of preference to unionists, show themselves in their true colours as those who are in favour of making the Bill a measure for the suppression of strikes only. While they wish to take from the unionists the power to strike, they still leave to the employers the power to lock out. If the proviso were left in the clause, an employer could always refuse to employ unionists who had acted against him. The honorable member for Lang has honestly said that his object is to kill the Bill altogether. We can give him credit for being a straight-out opponent of the measure; but other honorable members do not avow that that is their position. Unless preference is given to unionists, those who complain of the treatment they are receiving may be refused employment, and will have no redress.

Mr. MAUGER (Melbourne Ports).—It would be well for honorable members, before voting on the amendment before the House, to consider what is involved, and to recall to mind the policy underlying the measure as it was enunciated at Ballarat by the late Prime Minister. The principle which the proviso inserted by the honorable and learned member for Corinella would undermine was undoubtedly championed by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. In the minds of some honorable members there is an impression that what is desired is to invariably give preference to unionists. That is a wrong impression, which I hope will not be conveyed to the people of the country. What we wish to secure is, not the giving of preference to unionists in all cases, but the giving of power to the Court to grant preference to unionists when it considers desirable to do so. That is an important difference, and one which should be clearly defined. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat gave particular emphasis to the clause which is being discussed. He urged that in New Zealand the power to grant preference had been used by the Court with great advantage, and was one of the necessary machinery of the system. He urged that in New South Wales no results had followed, and that in New Zealand the Court had exercised its power wisely that the number of trades unionists had decreased instead of having increased under its régime. In view of these facts it is not remarkable that the honorable member and some of his prominent supporters should, at this juncture, not seek to undermine the principle of the clause, but endeavour to prevent honorable members from arriving at some means of framing a provision which would meet the wishes of the majority. If honorable members opposite sincerely desire that this measure should be effective, they should allow it to be recommitted.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Is not the honorable member satisfied with the amendment proposed by the Government?

Mr. MAUGER.—I am satisfied that it will be made clear to the country that the honorable members opposite wish to render it impossible to properly consider the matter. The honorable member for Robertson complains that the provision for preference is too exacting, too far-reaching, and too dangerous.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Hear, hear; so is.

Mr. MAUGER.—And yet we find a discrepancy with him the honorable member Dalley, who says he feels compelled to vote against the recommitment of the Bill, because it is so emasculated as to be rendered useless.

Mr. WILKS.—I said so three weeks ago.

Mr. MAUGER.—There is a very wide divergence between the views taken by of honorable members, and yet we find no voting on the same side in this matter. Mr. WILKS.—Not a single union will register under the Bill.

Mr. MAUGER.—I quite agree with the honorable member.

Mr. WILKS.—Then why vote for it?

Mr. MAUGER.—Because I do not wish to eject the present Government from office and to associate myself with those with whom I have no sympathy. The honorable member will be judged by the company which he keeps, and his position will be regarded as remarkably illogical one. There is something more than the recommitment of the Bill involved in the present attitude of the position.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—There is bread for the workers.

Mr. MAUGER.—May I ask who made the honorable members on the Government benches the champions of the workers?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The people.

Mr. MAUGER.—Did the people give the charge to honorable members opposite?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—We are in the majority.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member is now indulging in silly interjections, and I cannot afford to take any further notice of him.

Mr. WILKS.—This is a fight for preference on the Treasury benches.

Mr. MAUGER.—I am afraid it is. The majority of honorable members opposite is motivated by a desire to unseat the Government. The honorable member for Southern Devonshire said that he owed nothing to the Government, that they had given him nothing, and that he expected nothing from them. I can say the same thing. In some respects, particularly in connexion with the Free Trade question, the Government have disappointed me, but I do not intend to assist to get them from office, and put in their place a free-trade Government. So far as the policy with which I am particularly associated is concerned, I can gain nothing by voting for the proposal to recommit the Bill.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Would the honorable member alter his views if he could do anything?

Mr. MAUGER.—No, certainly not; but I have nothing in common with those honorable members who are now anxious to remove the Treasury benches. Not only would they not give me the natural corollary of legislation of this kind, namely, effective protection at the Custom House, but it is patent to every one that they are anxious to destroy the principle underlying the Bill, which is protection to the workers. It is the clear duty of honorable members, who are anxious to see a workable measure passed, to afford every opportunity for the framing of a clause which would prove effective. I rejoice to think that, whatever may be the result of the vote on this occasion, the Treasury benches have been occupied for three months by men who have risen from the ranks, and who have erected a milestone alongside the path of social evolution. Their administration has been as pure, their capacity as great, and their behaviour as gentlemanly as that of any other body of men occupying similar positions, and I have no hesitation in saying that the methods which are now being employed to displace them are unfair and unwarranted.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—If he wishes the clause to be made effective, why does not the honorable member induce the Government to accept the proviso of the honorable and learned member for Corinella?

Mr. MAUGER.—Why does not the honorable member consent to allow the Bill to go into Committee, so that a proposal may be framed which would be acceptable to both sides? Honorable members opposite evidently fear to allow the clause to be reconsidered. I am not an apologist for the mistakes of trades unions. I have been closely associated with them all my life, and I am now a member of a union. I know the aspirations of their members, and the great good that the unions have accomplished. While I am acquainted with their limitations, and the mistakes which they have made, I know, at the same time, that the highest principles ever enunciated have been associated with the greatest of those mistakes. Even with the dissemination of the principles of Christianity there may have been associated mistakes, as well as shams and humbugs, but that is no reason why we should disregard such principles. I recognise that the underlying principle of trades unions is industrial peace and progress, and therefore I do my best to encourage such organizations. I believe that the honorable and learned member for Corinella is perfectly sincere in this matter, but I am convinced that his proposal is impracticable, and that it will make the Bill a dead letter. I believe, further, that he is misrepresenting and misunderstanding the very men whom he is supposed to be championing. I have been associated with non-unionists, as well as with unionists, and I am sure that the honorable member for Dalley will agree with me that, whilst the unionists may, in some instances, be in the minority, the vast majority of the industrial workers are in sympathy with the trade unions, and support their aims. The attempt which is being made to champion the cause of the non-unionists is unwarranted and uncalled for. No demonstration has been made in support of the attitude now assumed by the Opposition. Have honorable members been called upon by any section of workers to oppose the preference clause? Do they know of any organization outside of the Employers' Union that has opposed it? I should like to know in what way they have received any mandate or instruction to oppose the principle.

Mr. CONROY.—The sacred principle of justice alone demands that no man should receive a preference over his fellows at the hands of Parliament.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—We had a mandate from the electors at the general election.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is not the case.

Mr. McLEAN.—I was returned as an opponent of the principle of preference to unionists.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member was not called upon to contest his seat.

Mr. McLEAN.—But I explained my views on this very principle.

Mr. MAUGER.—I grant that the honorable member has been consistent throughout, and that he is thoroughly sincere.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member knows that, although I was not opposed at the last election, I spoke a number of times in connexion with this Bill, and fully explained my views.

Mr. TUDOR.—When the honorable and learned member went to Bendigo to support the honorable and learned member for that constituency, he did not say that he would smash the unions.

Mr. McCAY.—I have not said it yet.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable and learned member is doing his best in that direction.

Mr. MAUGER.—A number of honorable members are posing as champions of the non-unionists, and it is remarkable that in many cases they should also be champions of the employers' unions, which are opposed to the principles of the Bill, lock, stock, and barrel. Associated with those who are now so anxious to preserve the rights of non-unionists, are the very men who are opposed to the Bill outright. It was just the same in connexion with the discussion which took place upon the shops and factories legislation in Victoria. I, the honorable member for Gippsland, know very well that the poor widow was trotted out, and that great concern was professed for the poorest of the working classes. I should like to know what honorable members who now assume the role of champions of the non-unionists have ever done to assist the working classes? "By their fruits shall ye know them."

Mr. CONROY.—Is it the policy of the Government to decree inequality by law?

Mr. MAUGER.—Have their voices been raised in the interests of the downtrodden trades unionists? No. Undoubtedly the main features of this measure is the principle of collective bargaining which can be applied only under a system of effective trades unionism. Unless this is recognised by giving the Court power apart from any such trammels as are imposed by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, to grant preference, the Bill will be destroyed, root and branch.

Mr. CONROY.—The honorable member claims that preference should be granted to unionists, and we say "No."

Mr. MAUGER.—I contend that preference should be given to the Court to grant preference.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Is not this higher Court than that which it is proposed to create?

Mr. MAUGER.—It may be; but it does not prove to be a wiser one. In connexion with the working of the Shops and Factories Act in Victoria, it has come to my knowledge that, in many instances, those who have been foremost in agitating for the establishment of the Wages Board, who have in some cases been members of such boards—have been discharged, because they dared to organize their fellow-workers.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—A very curious thing.

Mr. MAUGER.—Can the honorable member suggest any remedy for such a state of affairs, beyond giving the Court power to grant preference to unionists? That is really the position. Three men who represented the employés on a Wages Board relating to a certain industry, were discharged and were eventually compelled to beg bread for themselves and their families.

e result of the action they had taken to secure the creation of that board. Had there been a law in force in this State, to say to the employers, "Preference must be given to unionists," their position would have been different; they would have been rewarded instead of punished for their praiseworthy action. That is only one of many illustrations that might be given. Unless we give the Court power to protect the men who may be, and are the victims of unscrupulous employers, the result will be disastrous. I do not suggest that the practice to which I have referred is universal. The majority of the employers in Victoria are excellent men; it is the mere fact that a man is liable to be discharged for assisting in the formation of an organization to uplift his fellows which is sufficient to induce us to erect a barrier which will have power to direct that the play shall be conceded to all. I am convinced that the Government have given us to a very material extent. I invite the Opposition to compare the measure, as originally introduced by the honorable and named member for Ballarat, with the Bill of to-day.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The Bill, as it is, is better than it was.

Mr. MAUGER.—It may be, from the honorable member's point of view, and the very fact that he holds that opinion induces me to consider that it is worse. My honorable friend champions the cause of what he describes as "liberty"—liberty to sweat and to die and licence to be dictated by employers. Under the guise of championing the cause of non-unionists—the cause of the widow, the old, and the low worker—we have often heard such tales.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The poor and needy are represented in this House.

Mr. MAUGER.—The very fact that the honorable member considers that the Bill has been improved convinces me that it has been mutilated. If honorable members come to the Bill as originally introduced—if they glance at the clauses relating to trades unions, to the granting of preference to unionists, and to the powers of the Court—they will see at once that its beneficent provisions have been whittled away, line by line, so that even its author would scarcely know it.

Mr. WILKS.—Comparatively speaking, there is nothing left that is worth mentioning.

Mr. MAUGER.—Exactly. Notwithstanding the fact that various provisions to which objection was taken have been removed from the Bill—that unions will be compelled to throw open their doors to practically every one who can with the slightest reason claim admission; that their books will be open to inspection by the Court; that the Court will have an opportunity to ascertain for itself the kind of men who form them, and to take care before granting an application for preference that the majority of those engaged in the industry are in the organization concerned, or in touch with it—the Opposition still refuse to allow clause 48 to be recommitted even for the purpose of removing a difficulty.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—There is no difficulty. We had a majority on the last occasion, and have it still.

Mr. MAUGER.—The Opposition have a majority to secure the defeat of the Government. They are availing themselves of the present crisis to secure the advancement of their own particular theories. I am convinced that underlying this motion there is not only the defeat of the Government, but the parting of the ways, so far as many honorable members are concerned. I am sorry that it should be so. I regret very much that I shall have to part politically from men beside whom I have worked and fought for many years. But the division to be taken on this amendment undoubtedly means the parting of the ways. On the one side will be the men who are fighting for evolutionary, not revolutionary, progress, and who are determined that there shall be industrial as well as political emancipation. Political emancipation was only the commencement of a great movement of which industrial emancipation is the apex. Until absolute industrial emancipation has been secured, our political evolution and all our political privileges will be of no avail. On the one side we shall have the men who will fight in the interests of conservatism, and in the interests of laissez faire, under the guise of desiring to protect the widow and the old and slow worker, while, on the other side, will be those who are determined to conserve those interests which make for the social health and progress of the community, and to do their best for those who have sent them here to represent them.

Mr. BATCHELOR (Boothby—Minister of Home Affairs).—This debate has been marked by some very extraordinary features. The attitude taken up by the Opposition in refusing the Government the right to recommit a clause which they conceive to be so framed that it would not work in harmony with the objects of the Bill, is in itself remarkable; but I wish to direct attention not so much to that phase of the situation as to the curious fact that whilst this is undoubtedly a no-confidence motion, not one leading member of the Opposition has, so far, seen fit to take part in the debate. Where are the leaders of the Opposition? I am inclined to think that this is the first time in the history of Australian Parliaments that a leader of an Opposition has declined to address himself to what is avowedly a no-confidence motion. The leaders of the Opposition have scarcely dared to show themselves. Occasionally they have put in an appearance, but finding, apparently, the criticism of their actions too warm for their peace of mind, have immediately taken their departure. I do not think that this is altogether fair. We might reasonably have assumed that those who intended to secure the defeat of the Government—

Mr. BAMFORD.—Did the honorable gentleman expect anything better?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I certainly did.

Mr. BAMFORD.—The honorable gentleman is altogether too sanguine.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I at least expected that the treatment usually meted out to Governments would be extended to even a Labour Ministry. It seems, however, that we are to be submitted, not to ordinary, but to extraordinary treatment, which, in my opinion, and I am sure, in the opinion of the people, reflects but little credit on those who are engineering our overthrow. What is the object of this Bill? That is a consideration to which we may well devote a few moments' attention. Is it designed to benefit honorable members on this side of the House? Certainly not. It was brought forward with a view to put an end to strikes, not in the interests of unionists, but for the public good. If this Bill be not in the public interest it should have no place in our deliberations. If it be a measure not solely to benefit unionists—although it has been treated by the Opposition as if it were—if it be designed to prevent strikes, in the public interest, because it is recognised that industrial disputes involve tremendous loss to the whole community, should it not be worthy of our serious consideration? The Bill is not primarily framed in interests of unionists; as a matter of fact they will lose a great deal more than they will gain by submitting to the principle of compulsory conciliation and arbitration. During the debate on the Bill it was suggested that the Government and their supporters had failed while on the hustings to tell the unionists that this measure would probably work, in many cases, to their disadvantage. This assertion is incorrect. During the election campaign I announced from every public platform on which I spoke that the people imagined for one moment that compulsory conciliation and arbitration would invariably work for the benefit of unionists and the workers generally. This was a great mistake; I clearly told the workers that it would benefit them only members of the community.

Mr. WILKS.—The less the workers rely on it the better it will be for them.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Undoubtedly. The only benefit which trades unionists and other workers can hope to derive from the Bill is simply that which it will confer upon them as members of the community. It is desired that they should be peacefully employed in carrying on their industry, instead of employers and employées being troubled by them too frequently have been, at any length. When employers and employées are constantly fighting with each other, a very large section of the community produces no wealth. It is solely to increase the production of wealth that we are for a measure of this kind. We ask for this measure, not to improve the status of unionists, but solely in the interests of the public. Every member of the community, from the largest capitalist in the Commonwealth, to the humblest labourer, is concerned in the bringing about of a state of affairs in which, instead of having a large percentage living on the labour of others, we shall find all persons producing to the fullest extent of their power. On these grounds, and on these alone, can the Bill be defended. I have been a trades unionist ever since I served my apprenticeship to engineering, and as such I have always recognised that nearly all that has been gained by the workers has been the result of agitation and of strikes, and that for them to sacrifice the right to strike would be to part with a very great power. In order that trades unionists might order that they might not be without organization—it was at provision for preference to indispensable part of the Bill as essential to its proper at was the view adopted by the Bill, and the honorable member for Ballarat, who introduced it, recognised that of preference to unionists vital. After he had had an to carefully consider the ques- recess, extending over several after it had passed through the criticism associated with a on the honorable and learned moved the second reading of session, when, as the honor- for Brisbane has pointed out, that he merely proposed to ight verbal alterations in the still thought that preference to hout any qualification what- ally provided for in the Bill, and it must therefore be taken Government was in accord ciple. I do not mean to sug- ury individual member of the d to every detail of the Bill, airly assume that the Cabinet were favorable to the grant- rence without any qualifica- we are confronted by the fact s brought down by them on two vided for the undiluted appli- t principle. Up to the time sent Government took office unionists was recognised as art of the measure. There was from any quarter to whittle vision in any respect, but from which the present Administra- the reins of Government the yn process began. There was parently, on the part of the o damage the prestige of or- nd trades unions. And what on? Was it because trades among the Government sup- it was proposed that unions ipped for political purposes? o. At any rate, I am at a stand the move of the Oppo- ny other hypothesis.

s.—The Government accepted per of amendments.

CHELOR. — I admit that Government were naturally obtain from the House the best

Bill possible, in order that it might be of some service to the workers ; but I certainly do not think that in its present form the measure will be operative in the slightest degree. Upon this question my opinion has been sought by leading members of trade unions—by members of the organization with which I am associated, and by others—and I have advised them that unless a very substantial alteration is effected in the Bill before it becomes law, those organiza- tions ought not to register under it. I am convinced that they will not register under it. Have we not urged that honorable members ought not always to aim at an ideal of freedom? Why? Because we have recognised that it is incompatible with the working of a Bill of this character. We have taken this course, not in the interests of unionists, but in the interests of the public, and to prevent the Bill from being whittled down to such an extent as to render it inoperative. In its present form no trade union will register under its provisions, notwithstanding that we have been engaged in discussing it for some months. Why have the vital principles of the Bill been thus whittled away? Simply to spite the present Government. There is no other explanation of the extra- ordinary action of honorable members op- posite.

Mr. McCAY.—Is it not a fact that, with the exception of this amendment, every other alteration effected in the Bill has been accepted by the Government?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—As I have previously stated, the Government desired to obtain from this House the most effective measure possible. We could not make every amendment vital to our existence. We had to accept the best Bill that we could secure. But naturally there is a limit to compromise—a point at which we recognise it is useless to further proceed with the measure. To do so would be a perfect farce. I am not prepared to tell the unionists of South Australia that I assisted to pass a worthless Bill. I do not wish to gain kudos for having passed a measure relating to arbitration if it is of no real value. Having pleaded with unionists to subscribe to legis- lation of this character, having induced them to sacrifice their right to strike, can I tell them that we have enacted a law which will be ineffective? The honorable and learned member for Corinella has twitted the Government with having accepted other amendments.

Mr. McCAY.—I did not twit the Government with having done so.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable and learned member certainly did.

Mr. McCAY.—I did not intend to twit them.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We fought against any whittling away of the vital provisions of this Bill. But modification after modification has been proposed merely for the purpose of creating an appetite for more.

Mr. WILKS.—The proposal of the Government would only feed that appetite.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—At any rate that proposal possesses the virtue of being a workable one, and it would achieve the result which the honorable and learned member for Corinella desires.

Mr. WILKS.—I am as opposed to his amendment as is the Minister himself.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I do not think that our proposal is a necessary one, but, nevertheless, it is workable. A proposal which requires that any union before being granted a preference shall satisfy the Court that it substantially represents the workers engaged in the particular industry affected, is not one which I can characterize as highly objectionable, or as likely to impair the efficient working of the measure.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—It is a very astute proposal.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—If it be astute, it is certainly straightforward. The honorable member is at liberty to rise in his place, if he dares, and to explain in what way it is astute and not straightforward. The terms employed in it are those which are generally adopted by Courts charged with the administration of kindred legislation. In making their awards they have frequently required that a majority of the employes interested in any particular industry must be represented before any preference is granted to unionists. I do not intend to labour this question. The refusal of honorable members opposite to allow the Bill to be recommitted—an act which is unparalleled in party warfare—is thoroughly consonant with the treatment which this Government have received from the very moment of their advent to power. I care nothing for Ministerial office—I do not think that I can be accused of having exhibited any desire to grasp it.

Mr. McDONALD.—The leader of the Opposition accused the Government last night of hanging on to office.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I know that distasteful remarks which were made upon that occasion were not meant. It is rather a pity, I think, that the first Labour Ministry in the Commonwealth should have been denied that fair treatment which is ordinarily accorded to Governments. It is regrettable, because of the appreciation of the public of that spirit of fair play which usually distinguishes Britishers. Not a single accusation has been urged against the administration of the Government, against the policy which we have put forward. I did not expect that we should be defeated by a union of the forces of honorable members who are opposed to this legislation, and of that section of the House which opposes the Government merely for party purposes. I did not anticipate that a procedure would be adopted which would have the effect of preventing the Ministry and their supporters from fully and fairly expressing their opinions upon other matters. There has been a conspiracy of silence on the part of honorable members opposite. One or two of them have been anxious to address the House, but they have been held down by other honorable members.

Mr. WILKS.—The Minister cannot apologize for that remark to all.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I admit that the honorable member is an exception. I do not complain of the treatment which has been meted out to the Government. Generally speaking, he has been very fair.

Mr. McDONALD.—He has not sunk into a fiscal issue.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I do not know whether he has done so, or not. It is a singular circumstance that the widest differences of opinion between honorable members of this House have been bridged over with the sole object of displacing the present Ministry at all costs. Even the honorable member for North Sydney must admit that the present Ministry is a cohesive body with one policy. We do not possess as many policies upon every conceivable subject under the sun. There are members in this House. The combination of honorable members opposite is a peculiar one, which we may allow the public to appraise at its true value. In conclusion, I am satisfied that if the Government are defeated upon the amendment submitted, its members have not brought discredit upon the position which they have held. They vacate office.

without one accusation of administrative failure having been levelled against them. They will relinquish the reins of Government—if they do so—owing to the action of a unique political combination, and simply because they happen to be members of the Labour Party. Under no other conceivable circumstances could such a remarkable union of forces have been effected.

Mr. HUGHES (West Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—The amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Corinella on the proposal of the Government to recommit certain clauses has a peculiar merit of being, so far as I know, and, apparently, so far as can be gathered from honorable members, unique in the history of parliamentary government—unique, at any rate, in this country and in Great Britain. Under certain circumstances very little could be urged against its action, but the present circumstances are peculiar. The Government, as the honorable and learned member, and every other honorable member in the House knows very well, have declared that they regard the amendment as vital, not to the measure and to their own existence as an administration. The action of the honorable and learned member, therefore, amounts to an attempt to prevent the Government, whose administration, whose policy, and whose very existence is challenged, from saying one word in their own defence. The honorable and learned member, in advancing some reasons why this clause 48 should not be committed, spoke in comparatively brief terms. When we recall the other occasions on which the House and the Committee have been privileged to hear the honorable and learned member, we can only wonder why he should have been so brief at the present juncture. Then, under circumstances of less importance, he has entertained us at great length. There is about big battalions a virtue which entails even the oratorical efforts of the honorable and learned member. Why, indeed, should the honorable and learned member speak longer than was necessary to declare, in so many set terms, the intentions of that body whose mouth-piece for the time being is, especially since he had to set an example which has been admirably followed by the gentlemen who now sit alongside him, and who have wrapped their sentiments and their ideas in sepulchral silence? The House is asked to decline to recommit this clause. What is this measure? What is its purport? I think we are entitled to ask ourselves so much. Obviously, it is a Bill to prevent industrial disputes, and it can only take effect provided industrial unions give their allegiance to the main principles of it. The honorable and learned member who has moved this amendment knows that fact well. He and those who support him have, during the passage of this Bill through Committee—a passage of almost unparalleled vicissitude—moved a number of amendments, ostensibly for the good of the measure. Of these, some stand in the Bill to-day; others, happily, have been relegated to the waste paper basket. All alike, however, afford irrefragable evidence of the insincerity of the honorable and learned member and those who supported him. In his present amendment he proposes preventing the Government from having that opportunity which the honorable and learned member, in common with a number of others, solicited, when certain other clauses of the Bill were decided against them, to recommit certain clauses for the purpose of enabling honorable members to once more consider them. The honorable and learned member is denying to the Government that very right which he, and those who sit with him, asked on so very many occasions in reference to numerous clauses. The position, perhaps, is not quite clear to citizens outside the chamber, though it is abundantly clear to every man inside. It is perfectly useless for any man here to attempt to deceive himself; nor ought it to be possible for him to deceive others as to the true position. Those honorable members who vote against the proposed recommitment will stand condemned for having taken a course of action which does effectually prevent the Government from defending itself, and which does most effectually prevent honorable members from setting forth categorically the objections they have to the present Administration—from setting forth in clear, round terms, so that the whole country may know, and if necessary approve, or disapprove, the reasons why they wish to oust the present Administration. The leader of the Opposition, or the leader of one wing of the Opposition, in the beginning of the present régime, treated us to a number of reasons why the present Government should not be allowed to live a day without challenge. Now, however, we have a challenge put forward in an indirect and underhand way, and upon this indirect, circuitous, and contemptible proposal, the right honorable gentleman has not taken the opportunity to say one word in condemnation of an Administration which he has continuously denounced, because of its lack of capacity and experience, its policy, its programme, and because, in his opinion, it stands for minority government. The right honorable gentleman condemned the Government, in short, on the ground that it imperils representative and good government. Yet, he does not now dare to say one word. The right honorable member is joined on this occasion by his colleague, who was lately his opponent, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. To that honorable and learned gentleman, who has, during the progress of this discussion, visited the chamber but fitfully, I give credit for this much—that he is unable to be present, and to hear and to feel the full extent of his inconsistency. Lately the honorable and learned member had garlands placed upon his brow for the chivalrous and almost unique heroism which he exhibited in electing to go out of office rather than agree to a certain amendment. The honorable and learned member went out of office, not with our wish.

Mr. McCOLL.—That is all nonsense; we do not believe that.

Mr. POYNTON.—It is perfectly true.

Mr. THOMAS.—Ask the honorable and learned member for Ballarat himself.

Mr. HUGHES.—I say that the honorable and learned member for Ballarat did not go out of office with the wish of the Labour Party. To-day we ask the honorable and learned member to come into the chamber and give honorable members, and the Government, the reasons—some reasons, or any reasons—why he is supporting the honorable and learned member for Corinella on this occasion. Is the honorable and learned member for Ballarat supporting the honorable and learned member for Corinella? I do not think there can be any doubt upon that point. Those pleasant smiles which honorable members on the front opposition benches are endeavouring to hide, with more or less success, would not be seen if they were not quite sure that the honorable and learned member—the chivalrous member—for Ballarat had decided to allow the honorable and learned member for Corinella to fire this gun, while he stands firmly and securely enough behind the hedge. He still retains that mask of fair play towards us, though he does not even grace the chamber with his presence, and remains ominously silent. This is a Bill to prevent industrial dispute and clause 48 cuts right into its very heart. The Bill will be either a success or failure, according to whether unions take advantage of its provisions or otherwise. I do not know whether honorable members recall some of those glowing phrases with which the honorable and learned member for Ballarat invested his speech on the motion that the measure be read a second time. I cannot imitate them; I have not that fine gift of fluency which distinguishes, and sometimes mars, the matter of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. But those phrases are embalmed in Hansard, and any man who can may read them. The glorious picture of the promised land which was held before the Israelites during their forty years' wandering, is but dull and drab by comparison with that sketched to this country by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat in his forecast of the result of the measure. A land flowing with milk and honey was opened out to our gaze. The honorable and learned member said that this was a measure which he had received from his colleague, the right honorable and learned member for Adelaide, and that heartily did he approve of it that he had not found it necessary or desirable to make any amendment other than a few verbal and trifling alterations. Yet the honorable and learned member for Ballarat stands to-day, absolutely voting against the principle upon the insertion of which the success of the measure entirely depends. I shall deal more categorically with the honorable and learned member in a moment. In the meantime I wish to quote a few phrases which the honorable and learned member used in reference to this phase of the matter. He said it was not necessary to make any amendment. He so heartily approved of the measure as framed by his right honorable colleague, upon whose legislation all the Acts dealing with industrial conciliation and arbitration throughout Australasia had been framed, that he did not find it necessary to make any amendments at all. I ask whether the very heart of the measure, as framed by the right honorable member for Adelaide, was not the principle of preference to unionists? If it was not, if it is immaterial, a trifling matter, let the honorable and learned gentleman say so now. Let him say so after all this thundering which has been delivered from the hes against preference to claiming that it would ins of a free people, that it ay the privilege of non-e a share in the bounteous vation—which was to fol- kable measure. Let the learned gentleman say ough in the opinion of bers opposite preference going to do all this, it is ing, not the kernel of the mere tassel on its very lenge the honorable and an to deny that there principles in the measure, compulsion and the other ionists. Without compul- e fails, without preference The honorable and learned declaring that the draft- ure, founded as it is upon n which the Arbitration alasia have been based, he could find no room at and no necessity for ehind the honorable and for Corinella, and intends nt a re-discussion of this in the Bill. This is the earned gentleman's chivalry, inauguration of a new era which a man shall retire welcome his successors as have not sought office. This fair play. I say that since as introduced we have not ce of fair play from the from the honorable and for Ballarat. Some honor- ave opposed preference to , others have done so in an covert fashion. Some honor- ave always been opposed to and we cannot object to to it now. But there are members who have pre- this measure the promise of Australia, who have pro- re that it would make this sed land. They, too, stated give to this Administration air play; and yet now when or generous treatment, but fair play which is extended in the dock being tried for ence, the honorable and r for Ballarat slaps us . He has not the courage elf, but he gets some other person to do it, and he says nothing. That is fair play! I declare emphatically that clause 48 is one of the essential parts of the measure. If compulsion is the heart of the measure, preference to unionists is the lungs which oxidize the blood. Without it the measure must become stagnant and useless, and inevitably fall into decrepitude and decay. And the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, who has said that the measure of the right honorable member for Adelaide required no amendment, now votes against the principle without which the whole thing must fall into decay. The honorable and learned gentleman sits there and not one word have we heard from him to justify this most amazing, this unexampled, this treacherous change of front. He says very little now. There is a wisdom in silence which, had the honorable and learned gentleman learnt it earlier, would have served his purpose admirably to-day. Had he been silent when he spoke, or had he spoken when he remained silent, he would have commended himself more to the people of Australia than he has done. But his eloquence and his inconsistency have been his undoing. The honorable and learned gentleman has promised much, and he has done nothing. He said—

Speaking for those whom I have had the honour of consulting to-day, and who, I should inform you, sir, have paid me the honour of electing me their leader, I am charged to extend to the Government the assurance that the Opposition propose to extend to them the utmost fair play. We feel that the tasks which they have shouldered merit forbearance, and we hope that they will receive it.

"We hope that they will receive it."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There was too much generosity that time.

Mr. WATSON.—We expected that from the right honorable member.

Mr. HUGHES.—There is the expression of a hope which has borne dead sea fruit. We have had more fair play from honorable members who have opposed us openly than we have had from the honorable and learned gentleman. The country is now asked to believe that these gentlemen are sincere, and earnestly desire to improve the Bill—and may believe it if it does not know the truth—and honorable members opposite are relying upon this, knowing that the press will not give publicity to the facts—

Mr. WATSON.—Hear, hear. No reports. Despicable journalism.

Mr. HUGHES.—Here, for the first time in the history of the world, the Labour Party have had an opportunity to administer the public Departments. For three months we have been in office, and, as the honorable and learned gentleman said, we have shouldered its responsibilities. Let the honorable and learned gentleman say whether we have failed in carrying out any one of those responsibilities. But let any honorable member say so fairly, and not in this contemptible back-handed fashion. If we were accused openly, we might fight our opponents fairly, but we have not the chance to do so. The House is asked to believe that honorable members opposite are actuated in this matter by the most patriotic and honorable motives. I wish to deal with those who profess to believe that the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill now before the House is in no danger in the hands of the honorable members opposite. Let us see who sit opposite. Amongst them are one or two honorable members who have committed themselves to the principle of compulsory conciliation and arbitration; some by words, others by actions, and others by hustings pledges, which, unfortunately for them, they cannot go back upon. They are committed to stand by this great principle. I propose to deal with those honorable members. There is my friend the honorable member for Robertson. He believes in this principle.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—In what principle?

Mr. HUGHES.—In the principle of compulsory arbitration. Does the honorable member wish to withdraw that?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I have never said so.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member has never said so! All I have to say to that is that the honorable member supported the principle on the second reading of the Bill, and he has never raised his voice against it. He has voted consistently in favour of it, and I recollect that he voted for the inclusion of the railway servants.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—That is the only thing I did. I said that I would do so, and I kept my promise.

Mr. HUGHES.—Quite so. Here is an extraordinary situation. The honorable member has had many hours and many days in which to explain his position, but until I make this remark, he does not think it worth while to break through the fetters by which he has been bound in common with other honorable members sitting opposite, not by a decision given in a caucus in which all men are free to speak, and bound only by the decision of the majority, but where one man's voice and one man's eye swamps all their names. Now the honorable member wishes under cover of interjection to get in a speech which is yet ample opportunity for him to deliver.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I kept a promise which I gave.

Mr. HUGHES.—I will deal with the honorable member. He claims that he never said that he was in favour of compulsory conciliation and arbitration. I voted to include the railway men. I, the honorable member mean to say he voted to include the railway men in principle and in a measure in which does not believe?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I assisted around the Bill that was carried on second reading.

Mr. HUGHES.—Why the honorable member signed the railway men's platform?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—I made a pledge, and I kept it.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable learned member, or I should say the honorable and unfortunate member, signed a pledge of the railway men's platform.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Let the honorable and learned member produce it.

Mr. WATSON.—We can produce it.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Does the honorable member deny it?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Let the honorable and learned member produce the pledge. I say he cannot produce it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the honorable member for Robertson not to interrupt. He will be at liberty to speak when he pleases, later, but he is not at all to interrupt the Minister of External Affairs.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Produce the pledge.

Mr. KELLY.—I rise to a point of order. Are we discussing clause 48 of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, or the question whether certain honorable members have signed a pledge concerning a matter not under discussion at the present time?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I understand the argument of the Minister of External Affairs to be that the measure under discussion depends upon two principles, its being compulsory and its containing preference for unionists, and that these two principles are inseparable. The honorable and learned gentleman is, therefore, well within ing those principles in con-amendment which deals

m.

S.—It is an admirable il-were needed, of the truth een saying, and of the anle members opposite not to and not to face the issue, gh I say something which arrow limits of the motion House, we have an honor-o desires to further restrict the House to say what is the honorable member for onnexion with clause 48, en his name at the foot like that which I hold in iving given his solemn and se, at a public meeting or ote for it?

WILLIS.—I did not sign the hich the honorable and refers, nor did I say at g that I would sign it. I hich the honorable and cannot produce.

LYNE.—What about the now?

ES.—I have to deal with a orable members, of whom member for Robertson is one ffenders, and therefore, as I hope that I may be perinue without interruption.
asked if he was in favour Conciliation and Arbitration ould apply to public ser-en he said in a letter, or way—

WILLIS.—The honorable ember does not know what

ALD.—We have the letter;
le member cannot deny it.

ES.—Did the honorable a promise, either in writing,
way?

WILLIS.—I voted for the

ES.—At the time the honor-made the promise to support as there not in it clause 48, as e the proviso of the honored member for Corinella was The honorable member mitted himself by a definite port that clause. The honorface proves that he has a d it is pricking him now, so that he cannot sit quiet any longer. He will not allow his leader to any longer bind his tongue. And when I have finished, he will have his opportunity. Having voted to include the railway servants in the Bill, which provided for giving them preference if they were unionists, he is now about to vote against a motion to allow of the re-discussion of this clause. The party with whom he will vote cannot have a greater majority than two, and to secure that majority, the honorable and learned member for Angas, the honorable and learned member for Wannon, the honorable member for North Sydney, the honorable member for Kooyong, the honorable member for Flinders, the honorable member for Wilmot, the honorable member for Grampians, the honorable member for Gippsland, the honorable member for Oxley, and other honorable gentlemen, all of whom are opposed to the principles of the Bill, have to be reckoned. After having solemnly promised to include the railway servants in a Bill which gave them preference, under clause 48, the honorable member for Robertson is now about to deliberately prevent them from getting that preference, and to cast a vote to slay the measure which he promised to support.

Mr. McLEAN.—If the honorable and learned gentleman says that I am an opponent of compulsory arbitration, his statement is not true; and he knows it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Honorable members are again distinctly disregarding the Standing Orders. I have to ask the honorable member for Gippsland to withdraw the remark that something said by the Minister of Home Affairs was untrue.

Mr. McLEAN.—I withdraw, in deference to your ruling, Mr. Speaker; but every one in this Chamber knows that I have supported the principle of compulsory arbitration, both in this House and before my constituents.

Mr. HUGHES.—I am very glad to hear it. All I can say is that there are various ways of supporting a measure, and the honorable member has been unfortunate in the method which he has selected. I withdraw his name, and substitute for it the name of the honorable member for New England, and that of the honorable and learned member for Parkes.

Mr. SPENCE.—And that of the honorable member for Lang.

Mr. HUGHES.—The alteration will salve the honorable member's feelings, and will suit my purpose very well, since 1 exchange one for three. At the same time, if the honorable member for Robertson will read the speeches of the honorable member for Gippsland to the council of the railway men in his electorate, he will know whether they will believe that in trusting the measure to the hands of so stalwart a supporter he was doing what he promised to do.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The railway men do not run Australia.

Mr. HUGHES.—If they do believe that, the honorable member for Robertson will still have to explain why he voted with men like the honorable member for New England and the honorable and learned member for Parkes, who have openly declared that they are opposed to the measure, root and branch. My honorable friend is voting with others to displace a Government whose members are pledged to carry out this principle, and who could not remain in office for twenty-four hours if they dared to do one of the things which honorable members opposite are doing every day. The honorable member for Robertson could not have got the votes of the railway men in his electorate if he had not pretended that he was in favour of bringing them within the scope of the Bill. I ask him, then, if he is voting as he said he would vote? Is he voting as his constituents, whom he is deceiving and abandoning, whom he is sacrificing on the altar of party and self-seeking, thought he would vote? Self-seeking is a characteristic which marks, with one exception, those who sit on the front Opposition bench; and as it required more than one righteous man to save the cities of old, so I think it will take more than one to leaven such a lump as I now see before me. I come now to the honorable member for South Sydney, who is most appropriately sitting next to the honorable member for Robertson. He is in favour of the measure. He has voted for it, and believes in its principles. He got the support of the railway men, and cast a vote to allow them to be included in the measure. Unless he gets their votes at the next elections, he cannot be returned to this Parliament. No man knows better than he does that what I say is perfectly true; that he must justify his conduct to those whom he promised to include in a measure which provides for preference to unionists. He never ventured to raise his voice against that principle when before his constituents. He must justify to them the fact that he is voting with a party having only a majority of two, and composed of at least thirty members who are against the measure, and branch. The honorable and learned member for Wannon has had the politeness and pluck to say that he is opposed to it. He did not creep and cower for the votes of the unionists, and he told the House that he was opposed to the measure, lock, stock, and barrel. There be thirteen of these amiable individuals in the majority against the Government, the honorable member for South Sydney proposes to vote with them, in order to get the Government out of office, and to prevent the railway men from getting what he promised to secure for them. Yet we do not hear a word from him and other honorable members in explanation of this amazing change of front. In some Eastern countries, those who are suspected of crime are required to walk before the detection and are given a mouthful of rice. Guilty parties, whose lips are parched with fear, caused by the consciousness of guilt, cannot secrete sufficient saliva to chew grain, and thereby stand condemned. The honorable members opposite are unable to raise their voices to explain why they have thus changed their plans. They either cannot or dare not speak.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I could speak for hours in defence of my attitude; but the Government wish to be kept here another week?

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member may be able to speak for hours; but if he could speak for years he could not expiate his present conduct. He has in another place a colleague who once spoke several hours at a stretch, and it was probably difficult for the honorable member to beat him; but if the honorable member were gifted with ten times that power of speech, he could not explain away the simple fact that he now proposes to vote with thirteen opponents of the measure to secure a majority of two against the Government.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Thirteen is a devil's number.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The honorable and learned gentleman is not the absolute judge of other honorable members. There is another tribunal.

Mr. HUGHES.—I am his accuser, and he is his judge. His constituents are his judges.

Mr. KELLY.—Why does not the honorable and learned gentleman speak to his constituents?

Mr. WATSON.—We shall do so.

Mr. HUGHES.—Honorable members not be afraid that the Government will make an appeal to the judges of all. We do not appeal to men who have first put their hands, and then, abashed and ashamed of their tactics, keep their own mouths closed. We shall not appeal to the people outside, who, in spite of everything, have that sense of fair play which always brings home to those who violate its principles the consequences of their wrong-doing.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I have violated no principle.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member has broken his pledge; he has abandoned his trust. He proposes to betray those upon whom he has gained a credulous belief he got into Parliament.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I do not.

Mr. HUGHES.—From such a galaxy of members presented by honorable members opposite, I hesitate whom to select. Take the honorable member for Parramatta, who in the whole of this discussion has said nothing. There is wisdom, the wisdom of the serpent, of Satan himself; because what he had said would have exposed him to the inevitable consequences of his inconstancy. The honorable member is opposed to preference to unionists. He is intrinsically in favour of excluding trade unions from the discussion of politics. He is barely, without any provocation at all, tempted to vote against the modification which the Government accepted from the honorable and learned member for Ringwood. He is against allowing unions even to register under clause 62. Yet everything that that honorable member has ever achieved in public life, the position he holds in public life to-day, he owes to unionism. If there is in this Parliament a man who should vote against the attempt of the honorable and learned member for Corio to prevent the discussion of this measure, it is the honorable member for Parramatta, who, by virtue of his past history, of the virtue of the faithful and unswerving glance that has been given him by those whom he now proposes to throw over, should support the principles of the Bill.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Minister is a bad judge of loyalty.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Was not the honorable member for Parramatta once the leader of the Labour Party in New South Wales?

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member was in the New South Wales Parliament at the time when the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Bill was under discussion. That Bill contained a clause which gave preference to unionists without qualification of any kind. The honorable member then had an opportunity to express his opinion with regard to that principle. Did he then vote against preference to unionists, or say one word against it? No, he covered the Bill with eulogy, and said it was an admirable measure.

Mr. WEBSTER.—He was then dependent upon the miners of Lithgow.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He depends on them now, and will get their support. The honorable member need make no mistake about that.

Mr. HUGHES.—No doubt the honorable member will obtain a lot of support from them; but there is one thing he can never do. He can never rid himself of the fact that he proposes now to throw over those very people upon whose shoulders he has climbed up. Why, the honorable member who now has nothing but contempt to pour upon the Labour Party climbed into political life on their shoulders. He was the leader of the first Labour Party in the New South Wales Parliament, and stood by the principle of compulsory arbitration thirteen years ago.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Minister is quite wrong.

Mr. HUGHES.—I am quite right, and no mere word of the honorable member will make me quite wrong.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then why did the Labour Party rub me out ten years ago? Because I would not sign the party pledge.

Mr. HUGHES.—If that be an answer to what I have said, the Deity Himself might stand condemned, because He has not destroyed Satan. The honorable member, with his wiles, and his turns, and his tricks, and his subterfuges, and his appeals for votes—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the Minister to withdraw his last remarks. They are quite unparliamentary as applied to the conduct of an honorable member.

Mr. HUGHES.—Very well, I withdraw them. The honorable member, by those methods which are known to him and to those like him, has managed to temporarily evade the consequences of his sins. There stands behind him a press, without whose aid he could never for a moment hope to come into Parliament again. What did he say in the New South Wales Parliament in 1899 with regard to the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill?—

The Bill was intended to recognise trade unions—its basis was the recognition of trade unions—therefore, it seemed to him we would not depart from the spirit of the measure by making it penal for an employer to discharge any employé simply because he was a trade unionist.

He moved an amendment to clause 26, which was intended to encourage trade unionism, and that was agreed to. He said—

The introduction of the Bill indicates a distinct step away from the regions of prejudice, of irritation, and of bad feeling, and towards those ideals of justice and reason, which we hope will eventually dominate our economical life. May I say, too, that it seems to me that this proposal means for labour (organized labour particularly) a more honorable place and recognition than it has hitherto received. . . . The Bill seems to me to make distinctly in the direction of peace—not of peace at any price—but of peace with honour to both sides. . . . The Bill will lay the foundation of a steady, busy, and prosperous future for all those engaged in our industrial occupations.

The honorable member will wish before very long, that it is merely my finger, and not the ballot-paper, that is being pointed against him.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I absolutely do not care about the honorable and learned member, or anything he can do.

Mr. HUGHES.—In the honorable member's district a union recently appealed to the New South Wales Arbitration Court, and obtained preference. That preference was secured under circumstances which the honorable member is now proposing to render impossible under this Bill. The honorable member assented to this measure during the last Parliament, and to the principles underlying it in the 1899 Parliament of New South Wales, and yet he now proposes to vote against the Bill, and even against giving honorable members an opportunity to discuss it, because his leader has decided that he must do so. Some honorable members speak about the tyranny of the caucus. What caucus? The honorable member for Parramatta, when he was in our caucus, at any rate—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I never was in the Minister's caucus.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member was in a caucus.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is untrue.

Mr. THOMAS.—It is quite true. If the honorable member had not been offered the position of Postmaster-General in South Wales he would have been a member of the Labour Party to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. The honorable member for Parramatta has stated a remark made by the Minister untrue, and I must ask him to withdraw the expression. At the same time, I say that there was some provocation offered and I think the Minister will do well to avoid any reference to caucuses.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I absolutely withdraw my remark, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to say that no one knows better than the Minister that what he is saying is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. HUGHES.—All I know is that the honorable member was the leader of Labour Party in New South Wales in 1890 Parliament, and that the party then governed by caucus, as it ever been.

Mr. THOMAS.—The honorable member was offered the position of Postmaster-General in the New South Wales Government—

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Did he get the billet?

Mr. THOMAS.—Yes; and he would have been with us to-day but for that.

Mr. HUGHES.—It is very extraordinary that the honorable member for Parramatta who has always been recognised by his low unionists as a man to be relied on in matters of trade unionism, and from whose speeches in the New South Wales Parliament when the measure upon which this is founded was under discussion, I read extracts, should now propose to vote against the very principles of the measure and to vote against even affording honorable members an opportunity to discuss it, and should, at the same time, not think it worth while to get up here and explain why he has changed his opinion, why he has abandoned his principles. Very likely the honorable members opposite will yet say that it is advisable to say a few words in order to explain, or to excuse, if they do not explain, their very extraordinary conduct. They have set us an admirable example of silence, and they would have been very glad if we had closed our mouths as well as they have closed their own. We are not to be denied some opportunity of pointing out to the people of this country exactly the position occupied by the honorable members. I accuse the honorable member for Parramatta, who, as I been a trade union official—if I have wronged him, I apologize—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not want the Minister's apologies.

Mr. HUGHES.—He has been a member of the Labour Party—if I have done an injustice I apologize. He has led the Labour Party of New South Wales, and has always been in favour of the principle of compulsory arbitration.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — I was connected with the Labour Party in which the Minister did not believe at all.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member is wrong. I did believe in the Labour Party, but I did not believe in the honorable member. I stood upon the same platform as the Labour Party, and the difference between myself and the honorable member is that I have adhered to it, but he has abandoned it. If the honorable member will consider where he was in 1890, and where he stands now, he will see that between the two positions there is a chasm as wide as hell, a chasm that cannot be bridged by empty excuses he now seeks to make. I can justify to the deluded men in his district his vote in support of a party which has thirteen honorable members who have opposed tooth and nail to the whole principle of the Bill. Let him explain it if he can.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Terrible!

Mr. MAHON.—It is terrible for the honorable member.

Mr. HUGHES.—I believe that the honorable member for Lang is against the principle of the Bill. I include him as an addendum, and that brings the number of the opponents of the measure up to fifteen. The number is none the less lucky because it is fourteen instead of fifteen. There are fourteen men who are opposed to this measure, lock, stock, and barrel, and yet the honorable member for Manawarra proposes to bring them into the Bill. At the same time, he will try to persuade those credulous and unhappy men in his district that he is still in favour of compulsory arbitration, and that he would give them preference. If he succeeds, he will achieve a great victory. If he stands alone and had not the advantages of the pocket and the press behind him, he would never do it. The right honorable gentleman at the head of one of the sections of the Opposition says that, if he comes into the Bill, he will take up the Bill where it was dropped, and will go on with it. I think we may well accept that statement without qualification. The right honorable gentleman would go on with anything. I want to put a question to the honorable member for Dalley, the only representative of New South Wales in the Opposition who had sufficient courage to emancipate himself even temporarily from the shackles of that caucus, of that party discipline, which is iron in its nature, rigid and unyielding, and which seems to deaden and paralyze even the brightest and most virile of the members of that party. The honorable member has told us that he intends to vote against the Government, because we are not prepared to restore the clause to its original form, but propose rather to insert an amendment, which we consider will have the effect that we desire. Although he candidly admits that the amendment carried on the motion of the honorable member for Corinella really destroys the Bill, he intends to vote against the motion for the recommitment of the clause. In these circumstances I wish to know whether, if the right honorable member for East Sydney comes into power, and, takes up this measure, and we move the recommitment of the clause, the honorable member will vote for us or against us? Will he vote to recommit the clause or not? That is a conundrum. I leave him to think over the question. The honorable member who believes in compulsory arbitration, who has given us a generous support, and has been the only member of the Opposition to give us that fair play which we were promised, is now pledged to support a party comprising fourteen persons, who are opposed to this principle, and would not have it at any price. Incidentally, I may add that that party is opposed to every plank in the platform on which he stood at the last election, and on which, indeed, he has stood during the whole of his parliamentary career. How is he to explain his inconsistency to his electors? I have nothing more to say to the honorable member. Up to the present he has given us good support; but now, at the eleventh hour, he finds himself, I suppose, like the one solitary animal upon whom the clanging doors of the ark were about to close, anxious to get inside with the indescribables. He proposes to go with them, and to abandon that line of consistent conduct which he has hitherto courageously pursued. I shall now deal with the other members of the Opposition, but shall except from my criticism the honorable member for Moira, who is the only one in the party in favour of the principle of compulsory arbitration, whose attitude on this clause I can understand. He has explained it, and I am perfectly satisfied with his explanation.

Mr. MALONEY.—He was man enough to speak.

Mr. HUGHES.—He is, apparently, the only man who has the courage to say anything on the point. Others who are in favour of the principle, but are going to kill it, have not had the courage to utter one solitary word on this motion. The honorable member for Moira, however, has never professed to regard this measure from our stand-point. Compared with the tumultuous eloquence of the honorable member for South Sydney, the honorable member for Parramatta, and the honorable member for Robertson, his speeches have never suggested that he is so enthusiastic a supporter of the principle as we are; yet, he has mustered up enough courage to explain why he proposes to take a certain course. The explanation is this: that he is the only man who is not dragged at the chariot wheels of the party. He has taken up his present attitude because of principle, and of principle alone. I, of course, exclude from my criticism of the Opposition those who are opposed to the principle of the Bill. I can understand their attitude, and have no objection to the course which they propose to take. My objection is to those who are in favour of the principle, but yet propose to kill it, although they have not the courage to openly do so. Let us consider the Government proposition. We propose that before preference shall be granted to the members of an organization, it shall be shown that the organization substantially represents the industry affected. The honorable member for Dalley said that he could not regard such a provision as satisfactory, and that the introduction of the words "substantially represents," would have the effect of limiting, if not of destroying altogether the usefulness of the Bill. I wish to emphasize the point that the proviso which we seek to insert in place of that carried on the motion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella embodies the practice which has been adopted in the New South Wales Arbitration Court, and which has been found there to work admirably. Further, it has secured the indorsement of the late Attorney-General of New South Wales,

Mr. B. R. Wise, in whom the honorable and learned member for Ballarat professed a little while ago to fully believe. Mr. Wise, who framed the New South Wales Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, and whose judgment and knowledge of this matter the late Prime Minister professes to have the greatest confidence, is in favour of the proviso which we seek to insert. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat, in moving the second reading of the Bill, on 22nd March last, said—

I am perfectly certain that the quotation of the right honorable member for Adelaide for Acting Premier of New South Wales was a rate, and I venture to take the latter as the authority in New South Wales. . . .

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—We do not think it is the best authority in New South Wales.

Mr. DEAKIN.—If my honorable friends were more impartial they would. In New Zealand, New South Wales, where Arbitration Courts have been employed, we have not found any objection to capital or employment. On the contrary, we have found in both countries a gratifying advance.

Mr. WATSON.—With preference.

Mr. HUGHES.—Yes. The honorable and learned member continued—

The experience is short, I admit—it is final—but so far as it goes it is entirely in favour.

After eulogizing the principle of preference which Mr. B. R. Wise introduced in the New South Wales Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, and which he asked this House through the Government, to adopt, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, advocate of fair play, the believer in the principle, the new Messiah who was going to lead us into the land of Canaan, is against it. He favours the honorable learned member for Corinella's amendment, which, in nine cases out of ten, would prevent a preference being granted, and at the same time, he would hopelessly shut any opportunity to discuss it. What is the meaning of the words "substantially represents," and in what respect do they differ from the words "a majority," which are embodied in the clause as amended? A majority is a definite fixed quantity, and in every many cases is practically incapable of proof. It leaves no discretion to the Court, whereas the words "substantially represents" would give a discretion to the honorable and learned member for Ballarat says that we are to trust the Court was he who originated that phrase, and now proposes to hedge about the action of the Court with this iron bond of restriction.

is is an evidence of his givment and the Bill fair play.
rted that our proposal would om the point of view of the right honorable member for as said that we have sold such an accusation, coming of such a party, is at any any significance which it have. The members of that their souls and abandoned inciples, and yet ask nists should rely upon all content myself by remarks made on this
Mr. Justice Cohen, who, mplicitly, is an impartial authority on whom we may liance. In dealing with a by the Hotel Club Cate-aurant Employers' Union
J. Adams, he said—

ing one way or the other, but in s it would be far better, if the is being unduly used as a means harassing employers, that the assisted by evidence of that.
in this particular case, because but from general statements I that this preference clause is ssing the employer and placing position of working his busild be much better if the Court
y evidence of these things. . . .
wn knowledge what I read, time tions attributed to this Court has never performed. . . . I d by what I see in the public eral statements are made, and tements to the proof, in almost ll fail. I do not expect any wn will work with perfect hartion to every one. All the wis-ature has not formulated a law jection could not be taken.

these: that in New South ce to unionists, without quathan that which the Court s worked satisfactorily; and cation which the Court has which we seek to provide for mely, that preference shall a union substantially repre-
y. I come now to the quesionists do substantially re-ades in which unionism can oppose to quote some figures, ghlan's Statistical Register, effectually dispose of the in New South Wales the minority. They show that the workers in New South Wales
3,592, and that in callings where no unions are to be found there are 301,660 persons engaged. That leaves a balance of 121,932 persons who can come within the operation of this clause. The registered unions under the Conciliation and Arbitration Act of New South Wales represent 62,384, leaving 59,548 persons outside unions in callings where unions exist. These figures conclusively show that the unionists substantially represent those persons engaged in callings in which unionism exists in New South Wales.

Mr. KELLY.—If the unions have a majority in New South Wales, there can be no objection to the clause as it stands.

Mr. WATSON.—How could the possession of a majority be proved?

Mr. KELLY.—The honorable and learned member has just proved it.

Mr. WATSON.—But how could it be proved to the satisfaction of the Court?

Mr. HUGHES.—Some unions may contain not only a majority of the employés who are engaged in a particular industry, but the whole of them, whilst others may comprise only a minority.
By no twist of imagination can it be said that a minority of employés "substantially represents" any industry, except where it operates within a district. For example, a number of workmen in a particular industry may constitute a majority of those so engaged within a district, but they will constitute a minority within a State.
That is what occurred in the case of the Saddlers' Union, which was cited by the honorable and learned member for Wannon. He declared that the Union in question represented only a minority of those engaged in the industry. As a matter of fact, the award of the Court was in favour of the saddlers who represented a majority of those engaged in the trade within the district in which the award was made operative. These constituted a minority of the employés engaged in that industry within the State, but a majority within that particular district. The use of the words "substantially represents" would vest the Court with some discretion, whereas the employment of the words "a majority" would confer upon it no discretion. Further, it would be practically impossible to demonstrate that even within a small area an organization represented a majority of the employés in any particular industry, but within the extended area, which would be covered by a Federal Arbitration Act, it would be doubly so. I do not know that I need say any more. I am satisfied to have placed before this House and the country the position taken up by a number of honorable members who support the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. Those who declare that they are in favour of this Bill, and who are yet committed to a course of action which is diametrically opposed to their professions—in many cases to their actions—will sooner or later have to answer to the electors, whom they have deceived. Those honorable members who are determined not to give this Government an opportunity to defend itself, and to justify its existence by permitting a discussion upon the merits of its policy or administration, will sooner or later reap the reward of their own narrow-minded and underhanded methods. I venture to think that before many weeks have passed those who adopt such a course of action will bitterly regret that they did not face this question fairly and as men. The blow which they strike to-day will—if it be effective—prove their undoing. They propose to strike with the stiletto of the bravo, instead of coming out and fighting with the broadsword of the soldier. They intend to do something which they are incapable and undesirous of justifying. I venture to assert that when they are sitting upon the Ministerial side of the House they will bitterly regret having introduced into this Parliament, where decent politics and decent behaviour have hitherto been the rule, methods which are unworthy of a parish vestry, unworthy of any body of public men in the Empire, and which have never been resorted to in the great mother of Parliaments. In spite of all the provocation, in spite of all the fury of animosity which has been lashed to the wildest heights in the House of Commons, that body has never descended to the contemptible depths to which honorable members opposite have resorted. They have inaugurated a new era. It is the singular fortune of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat that, after having covered himself with temporary glory by resigning his position as Prime Minister when defeated upon a detail of this Bill, he should have lent himself to a base, treacherous, and indefensible action.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS (Robertson).—I desire to make a personal explanation. The Minister of External Affairs stated that I have not respected the promises which I made to my constituents upon the Arbitration Bill. I wish to say that all through my recent campaign I never once referred to the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, nor was I asked a single question within my election in regard to it, so little was the issue evinced in that measure. I may mention, however, that I did receive a copy of the platform of the Railway League, which was asked to sign. I was informed that I did not sign it its members would conclude that I was not in favour of the inclusion of railway servants within the scope of the Bill. I did not sign the platform. Since the present Government assumed office, I received a further communication asking me if I would support their proposal. I acknowledged the letter, but made no promise. I should like to add that some time ago I wrote a letter to Mr. Hollis—

Mr. THOMAS.—Was that before the election or after it?

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—It was before the election took place. I informed him that I was in favour of making the Bill applicable to railway servants, and voted in that direction. When I was asked by the leader of the Opposition if I would support a coalition Government, I stated that I would vote in favour of bringing railway servants within the scope of this measure if such a measure were brought forward an Arbitration Bill. I think that my course of conduct has been very consistent, and I claim that I never once deceived my constituents.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—Honorable members opposite need have no apprehension whatever that they have drawn the badger. I am not to be frightened into making explanations regarding my position. I merely wish to refer to one or two personal matters which come within the purview of this debate. I crave the permission of the House to refer to the interjection by the honorable member for the Barrier, which has been repeated several times, and which has caused some honorable members to labour under an entire misconception as to my position. I contend that the honorable member who has repeated that interjection is familiar with the whole facts of the case, and is therefore aware that it should never have been made.

Mr. McDONALD.—Explain who made it. The honorable member has accused me of a badger.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Honorable members have accused me of something from the Labour Party to jump

Postmaster-General in the Reid Government more scandalous statement uttered, and I will show in six months I was the Labour Party in the New Parliament. I was not the party, as the Minister of External Affairs has told the House. I was the first leader. After we broke up, we formed another party, adopted a programme on two planks, both of which have been passed into law. I was for some time. Then certainly outside of Parliament with what is known as the Protectionist. The present Prime Minister, the Minister of External Affairs, repeatedly came to the party, and requested us to join the party. I declined to do so, chiefly on the ground that it would destroy my representation. Thereupon they formed another party outside of Parliament, and the Labour Party inside the House of Representatives of a bogus character. Its members at the ensuing election were months later. They endeavored to keep us out of public life by refusing to join the party with the Protectionist. Months after these things had after I had been elected, in the face of their opposition, I was in a position in the Reid Government. At that time I was unattached to any party, was entirely free to accept of any office. The honorable member for the Barrier is familiar with all this, and I complain that he has attempted to misguide the House as to the actual position of affairs. I was of External Affairs. I was also a member of the party with me. That is quite correct. He was never associated with the party. I never signed the party, and, therefore, had nothing to do with it.

—Will the honorable member show how he left the Protectionist

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—In reply to the honorable member, I say that I never belonged to the party. But in my young days, I knew anything about politics, I was foolish enough to write a letter. At every election that letter is trotted out by a certain newspaper, and headed, "An eloquent tribute to protection," although, according to that same newspaper, everything that I have since written is "Tommy Rot." This afternoon the Minister of External Affairs made a characteristically bitter personal attack. With all kinds of contortions and circus tricks, of which he is such a complete master, he gasconaded round the table, as he has done many times of yore, hurling the most bitter accusations against honorable members upon this side of the House, including myself. All I have to say in reply to the honorable member's threats is that I do not value them at a snap of my fingers. He has made similar accusations before. Rather than resort to the tactics which he adopts for political purposes at election times, I should leave public life for ever. He talks about conscience and straightforward conduct. Why, he does not know the meaning of the terms. He does not keep anything of that kind on the premises. It is not part of his stock-in-trade.

MR. HUGHES.—The honorable member has never kept a solitary pledge made by him during his life.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—The Minister might just as well say that as anything else. Those people who know him will expect him to make statements of that character without having any concern as to whether they are true. The honorable and learned member simply disports himself on the platform, mountebank that he is, and no one questions anything that he says.

MR. WATSON.—Is that remark not unparliamentary?

MR. SPEAKER.—I ask the honorable member for Parramatta to withdraw the remark.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—I withdraw the remark, if it is considered unparliamentary.

MR. WATSON.—If it is considered unparliamentary! There is no doubt about that.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—That interjection comes well from a colleague of a Minister who has been disporting himself as has the Minister of External Affairs.

MR. MAHON.—The honorable member for Parramatta ought to apologize for what he has said.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—The Minister of External Affairs is, perhaps, a bit disappointed with my attitude in this debate. After his bitter personal attack, I consider myself absolved from secrecy concerning anything that took place between us over this Bill. The Minister of External Affairs is disappointed because I did not vote with him, though he tried hard to get me to do so, and sent wires to me in New South Wales containing requests to that effect.

Mr. WATSON.—I suppose the Minister of External Affairs took it for granted that the honorable member for Parramatta would support unionists.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—All I have to say is that I know of nothing in the present situation contrary to the spirit and purpose of a genuine trade union. I am as much in sympathy with trade unionism to-day and, perhaps, more so than are a great many honorable members who are so bitterly railing at me from the other side of the House.

Mr. POYNTON.—Does the honorable member believe in the principle of gagging the House? Does he believe in preventing this Bill being recommitted?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I tell the honorable member for Grey that I am not to be baited into making a speech on the merits of the question.

Mr. WATSON.—Why should there not be a speech on the merits of the question?

Mr. POYNTON.—The "badger" has been "drawn."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The "badger" has not been "drawn"; the honorable member has raised that shout of exultation too soon.

Mr. WATSON.—Has there been a caucus on the question of silence? It looks like it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I know nothing of any caucus.

Mr. WATSON.—Perhaps it is an order, and not a caucus decision.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I hope honorable members will believe me when I say that the first I heard of the amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, was when it was submitted on the floor of the House. I did not know that it was going to be proposed.

Mr. WATSON.—One honorable member has said that a fortnight ago he was asked to take a similar course, and he would not do it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I hope honorable members will take my solemn assurance that the first I heard of the motion was when it was submitted on the floor of the House, though I will say that, perhaps, we ought to have known of the intention.

Mr. POYNTON.—I have "nothing" after all.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not wish to say anything more in reply to the Minister of External Affairs, but that whatever I have done I shall do to my constituents. I shall not have the slightest fear in facing the Minister, that will be necessary, when I come to them, will be to point to what amendment have done in connexion with the reference clause; and it will be up to the Government to justify that misstatement.

Mr. BROWN.—It was the clause that botched it.

Mr. THOMAS.—Did the honorable member for Parramatta endeavor to make the clause a better one?

Mr. WATSON.—That is no gain.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Barrier does not think the clause a better one. As the two proposals very closely approach capacity I can bring to bear on the clause that the amendment which the honorable member desires to move will make the clause better, but very much worse. I now to say that, I fear that the Minister of External Affairs as I have always feared the honorable gentleman has threats ever since he came in, but, if he will look after his constituents, he will have quite enough to do out giving his attention to the clause of other honorable members.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I wish to make a personal explanation of my speech. I had no desire to refer to the Minister of External Affairs in my speech, and that is the reason I present opportunity to refer to him which he then made. The Minister of having all along been opposed to this Bill, lock, stock, and barrel, I have frequently denied that, and explained very clearly. I am not opposed to the question of arbitration and conciliation, but I am opposed to this particular clause, and I consider it a denial of the right of all—a denial of the right of the people to live. I simply wish to make a motion, so that any misapprehension may be removed. My present time is perfectly good, and the position I have taken is

AS (Barrier).—I should also ord or two, by way of person. If I have done the hon-for Parramatta an injustice, of an opportunity to with-ment I made. What I said believed that if the honorable Parramatta had not been ap-ster-General by the right ber for East Sydney, when s Premier of New South
4, the honorable member en with the Labour Party

COOK.—That is not what the ber said.

AS.—What I said was that, if the honorable member for l not been offered the office General in New South Wales, been with the Labour Party —Is such value placed on a ition?

AS.—It seems there are some anything to become Prime Australia, at any rate. I may reason I came to the conclu-

ER.—I really cannot see what h happened in eighteen hun-or other has to do with this ad heard the interjection of member for Barrier, which ed to, I should certainly have withdrawal, on an objection y the honorable member for Unfortunately, I did not hear to the interjection, and the withdrawn. In any case, the h the honorable member for rring is entirely irrelevant to before us. The honorable titled to make a personal ex-ch he may complete, if he has one so; but I ask him not to ne of the House by retailing old events beyond what is essary to a personal explana-

AS.—I do not intend to oc-an two minutes, and my retically a personal explanation.
ry sorry, indeed, to make any ences to the honorable mem-matta that are uncalled for;
sh to place before honorable asons why I interjected. In rable member for Parramatta or Lithgow in the New South

Wales Parliament, and was supposed to be a member of the Labour Party. I did not enter the New South Wales Parliament until 1894. A certain number of the members of the Labour Party, including the member for Parramatta, Mr. Alfred Edden, Mr.
Gardiner, Mr. J. B. Nicholson, and several others, disagreed in reference to a pledge.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—All but two.

Mr. THOMAS.—Practically all of those members are now back with the Labour Party. The honorable member for Parramatta, who was at that time offered the office of Postmaster-General, is practically the only one who has remained away from that party.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is not so.

Mr. LONSDALE.—What the honorable member for Barrier says is not true.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for New England knows that the remark he has made is unparliamentary, and I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I withdraw the remark, and will say that what the honorable member for Barrier asserts is not correct.

Mr. THOMAS.—As I say, all those members of the Labour Party have since returned to their allegiance; and some of us have thought, from that time to the present, that there was a strong probability that, if the honorable member for Parramatta had not been made Postmaster-General, he would have been found with the Labour Party to-day. However, if it be true that that appointment made no difference to the honorable member, and that there were other reasons for his withdrawal from the Labour Party, I am prepared to accept his denial; and I can only regret that for a number of years I have misunderstood him to that extent. As regards the matter under discussion at the present moment, I am rather surprised at the action of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I understood the honorable member for Barrier to rise to make a personal explanation. If that be so, he cannot continue from that explanation into a speech on the question before us. Had I known the honorable member desired to make a speech, I should have been obliged to see the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, who rose first. Do I understand that the honorable member for Barrier desires now to make a speech?

Mr. THOMAS.—If I sit down now, have
I lost my right to speak afterwards?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member has certainly not lost his right to speak later.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat).—The speech last night of the Attorney-General, one of the members of the Government whom I respect, decided me to offer a few remarks in reply to the observations which he then addressed to this Chamber in a fashion worthy of its traditions. The Minister, who has just resumed his seat, told us truthfully at the close of his remarks that a new era is being introduced to which our past of decent behaviour and decent debate is to give place. And he has, himself, inaugurated the new era. I regret to find the Federal Parliament, its Ministry, and this debate lowered by a tissue of accusations, half of them malevolent and the other half false.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am sure that the honorable and learned member for Ballarat recognises that he has said what is unparliamentary, and must be withdrawn.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I ask with all respect, sir, that you should further define to me in what I have erred. I said that half the charges made against honorable members were malevolent and the other half were false; some of those charges have already been rebutted by honorable members on this side.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the honorable and learned member for Ballarat to withdraw the statement. I am sure the parliamentary experience of the honorable and learned member teaches him that to say a speech is malevolent, and, more, to say that a speech, or part of it, is false, is a gross breach of the orders of Parliament; and I think he will see his way to withdraw.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Certainly, sir, if you so direct, though I thought that what I said was in order. To the speech of the Minister for External Affairs I do not propose to make any more than an indirect reply. It happens sometimes to all of us, that as we pass along the streets of the city, we meet men engaged filling dravs with dirt and garbage, and unless one is discreet some of that dust and refuse may drift upon him.

Mr. McDONALD.—They might ask the honorable and learned member to get in.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I have not yet taken my seat beside the honorable member.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable and learned member tried to do so.

Mr. DEAKIN.—When it does ha that the dust reaches us, we brush and pass on; that is the proper ment for a speech of the character to we have just listened. The statement made last night by the honorable the torney-General, that the question b us, relating to preferences, had not discussed. In that his memory erred. question of the granting of preferenc the members of organizations was cussed several times, and at great len

Mr. WATSON.—This aspect was no

Mr. DEAKIN.—Various aspects often discussed together, because there one body of members who maint that no preferences should be granted. there was another body of members maintained that they should be gra with conditions. Those aspects were cussed by a number of honorable men in connexion with certain clauses b clause 48 was reached.

Mr. WATSON.—There was not a said about a majority being insisted up

Mr. DEAKIN.—When the hono and learned member for Corinella n his amendment, he not only read it t Committee, but defended it. It was cussed, and was borne in the mind honorable members from that time ward to the close of that debate.

Mr. WATSON.—He spoke for about minutes only.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He spoke for n three-quarters of an hour when he mitted his amendment. He explained elaborately. I have looked it up d the last hour, and have read his sp When the honorable and learned me actually moved his amendment, he immediately after the division which took upon the question of prefere He then moved it in a speech cupying about fifteen lines of Ham. That is perfectly true. But, as he his amendment had not been altered, verbally. The absolute feature of the majority requirement—remained he had merely changed a few words al ing its application. In passing may say that I am not sure that by alteration he improved it. But there no real alteration in the proposal which made, which was that a majority guard should be required before preference granted. That question had been generally discussed. To make the course of et quite clear, I may point out again

o sections of opinion in the ose opposed to all prefer-se who favoured preference
n. We went to two divisions.
rangers in the gallery who is debate to-night, and who e speech of the Minister of rs, there is not one of them ose that when we went to a question of granting prefer-ers of organizations, I voted ng of that preference. On he House has been told, dis-insinuation—I should say a hat, in common with other posed the principle of pre-was necessary for the com-scheme.

N.—The honorable and er is certainly doing that

N.—That is another wriggle justifiable one. We went division. Those who be-granting of preferences side of the chamber, th them. Those who were granting of preferences sat de, and I voted against them.
question of the granting of with a condition. I voted tion. I have never altered that the imposition of that wise. We are told that the ndition proposed by the hon-rned member for Corinella, ith that proposed by the Go-not been properly discussed.
been occupied three days in true that the Minister who umed his seat, and the Home Affairs, have oc-a portion of their time ussion of the amendment

But that question we d still have, ample time all its phases. The Governnched their own proposal, to e committed themselves. We proposal for which we pre-upon which we are se our votes. Nothing could t and plain than the question and nothing could be more e opportunity that has been onsider it.

s.—Nothing could be more

IN.—We have had debates a Committee, on a series of important questions, perhaps half a score of times at least; and I fail to recall an instance in which any honorable member has chosen to speak twice, unless, perhaps, to make a trifling correction. So that the apparent limitation involved in debating the question in the House instead of in Committee is a technical and not a real limitation. It is not a limitation at all according to the usual practice of Parliament. The House has had an opportunity to thresh out this question as searchingly, as fully, as thoroughly, and as satisfactorily, as it could be even if we went into Committee. The Attorney-General urged that the clause proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corinella was open to objection, because it imposed difficulties upon the Court in the way of interpretation. I admit that it does. But I say deliberately, without any hesitation, that it imposes on the Court a smaller burden than would be imposed by the clause which the Government have asked to substitute for it. I see that the Honorable the Minister of External Affairs admits that.

Mr. WATSON.—The amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella imposes a burden on some one else, though.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It imposes a less burden on the Court, because it indicates the line which, in the opinion of Parliament, the Court should pursue in the granting of preferences.

Mr. HUGHES.—It states it—not indicates it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It indicates it plainly.
It states it, if the honorable member prefers that term.

Mr. WATSON.—It would take twelve months for an organization to put itself in line with the rest.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Even if that were true, the fact that it would take twelve months for a particular organization to put itself in line with the rest is no effectual objection in a measure of this kind. We are dealing with a scheme which, as I have discovered in the course of these debates, is not fairly to be judged—as at first I thought it might be—from the experience gained in individual States. As I have said its drafting strained to the utmost our constitutional powers, and there are now continual efforts to overstrain them. The only direction in which, so far as my consciousness tells me, I have altered the attitude I took up when first introducing this measure, has been in consequence of the knowledge gained in listening to these debates and in considering the Bill in detail. It was then I came to perceive immense difficulties—and I indicated them to the Committee several times—in applying common rules and preferences to, it may be, the whole of Australia, or to two or three of its great States, as compared with the difficulties involved in applying those principles in a single State.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is a pity the honorable and learned member did not discover those difficulties before the elections.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I discovered everything that, with the knowledge available, it was possible for me to discover. But in connexion with a Bill of this kind, dealing with a subject having the immense complexity which I have often dwelt upon—and bearing in mind the circumstances, with which the House is perfectly familiar, under which I first took charge of it—I venture to say that it is little wonder that the full gravity and seriousness of all the difficulties of applying State experiences, were not appreciated by me in the beginning. Besides, this is the first, though not the last measure of the kind which the Federal Parliament will deal with. We must proceed circumspectly. The granting of preference to unionists is one of the main features of the Bill. The power to grant it remains. That power, according to the Attorney-General last night, was, under the Bill, unconditional. Since then he himself and a number of his colleagues have admitted that, even in the Bill as we proposed it, that grant would not be unconditional, since, as in New South Wales and New Zealand, conditions would be imposed by the Court itself. Consequently the choice is not, as the Attorney-General submitted last night, between an unconditional grant in the original Bill and a conditional grant now. It is simply the difference between conditions to be imposed by the Court, or similar conditions stated plainly on the face of the Bill. Consequently the difference has simply to be measured between the two conditions before us. My Government never asked for, and this Government never stated that they were asking for, the granting of an unconditional power of preference. This Government elsewhere in this Bill—as the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs last night claimed in connexion with this clause—made concessions. But the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs for the moment overlooked the fact that Prime Minister had distinctly stated in regard to these that he had made no concessions, because he simply consented to the practice—the necessary practice—of Courts to be put in plain language upon the face of the clause, instead of it being to be added afterwards by the Courts. In connexion with the giving of sufficient power to allow those who wish to oppose a rule of preference, the Prime Minister defended himself against the charge that he was rendering anything to Opposition critics by pointing out that these requirements were already implicitly contained in the Bill, that he was merely making them explicit.

Mr. WATSON.—It was a mere understandable fear of the Court on the part of the honorable members opposite that led to the safeguards being asked for.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It was simply a desire that Parliament should distinctly and definitely indicate its view, so that it might be incorporated in the Bill. Consequently the question now before us is surrounded by no obscurity whatever, and by no difficulty. The condition which the honorable and learned member for Corinella advocates is that the principle of majority shall be applied to industrial affairs when preference is asked for. I do not say that the principle is to be applied by means of a referendum, but some honorable members have intimations that if it did I do not know that option to it should come from honorable members opposite.

Mr. WATSON.—Except for the delay the strike might be going on.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It could not go on.

Mr. WATSON.—It would go on. The honorable and learned member knows no trade unionists will submit to this if, under it, they cannot get justice at the hands of the Court.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The honorable gentleman's colleagues have already shown the greatest Federal industrial organization that we know of practically include a majority of the workers. Consequently those cases—which are the first and greatest cases—this question cannot arise. They have their majority.

Mr. SPENCE.—They could not prove it.

Mr. DEAKIN.—How is it going to be proved? Not by statistics from the Government Statist's office, but by the opinion of the Court. Whatever satisfies the judgment of the President of the Court in accepted. Whatever evidence to be sufficient. There will be except such evidence as satis-

It might be satisfied with one person or two, or more. It will be required. "In the Court" is quite sufficient. Requirement that there shall be determined by calculation. The opinion of the Court.

—Those words were put in

—No doubt to kill the Bill.

N.—Nonsense. The Prime Minister, as many others have said, the proposal kills the Bill. We have the same statement made with regard to important measures by those who oppose amendments being made in the Bill. In the first, the most familiar, list of the objections which have been made to alterations in Bills. We all know as a rule, they are made by men who say what they say. But it has happened in the experience scores of times that the mists and the heat of the debate have cleared away, and we can look calmly and coolly, the amendments thus introduced to have few or none of the objections prophesied by those who opposed them.

LOR.—Take the first Conciliation Bill introduced in South Aus-

ON.—It has been inoperative since it was passed.

IN.—But does the honorable member forget that that was a measure of conciliation, whereas this is a purely compulsory measure?

E.—The same remark applies to the Bill in New South Wales.

KIN.—The issue, being per se, is, after all, a very narrow one. The Minister and his colleagues say that in a great number of instances that in a great number of instances, even if the proviso of the Bill were inserted in the Bill, would, in principle, be just the same. The question of giving a preference it would be decided that a majority asked for in these cases, the one provision is the other.

SON.—Except that under the present proposal the fact would not be mathematically demonstrated.

KIN.—Neither must it be mathematically demonstrated under the present proposal. The honorable and learned member for Corinella. If we leave out of consideration the cases in which the Court itself would require the proof of numbers, and those in which there is already a clear majority in the unions concerned, we see that the greater number of the cases likely to come before the Court will not be affected by the proviso. There remain an uncertain number in which it is said that the applicants for preference may substantially represent the industry affected, and yet not be an absolute majority. So far as I can predict without much intimate knowledge of the subject, those cases are likely to be few.

Mr. WEBSTER.—They will be many.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Even if they are many, the honorable member must admit that it will require very little to be done to enable an union or organization, which already substantially represents an industry, to gain the extra support required to make it representative of the majority concerned.

Mr. WEBSTER.—What is that?

Mr. DEAKIN.—All that will be necessary will be to satisfy enough of those who are not members of the union or organization—they will not necessarily have to join an existing union—that it is to their common interest to obtain a preference, and to get them to join, in order to receive the desired benefit. That is all that will have to be done to create a majority sufficient to satisfy the Court, where no majority now exists.

Mr. HUGHES.—The employers of the non-unionists appealed to will hold over their heads the threat that if they join a union they will be dismissed.

Mr. DEAKIN.—As the honorable and learned member knows, the employers could only dismiss their men in that way before they joined an organization; and how would the employers know that they were going to join until they were enrolled? The Bill prohibits interference with them once they are members of an organization. On the other hand, under the proposed amendment of the Government, how would a union prove that it substantially represented an industry? The question would still be left to the determination of the Court, and if the Court were not satisfied, the same steps must be followed to secure proof of its majority as would be necessary under the proviso now in the clause. The two conditions are really the same.

Mr. WATSON.—In one case, absolute proof is not required, but in the other it is. That is the main point of our contention.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I disagree with the Prime Minister there. I say that our proviso does not require absolute proof. It passes the comprehension of the ordinary student of this question, why the Government, the proviso for majority representation having been inserted, have thought it worth while to take the serious step they have taken when the difference between substantial representation and the obtaining of an absolute majority is so slight. I noted their action with surprise, and, at first, almost with incredulity. Having listened to many speeches, I am still in doubt as to the reason why they took that step. Until Wednesday evening last, when the amendment now before the House was moved, I believed, and had been informed, that the Government had a majority for the reversal of the previous vote. The honorable and learned member for Corinella about a fortnight ago—

Mr. MCCAY.—No, early last week.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I am not sure of the date. The honorable and learned member told me that he thought of taking a vote on the question of going into Committee to reconsider the clause, instead of in Committee. I asked him why, and he said, "Because in the clause we have now all that we can get, expressed as we wish to express it." The vote will be the same in either case."

Mr. HUGHES.—He wanted to secure the vote of the Chairman of Committees.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He did not mention the Chairman of Committees, and I do not suppose he thought about him.

Mr. MAUGER.—If he did not think about him, others did.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He gave the sufficient reason that we had already got the principle of majority representation expressed, and he asked, "What more can we get? Why not take a vote on the question at the first opportunity?" Subsequently it occurred to me that in taking a vote in the House the honorable and learned member would place himself at some disadvantage, because he would virtually say to those who disagreed with him, but who may not have agreed with the Government proposal, "You must vote either for or against my amendment."

Mr. WATSON.—He was quite safe, having the solid support of those who are opposed to the Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Two honorable members have intimated that had the matter discussed in Committee, they would have voted to retain the proviso as it stands.

Mr. WATSON.—Only one honorable member has stated that.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I heard one honorable member say it, and understood that another honorable member had also said so. The proposal of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, to which I agreed, did not appear to me in the least likely to become the turning point in the fate of the Government, especially after they were satisfied with an amendment of their own so closely resembling it.

Mr. HUGHES.—Had the honorable and learned member any hand in drafting the original proviso?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Yes, I was consulted by the House during the debate. It was altered two or three times.

Mr. HUGHES.—Did not the honorable and learned member say that the proviso was a matter of no moment?

Mr. DEAKIN.—No. Directly it was put forward I said that it solved the difficulty, and appeared to me infinitely preferable to any other suggestion which had been mentioned. It really crystallized the practice of the State Courts in a definite form. Who could object to that? It was a great deal in the proposal of the honorable member for North Sydney, but it would have required considerable time to elaborate it, and would have necessitated such an alteration of the machinery of the Bill that I thought it could not be adopted. Several alternatives were circulated, and that of the honorable and learned member for Corinella seemed to me the best. The Attorney-General might have quoted me as saying that I had voted for every line and letter of the Bill, but he pointed out that I had voted for two important additions. He forgot, however, that the statement which he quoted was made to contrast my position with that of the Government, who had circulated pages of printed amendments of the Bill, which they challenged me for not supporting.

Mr. WATSON.—The original Bill was not ours.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It was mine by agreement.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable and learned member did adopt it?

—So did the present Govern-

N.—As contrasting my position of the Government, the Bill by the Attorney-General is misleading. Then I stated for two important additions —Restrictions.

N.—The Minister can call it if he chooses. I have no term. One of the amendments the organizations to have a letter, and the other condoning of preferences.

—The honorable and learned member us whenever an amendment

N.—No, that is not correct. The question would have been Government, but for the votes of some of my friends who voted with them. In reply of External Affairs. I am out that, but for myself whom he taunts with having no fair play, the Ministry lived for one day after and for a week after their later times when crises oc-

N.—If the honorable member thought that the Ministry had turned out at that stage, he taken action accordingly.

N.—So I would have done.

—Then, there is no obliga-

N.—I am speaking on the fair play. Neither I nor the other of honorable members on do not know that any honorable member adopted the proposal of the learned member for Corin. The idea that it would be which the fate of the Government depend. When we voted on it, we did so because we proposed a wise and necessary amendment when we were asked to reverse the decision desired to be shown why that amendment was wise and necessary in our mind and not be retained. We are not for the fact that the Government chose to make the amendment. That choice rested with them, and having regard to the Government prepared to concede now, I am explicable to me why they should have made so narrow a difference a vital question.

Mr. WATSON.—Is it inexplicable that we should support the Bill as introduced by the honorable and learned member?

Mr. DEAKIN.—The Prime Minister is a man with whom I should be unwilling to exchange any harsh words; but I believe that this debate, and especially the speech of his honorable colleague, the Minister of External Affairs, has done more to impair the reputation of the Government than anything which has hitherto occurred.

Mr. WATSON.—That is the view of an opponent.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I do not say that because we are opponents, but because there has been manifested once again that spirit which will be displayed to the desperate cost of my honorable friends in the two corners when they face the electors. Those most closely allied with the Labour Party, those who make the greatest sacrifices for them, who stand closest to them, and who most wish to help them, are always the first to be sacrificed by them. One may help the Labour Party for one month, two months, three months, or four months; but the moment that one stops or makes a single independent step he is treated as a bitter enemy. After having been apparently trusted, he will be treated as if suspected from the first moment; he will be condemned as if he had attacked them from the outset. That is the treatment which follows alliances with political machines. One can ally himself with men; one could ally oneself with honorable members like the Prime Minister.

Mr. WATSON.—With whom is the honorable and learned member now allying himself? He will yet be thrown aside like a sucked orange.

Mr. HUGHES. — The honorable and learned member sought an alliance with the Labour Party.

Mr. DEAKIN.—It is perfectly true that I was prepared to ally myself with the Labour Party, and it is also true that I often suggested an honorable alliance. At those times, however, I always said, "Make your machine such that all those men who stand by you shall be treated as equal in every respect to members who subscribe to the labour pledge; divide your programme, separate the prophetic and impossible from the practical and useful, and then we can enter into a useful alliance with you." One could make such an alliance with men like the Prime Minister. It is not his men in the House I fear, but the machine. Most members are properly governed by a sense of loyalty, bred by alliance and action together—you can appeal to their conscience and judgment. But when you come to the machine, you are dealing with something which has no loyalty, no conscience, and no judgment.

Mr. WATSON.—What about the machine which the honorable and learned member recently inaugurated?

Mr. DEAKIN.—On the occasion of the inauguration to which the Prime Minister refers, I said from the platform that if the proposal of the organization was to create such a machine as I had been criticising I should be against it, as much as against that of the Labour Party. I do not wish to fight machine with machine, but to fight machine politics with the full freedom and independence of a representative of the people.

Mr. WATSON.—The silence of honorable members opposite is the result of the operation of a machine.

Mr. HUGHES.—Yes, they are all wound up and dare not go off.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I had no intention to detain the House at any greater length than might have been necessary to reply to the remarks of the Attorney-General last night. Having occupied some little time, and having allowed my blood to cool, I feel that I have replied perhaps too much in kind to the remarks of the Minister of External Affairs. If so, I have departed from my rule. The best way to meet angry attacks is to answer in another manner. If anything has been uttered below our high parliamentary level, I regret it. Up to now, we have, as a Parliament, established a standard of which we need not be ashamed, and I hope that we shall always be able to maintain it.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay—Minister of Trade and Customs).—It ought not to fall to me to reply to the speech which has just been delivered by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. His statement should have been made much earlier in this debate. As the leader of the Opposition the honorable and learned member should before this have informed honorable members and the country of the reasons for the attitude which he has adopted on this question. I should like to direct attention to one remark of the honorable and learned member with regard to the sacrifices which the operation of machine politics entail on every person who submits himself to their influence. He stated that every person who had allied himself with the Labour Party had been ultimately sacrificed. I would point out that he was speaking without a knowledge of his own country. In Queensland, every member who supported the Morgan Government and Labour Party was returned unopposed far as that party was concerned. The statement of the honorable and learned member therefore, conveyed quite a wrong impression.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I believe that, so far as Queensland is concerned, up to the present time, what the honorable member states is perfectly correct. Of course we have to see how matters will eventually work out there.

Mr. FISHER.—In the same way we have to see how the millenium will work out when it comes. No attempt was made to oppose the honorable member for Darling Downs, and rightly so, nor was any attempt made by the Labour Party to oppose the honorable member for Moreton. Why should an honorable member occupying such a position as that held by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat make such an accusation, even in the heat of debate.

Mr. DEAKIN.—All the seats which were at the last election were lost to members of the Labour Party.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—In South Australia did not oppose one Liberal.

Mr. LONSDALE.—In New South Wales the Labour Party put up candidates against members of our party who really were favorable to their principles.

Mr. FISHER.—If that be the charge made against our party, I accept it. The evidence before our own eyes justifies the action which we took. The Opposition comprises honorable members holding the most extreme views, and, as honest believers in certain principles, we were bound to tell the people of the country that we differed from these men. That being so, we should not have taken up an unworthy position had we sought to secure the return of others in the stead.

Mr. HUGHES.—A nominee of the right honorable member for East Sydney opposed me.

Mr. FISHER.—Why should so much unnecessary heat be displayed at the moment, when it is known that I am the only member of the Ministry who has spoken? Why this throwing down the gauntlet, when the Government has further opportunity to reply?

—The Postmaster-General taken.

R.—I had overlooked that ent, why should the suggesmade that the proceedings have been degraded? If the learned member feels that been degraded by reason of have recently been pursued, with him. Until the Labour session of the Treasury it could be found with the proceedings, but shortly after there was a noticeable falling the high level which had been falling away, however, was fault on the part of the of their supporters. As and learned member for Balpermitted to refer to one or matters, I trust that I shall the opportunity to reply to a ding the office which I hold.
and learned member for discussing the Ministerial state-cks ago, made a most unworthy ating in the broadest possible is not wise, in the public in-trust a Department, like that Customs, to a member of the s.—The right honorable memydney said that it was a mat-penny, but of many pennies,

ER.—He also remarked that ous to remain another day in y.—He withdrew that remark.

ER.—Certainly he did, and o not propose to refer to it.
ever had an opportunity to contemptible insinuation made able and learned member for h has been recorded on the nsard, and I therefore trust be permitted to briefly refer

KER.—I would point out to e gentleman that, when the d learned member for Bal-ned a certain question a ago, I prevented him from o discuss it, because I con-be beyond the scope of the unless the honorable the Minnect the matter to which he refers, with clause 48, I am afraid that I cannot hear him.

Mr. FISHER.—The statement made by the honorable and learned member for Parkes certainly touches the question of preference, because it clearly shows that he has no preference for members of the Labour Party. He asserted that, as we represented a class, it was unsafe to allow any member of the party to give decisions in matters relating to the Customs Department, inasmuch as he would favour a certain side. Could a more contemptible statement be made? It is to charges such as this that we are to submit without reply.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Did not the honorable and learned member for Parkes say that he wished to see the Labour Party come into power?

Mr. FISHER.—I do not think he did.
He told the House that it was the duty of his leader to call upon honorable members to remove the present Administration from power at the earliest possible moment, and that direct action must shortly be taken, with that object in view. Where are those honorable members who advocated the taking of direct action against the Government? Their attitude shows that they are wanting in that statesmanlike conduct which might reasonably be expected from those occupying high positions. It has been hinted by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat that the Government are endeavouring to obtain for unions more than they are entitled to, and that we are not taking care to safeguard the interests of non-unionists and the public generally.
That statement has been suggested by conservative minds in every age, since the struggles and trials of unionists began. It was said, at one time, that the leaders of unionists were blackguards, who were interfering with law and order, and endeavouring to prevent masters from carrying on their industries in the way they ought to do.
Trade unionists were reviled, and even suffered imprisonment; but ultimately they were recognised by law, and succeeded in accomplishing a great work. Mr. Herbert Paul, in A History of Modern England, states that trade unionists did more to uplift the masses of Great Britain during the last century than all that had ever been done at Westminster; that all the laws passed by the British Parliament, with a view to this end, sink into significance as compared with the good achieved by trade unions. That is the statement, not of a partisan, but of an historian, who has taken some interest in the question, and he is able to verify it by statistics and historical records. Is it not strange that there should be a fear that the leaders in these movements for reform will get too much? Is it not singular that nearly every one is to be left to lag behind, and more particularly those who have suffered in their efforts to improve the lot of their fellows? When I was but a lad, in my teens, I had to take part in a strike in which the workers were worsted, with the result that I was not allowed to return to my former place of employment. My tools were removed—

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—It was the tide which led to fortune.

Mr. FISHER.—I was first led to think of coming to Australia by the feeling that as a youth I had been treated unfairly in my native country. Is there anything wrong in that. My experience is that no man who is not competent can occupy a leading position in a trade union. The leading officers of those organizations are called upon to submit to a great deal of abuse, and unless we can offer them something in return for their self-sacrifice, where is the virtue in passing a Bill of this description? We are not asked to enact legislation which will confer no benefit upon unionists. Seeing that these men undertake to protect the rights of all engaged in their own particular calling, it is only fair that a preference should be extended to them, in order to prevent them being made the victims of injustice. At this stage I have no desire to make a lengthy speech, because I am aware that honorable members wish to take a vote upon this question. I should like to say, however, that I should have been very much better pleased if the right honorable member for East Sydney had more carefully chosen his language last evening, and if he had been more considerate of the feelings of others. The one taunt levelled against the Government in this House has been that we were clinging to this Bill, not that we might secure a workable measure of arbitration, but that we might remain in office for a few days longer. I say that there is not an honest man in the country who believes that charge. The desire to oust the Ministry does not arise from an honest difference of opinion as to whether a preference should be extended to unionists, but springs rather from the fact that we were allowed to accept office as a mark of grace, that we have done a great deal better than our opponents anticipated, and the country is beginning to realize that others are capable of carrying out the Government of the Commonwealth and that those who have been accustomed to regard themselves as the only persons able to administer its affairs are in a state of and trembling as to the result.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—The honorable gentleman, who has resumed his seat, has referred to the charge which has been levelled against the Opposition that its members have been "gagged" because they do not choose to enter into more or less useless discussion upon a much debated question. So far as there having been a caucus meeting in order to bring about any such result, no caucus has been held during the past two months. Moreover, no opinion has been expressed by the leader of the Opposition to the effect that honorable members upon this side of the House should abstain from addressing themselves to this question.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I saw four honorable members opposite holding another honorable member down.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Our side has been prompted simply by a desire to return to our homes at the end of the week, instead of being engaged in discussing a motion, the result of which is a foregone conclusion. Personally, I should have preferred that the Government had been subjected to a direct challenge or that this issue had been fought out in Committee. In any case, the result would have been the same. It is well known that the Ministry have no majority in this House. I say, further, that many honorable members upon this side of the chamber are twice as anxious as are half the members upon the opposite side to secure a workable measure of arbitration. They wish to see some of the provisions of this Bill amended in such a way that it may be made operative. They do not desire it to break down by reason of its own rigidity. The Ministry have chosen to make this question vital to their existence. I claim that the amendment to clause 48, which they have circulated, has been framed with a desire to escape from an awkward position. Their object was to make use of Pontifex Maximus; his deputy to amend the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corio.

which would enable them down, and thus secure the office. Such tactics show no more desire on the part of the members opposite to obnoxious Conciliation and Arbitration than there is on the part of the members upon this side of the Bill. It is perfectly true that the members of the Opposition are opposed to this class of Bill; it is equally true that seven-eighths of the members of the Opposition would prefer to see the Bill pass. It is idle for them to say that they are insincere. We have reason to believe that we are honestly determined to obtain a measure of conciliation irrespective of what may be in office. We shall support such legislation as is enacted. The Minister of External Affairs has said that the honorable members of the Opposition are just as sincere in their advocacy of a Bill of this character as he is. The learned member chose to utter an utter abnegation of principle for the motion now before the House. He accuses me of breaking my promise to the electors, and of so far discrediting himself politically that it will be impossible for me to be again re-elected. I have here the first of the electors of South Sydney. He may be excused to the extent of a rat caught in a trap, but he could do was to squeak, and I am sure for mercy. But nothing in his position justifies him in turning on the members who, on this side of the House, have worked most in accord with him. There is nothing to justify his turning on the honorable members as objects of his attack. I have here the first of the members when the second reading of the Bill was proposed. Though I do not occupy the time of the House by making lengthy extracts, I may be allowed to say that, on the 25th August, I committed myself very strongly in favour of compulsory conciliation and arbitration.

—Men cannot be judged by their votes as well as by their votes.

EDWARDS.—I shall also support the Bill which I gave. On that point I am sure.

of determining industrial war by arbitration is one to which I have committed myself. I have further committed myself to vote for the adoption of some such principle in relation to Federal legislation, and I find that I am compelled to vote for the second reading of this Bill. After a careful perusal of its provisions, however, I am forced to the conclusion that there is a great deal in it, which, when we go into Committee, I shall have to oppose very strongly in order that this measure may be brought within what, I think, are the only justifiable limits for us to adopt under the Constitution.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The honorable member desired to make the Bill unworkable.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I shall show by my votes that the honorable member is quite wrong in his assumption. What I desired was a workable Federal measure, and to that end I voted for the inclusion of the railway operatives. I expressed myself strongly in favour of that course; but I told the House plainly that there were many proposals which, in Committee, I should have to oppose. That was before the last election, during which I dealt with this question more fully in detail. While I agreed to support the measure, I did not agree in any way to give preference to unionists. Where is the abnegation of principle? The Minister of External Affairs, flourishing a paper as though it contained my signature, exclaimed, "The honorable member has broken his pledges in supporting this amendment." That paper did not bear my signature; and such is the contemptible political trickery adopted by the Minister of External Affairs! These are the facts; and I never wish to hide any of my political promises or actions: Mr. Robert Hollis, who is the organizing secretary of the Railway Servants' Association in Sydney, sent to me a circular during the election, with a request that I would say whether I would support the Bill or not. By some accident, however, that circular went to the wrong address, and did not reach me until after the election. Another gentleman, who, I think, is the organizing secretary of the Railway Servants' Association in Victoria, wrote to me after the election, asking whether I would be in my place in the House to support the inclusion of railway servants within the operation of this Bill; and the reply I sent was that I had supported that policy before, and would continue to support it. I never gave a pledge to any individual, or any body or organization, that I would support preference to unionists; because I believe that by adopting that preference to its fullest extent, we would make this measure anything but a boon to the whole working-class population of the Commonwealth. This is a measure for settling disputes between workmen and their employers, but there has been a systematic attempt all through to make it a measure in the interests of unionism; and that is what I object to. We ought to adopt any principle we can to get all disputes between the great body of the working classes, and the powerful body of employers, settled by peaceable means; and I have gone as far as any honorable member, and a good deal further than some, in endeavouring to make this Bill more operative on its conciliation side. Yet, because I choose to think that the Bill can be made all the more operative by limiting the preference given to unionists, I am subjected to those charges of breaking my political promises and pledges—charges made by a man whose political ideal has more in common with my own than it has, perhaps, with the ideal of any other honorable member. What the honorable and learned member for Ballarat said this afternoon—and it has been said before—is very true, namely, that these caucus-bound, league-tied bodies, are more bitterly opposed to any one who is somewhat in sympathy with them, and yet remains outside their iron ring, than they are to the most bigoted conservative in the country. I have the greatest respect for most of the members of the Labour Party. I do not know that there is any man in the public life of the Commonwealth for whom I have greater respect than I have for the Prime Minister; and I did hope that when he took office, he would break down this caucus rule, and open the doors of the Labour Party more widely and freely for the admission of other democrats, so as to make a workable party, which might survive and govern. But the party takes up a clause like this, without reference to their own individual opinions; simply because the strings are pulled in the leagues and unions. They say, "We must have this clause, or otherwise we cannot control the political machinery and organizations behind us, and must be bound to lose." The members on this side of the House, who are supporting this measure from a clear conviction of its usefulness, have nothing to gain. What does it matter to most of us whether we sit on the green seats on the Ministerial side, or the green seats on the Opposition side? We are doing what we think is best in the interests, not of unionism, but of labour and industrial peace. Legislation of this kind ought to have been the death-knell of unionism. We hear talk about having given up the power to strike; employers are giving up freedom of contract, so that there are concessions on both sides. But if it is sought to put unions, with all their political complications and ramifications, and give them preference, then the measure, being one to assist the working classes, prove the most powerful engine of oppression and tyranny that could be devised. It is in the interests of the great body of the working classes that I am casting my vote to-night, to retain the clause inserted in the Bill.

Mr. G. B. Edwards.

Mr. WEBSTER.—So as to kill

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—No

Mr. WEBSTER.—Undoubtedly

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The honorable member has been hurled back that those who are at the extremes are the very men who will prevent the attainment of industrial peace which is the aim of the Bill and prevent its being passed.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Can the honorable member get what he desires from the enemies of the Bill on the Opposition side?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I cannot answer the honorable member; his questions are too much for me, and, generally, have nothing in them to answer. I believe in my heart that some concession as this is necessary. I am personally interested in it. I have been a member of an employers' association. But I am an employer myself. I desire to see that commercial and industrial peace which I believe springs from the action of unions. I maintain that we cannot have industrial peace so long as the action of unions have a preference to other classes of men not entitled by any principle or by any honest action of the Government of this country. My belief is that legislation is passed by unions of the working classes which can pass away, and the new legislation which this Bill contemplates—substitution of those employed in the place of the employer—take their place. Why should the employer at the present time be in a position to employ unionists? Because in some instances employers find it more profitable to employ union workmen. In this Bill an employer must pay wages to one class of men in the place of another and for the same services as to a

the desire to employ non-unionists, and the distinction between unionists and non-unionists will

I am pleading for free-trade workers of this country, prepared to fight this battle in any way if need be. I have no doubt they will come back victorious.

MR. BASS.—Considering the debate which has taken place, it is interesting to know what it is all about. We are here not to represent any party, but to represent Australia at the present time I am attached to the Government.

Therefore, I can speak freely upon this question. I think that a new departure has been made and that a new method has been adopted in dealing with the legislative Council of the Commonwealth, I am driven to the conclusion that there must be some change.

It has been stated to-day that what has taken place has been to catch the vote of the Chairmen. I do not think it reasonable that an honorable member should be so important and honorable.

A Chairman of Committees would not stifle discussion. Because of the amendment which is now before the House, it solves the stifling of discussion.

It is understood that the aim of the Chairman of Committees when he is asked to give it in such a way as to afford an opportunity for the consideration of the question.

I do not think it probable that the Chairman of Committees will be found to be of vast importance to the members of the House, and to others who are interested in the industrial questions affecting the Bill. We are asked to decide by a majority shall rule. The learned member for Corinella has no difficulty in proving this.

I should like to know whether he proposes to ascertain the number of those engaged in the boot trade? I venture to say it is impossible to ascertain the number of those employed in any industry in the country.

We have had a little experience of the difficulty of ascertaining the number of electors there are in the various States of Australia. It seems impossible to find out the number of men in a particular district.

It is difficult to find out how many persons are affected by a particular trade dispute. I am not at all afraid of the threat which has been thrown out by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, that those honorable members who sit in the corner where I occupy a seat will find it a disadvantage when they go before the electors if they vote against the amendment.

I am one of those who intend to vote for what he considers to be right, irrespective of whether that vote commends itself to the electors of any particular district or not. I am here to do my duty, and intend to do it. If the electors do not like it they can place me at the bottom of the poll. But I should not like to go back to them and have to admit that, having been elected as a democrat and protectionist, I had joined the Free-trade Party.

I am aware that that point is outside the limits of the present discussion, and as I wish to confine my remarks within proper lines I will proceed no further with it. I repeat that I believe that it is impossible to find out the number of persons engaged in the industries of this country. Take, for instance, the boot trade. How would honorable members opposite propose to find out how many persons in Victoria alone are interested in the boot trade? How would they propose to ascertain how many shearers or wharf labourers there are, or how many workmen are interested in other occupations? People in this country vary their occupations frequently. Sometimes they are doing one thing, sometimes another. Statistics are unreliable, because the occupations of the people change so much. A man may be engaged in mining this week; in a few weeks' time he may be engaged in quite another occupation. It is only fair and reasonable, seeing that the Bill has been under discussion for a considerable time, that amendments have been made in it, and that the Prime Minister intimated that he intended to ask the House to recommit the measure, that the majority of honorable members should allow that reconsideration to take place. I cannot understand why the closure should be exercised. Some question has been raised with regard to the circumstances under which the vote upon the question under discussion was formerly taken. It was a hurried vote. Many honorable members had left the chamber in order to get ready to go to other States. After the division bell had been ringing for some time an honorable member came to me and asked me to request Mr. Speaker to repeat the question, because he feared that I was making a mistake. I was in the chamber during the whole of the discussion, because I had no train to catch. But many honorable members came in at the last moment. One honorable member told me on the following day that he knew that he had made a mistake. He had intended to vote the other way. But because some honorable members have a desire to find seats on the Ministerial side of the chamber they are prepared to throw in their weight against the Government, with the hope of taking their places. It matters not to me which side of the House I sit upon, so long as I can secure the legislation which I think is in the interests of the Commonwealth. But I do like every one to be straightforward and honorable in his methods, and I do not consider that it is straightforward and honorable to prevent the House from going into Committee in order to reconsider a question of this kind. Therefore I intend to vote with the Government. I shall do so, not because they are a Labour Ministry, nor because certain gentlemen at present occupy the Opposition benches; but because I believe in fair play, and in being straightforward and above board.

Mr. BAMFORD (Herbert).—I shall not detain the House very long; but I wish to say a few words before the division is taken. I desire, in the first place, to ask the honorable and learned member for Corinella, who is responsible for the proviso in regard to which there has been so much debate, what he really means by it? The honorable and learned member for Indi pointed out last night how little effect it would have if carried in its present form, and no attempt has been made to answer his arguments. There are one or two members of the legal fraternity at present on the Opposition benches, and I ask them to say what the position really means? What is meant by the words "a majority of those affected by the award who have interests in common with the applicants"? In some districts would not almost every person residing there be so affected? Take the coal-mining district of Korumburra, in Gippsland, for example. Would not almost every person residing in that district be affected, either directly or indirectly, by an award? I would also ask, how is the opinion of the majority affected to be obtained, when a question concerning the seamen, the wharf labourers, the coal miners, and other large bodies of employes arises? Every member of the industry would have to be individually consulted in order to obtain the opinion of the majority, and it would be utterly impossible to follow such a course as that.

Mr. McCAY.—I think that the honorable member misapprehends the meaning of the words which he has quoted.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Possibly I do; members of the legal fraternity so twist and alter every phrase that they set themselves to explain, that finally not even they themselves know what it means. What would the honorable and learned member do if he were engaged to oppose an application for preference made by an industrial union? Would he not ask who were the people affected, and whether the union represented a majority of them? Would he not make an attempt to remove most of the difficulties I have suggested? To my mind, the phraseology of the proviso is very loose indeed, and if we had an opportunity for the reconsideration of it, it is so unhappily being refused us, I would move to amend the proviso, so as to make it read—

A majority of those affected by the award have industrial interests in common with the applicants.

That would considerably limit its application, and make it easier to obtain an award than it would be under the proviso as it stands.

Mr. TUDOR.—Honorable members of the Opposition would not agree to that.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Honorable members do not wish to give an opportunity for reconsideration of the clause. All they desire is to cross over to these benches, and we have graced for such a brief period. The honorable member for South Sydney gave the whole case away when he said that by the operation of a common rule, the wages would be paid to unionists and non-unionists alike. As has been pointed out on many occasions, that is what we desire to avoid. We wish to give preference to unionists. If a non-unionist can compel an employer to pay the same wages as are paid to a unionist, how can men be induced to join the unions? If, under those circumstances, a man was asked to become a member of an industrial organization, he would say, "What benefit will it do me to join a union? What benefit is it to be a member of a union unless one can thereby get a preference?" Referring to the attitude of erally in this matter, I canering that they have stooped have done. The standard morality raised by the Lais so high that a man upright beneath it; but of political morality of members opposite has been to get underneath it one must

One of the first speeches Chamber after the meeting al Parliament here must every man who listened to I refer to the speech of
and learned member for ooke about the rarer atmos-ral politics, and, in castigatember, said that he was sorry stooped so low. But he mighty fallen! The d learned member who rarer atmosphere in Federal w sitting with those who move in an impure and much eric stratum. The honorable ember for Ballarat has agreed right honorable member for o lead the attack on the Goes; but has the right honor-the confidence of the people nwealth? I say that he has

—He has certainly not the ne people of Victoria.

ORD.—The right honorable have the confidence of the st Sydney, but he has not of the people of New South right honorable gentleman
mand the confidence of the state in which he was Premier s, and he was afraid to stake at the last election, notwith-that had been said in this s popularity. He challenged member for Hume on the House, and threatened him
d penalties at election time; time came to put his threats he had not the courage of ut allowed one of his lieutensacrificed on the altar of free-say that honorable members come to a division, I have at we should settle the quesor the other for some time ults of the approaching vote well forecasted, and I regret at those honorable members who seem to have the numbers on their side should have declined to allow the Bill to be recommitted. The proviso adopted at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella was carried by a snatch vote, and if the honorable and learned member had been possessed of those gentlemanly instincts to which he has laid claim, he would never have sprung a surprise of this nature upon the House.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I deprecate exceedingly the very personal tone adopted by the Minister of External Affairs. His attack upon the honorable and learned member for Ballarat was absolutely undeserved. If honorable members were asked by their vote to show the respect and honour in which they hold the honorable and learned member for his sincerity and consistency in this matter, I am sure they would heartily respond, and that the Minister of External Affairs would stand alone.
We should do everything we can to preserve the dignity and honour of Parliament, and all personal bitterness should be avoided in discussions of this kind. After careful consideration, I have decided to maintain the attitude which I assumed on a previous occasion. In the first instance, I voted against preference to unionists altogether. I then said that I would support preference to unionists, only so long as the organizations had no political objects, and refrained from devoting their funds to political purposes. I consequently voted against the original clause, and I supported the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, because I was only too glad, at that time, to defeat the object of the clause. I thoroughly agree with the attitude taken up by the Government in assuming that the clause, in its present shape, would entirely fail to achieve its original object, and that the provision as to the granting of preference would become a mere farce. According to Hansard, I spoke on 29th June as follows:—

I am in favour of the principle of the amendment, however, because, while I do not think it necessary that the organizations registered under the Bill should have been formed solely to carry out its purposes, I think that they should exist solely for that object. If existing organizations purge themselves of their political and philanthropic characteristics, and become organizations existing solely to carry out the purposes of the Bill, I would have no objection to men being compelled to join them, and my objection to the principle of preference to unionists would at once be removed. . . . If the unions turn their attention to industrial matters, apart from any political objects, there will be no desire to prevent unionists from securing preferential treatment.

My statement was cheered by a number of honorable members, and I remember distinctly that the honorable member for New England stated that he perfectly agreed with me, and that he was prepared to accept the principle of preference to unionists if the unions were purged of their political features. Since then the conditions have been entirely changed, because the Government have accepted amendments which will prevent a preference being given to the members of an organization with political objects, or whose funds are devoted to political purposes. Therefore, my objection to the granting of preference has been removed. I should prefer to see the present Government carry the Bill through, because I believe that they honestly intend to give effect to it. I could have no sympathy with a Government whose supporters embraced from eleven to thirteen honorable members who desired to destroy the Bill. Such honorable members would wield an influence which would be sufficiently strong to paralyze the arm of the leader of any new Government, and I think that all those honorable members who advocate conciliation and arbitration should support the motion for the recommittal of the Bill. We should remember what was done at the caucus meeting of the party to which I belong. The following resolution was adopted:—

That this party is not prepared to consider proposals for a coalition, except on condition that the Prime Ministership of any coalition be accorded to the present leader of this party.

That decision was arrived at at a meeting of the Liberal Party, and yet we find the honorable and learned member for Ballarat no longer occupying the position of Leader of the Opposition, and refusing to take office. The right honorable member for East Sydney would probably be at the head of the new Government.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is not in order in discussing that question.

Mr. CROUCH.—It is just as well that this matter should be settled. If I am not to be permitted to discuss it, it will be useless for me to proceed any further. The amendment proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corinella is not an attack upon clause 48, but an attempt to take the business of the House out of the hands of the Government. It is equivalent to a vote of want of confidence, and I contend that I should be permitted to discuss the whole of the policy of the present Ministry, and also to refer to the probable consequences of the Bill about to be given.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have already said more than once that the question before the Chair is, so far as I know, not one of confidence, or want of confidence, in Government, but whether certain words shall or shall not be omitted from the motion which has been moved by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister moved the recommittal of certain clauses and the honorable and learned member Corinella has moved that the figures "48" should be struck out of the motion. The effect of adopting his amendment would be to prevent the recommittal of clause 48. I know nothing more than that, and must, as far as practicable, confine the debate to the question which I have stated.

Mr. CROUCH.—You say, sir, that you know nothing more than that which you have stated, and I therefore propose to place some further information before you. It would be most unfortunate if we were to remain in ignorance of the statement made by the Prime Minister in the House, and in your presence, that if his amendment were carried the Government would resign.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable and learned member will recognise that no statement of information as that can alter the facts before me. The facts set out in the newspaper, and which have just been read to me, are the only ones on which I may proceed. Throughout the debate I have heard frequent complaints as to the discussion being confined within narrow limits, but that would not be the case if the honorable and learned member's contentions were correct. The fact that the fate of the Government depends on this issue is not one which can be debated, except incidentally. That it can be incidentally referred to is evident, because the honorable and learned member has dealt with it that way, and while he so treated it, I cannot stop him. When, however, he proceeded to debate the general question, to discuss the relative merits of the present Government and its possible successors, he was bound to prevent him from proceeding further in that direction, because that would take the debate entirely beyond the question before the Chair.

Mr. CROUCH.—Let me put before you, sir, some of the facts which have been mentioned during the debate. The Prime stated that if the amendment will resign, and the honorable member for Corral also informed the House aware from certain state- outside by the honorable he will take the course indi- ve likewise heard the matter the honorable and learned Ballarat, but, unfortunately, rable member for East Syd- leader of the Opposition, re to take part in the de- norable and learned member id that he knew he was dis- on on which the fate of the epended, and every member ury, save the Postmaster- aid that that is so. I propose those statements, deliberately correct. I think that the ave too much good sense to be fulfilled.

KER.—I am sure that the learned member desires to the limits of debate, and hav- se facts, I ask him now to cuss clause 48.

CH.—If the closure be once s way it will give rise to a s similar to that following the the closure in the House of ere it afterwards applied most rds those who caused its f the leader of the Oppo- honorable and learned mem- arat allow your ruling, Mr. ss without criticism, a danger- will be created. I appeal e of parties to see that the rable members are not unduly ut if I do not receive the n I expect from them, I must he consideration of the clause. discuss the fiscal side of this ave to recognise in the first e amendment is being sup- majority of the members of e party, and that it is also silent support of a large ectionists, who are apparently w themselves to be absorbed rade Opposition. I desire will happen to the industries f we permit the leader of the position to take possession of benches. I fail to see why ists who are fighting with the

Mr. SPEAKER.—During the debate I have repeatedly prevented honorable members from discussing the fiscal issue, and if I were now to permit the honorable and learned member to deal with it I should be guilty of a distinct injustice to those honorable members. I must therefore apply to the honorable and learned member the same rule that I have done to others.

Mr. CROUCH.—That would be the position, sir, unless a new view were presented to your mind. Unlike the right honorable member for East Sydney, I shall not deal with the general question, and then find in the end that I am unable to connect it with the matter immediately before the Chair. It is admitted that we cannot have protection for the manufacturer without protection for the worker, and that we cannot have preference for unionists unless we have preference for manufacturers. I have already pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that you allowed the Minister of External Affairs to diverge from the ordinary channel of debate, and I desire to present a new view of the position to you. I wish to show that the fiscal issue and the question of preference are cognate subjects. I find it absolutely impossible to deal with unionism and preference without showing that the manufacturer and the capitalist are entitled to a similar preference when opposed to outside competitors.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I cannot adopt the honorable and learned member's view of the position. It seems to me that, while casual reference to these matters has undoubtedly been permitted, I cannot, in pursuance of my duties, allow the honorable and learned member to discuss the fiscal issue in any form whatever. There is a certain course open to the honorable and learned member, and I must ask him to observe the rule I have already laid down, or move that the House disagree with my ruling; in which case he will be able to take the sense of honorable members on the point.

Mr. CROUCH.—As a junior member of the House, Mr. Speaker, I am too indebted to you for your courtesy and guidance to attempt to contest your ruling; but I desire to say, with all respect, that I think my contention is correct. I shall not, however, take any such step as I think I might justifiably take, but shall accept your ruling. I wish to refer to the position of the present Treasurer leaving office and being succeeded by an extravagant Treasurer, in the person of the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He has the most economical record of any Treasurer of New South Wales.

Mr. CROUCH.—I desire to show that if the leader of the Opposition becomes Prime Minister a large amount of loan money will almost certainly be expended. When he was Treasurer of New South Wales he spent very considerable sums of Savings Bank money.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have already asked the honorable and learned member to do one of two things—either to take the proper course of moving dissent from my ruling, or to discuss clause 48. I must ask him not to continue in his endeavour to introduce distinctly irrelevant matter.

Mr. CROUCH.—I should like to be permitted to show that unionists deposit their money chiefly with the Savings Banks, and that consequently the honorable and learned member for East Sydney showed preference for unionists' money.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the honorable and learned member will not take one of the two courses I have indicated, I shall have to ask him to conclude his speech, and to call upon some other honorable member.

Mr. CROUCH.—I am exceedingly sorry that the area covered by this debate is of such a limited character. If I am able to show that the proposal of the honorable and learned member for Corinella has had the effect of absolutely "gagging" this House, the Ministry, and its supporters—

Mr. KENNEDY.—I rise to a point of order. I desire to know whether the honorable and learned member is in order in attributing to another honorable member the "gagging" of the House, seeing that the procedure which has been adopted is in accordance with the Standing Orders?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I would ask the honorable and learned member to withdraw the statement to which objection has been taken.

Mr. CROUCH.—I withdraw it. I repeat that the House is prevented from clearly expressing its opinion upon this question. I am satisfied with being stopped from speaking, as it will show that owing to the unprecedented procedure which has been adopted, the Ministry and their supporters are denied an opportunity of justifying themselves before the country. I am not a member of the Labour Party, but I am strongly opposed to the Free-trade Party in every direction, and I therefore intend to vote with the Government.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas). — I do propose to discuss this question exhaustively as I should have done had the forms the House permitted me. One of the points says, "Things are not what they seem." The truth underlying that statement is abundantly exemplified upon the present occasion. Honorable members are invited to debate the question of whether the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill shall be committed with a view to reconsider clause 48. That is the seeming purpose of the amendment which has engaged the attention of this House for the past thirty days. Although you, sir, have no official knowledge of the fact, we are all aware that that is not the real question which is exercising the minds of honorable members. The real issue is, "Shall the present Government continue to occupy the Treasury benches, or shall they give place to certain honorable members who now sit upon the Opposition side of the House?" When the present Ministry assumed office, there was raised that if they were given a three weeks' trial—in other words, if they were allowed rope enough, they would hang themselves. Evidently that prediction has been falsified, otherwise the Opposition would scarcely adopt the roundabout method of bludgeoning Ministers upon their proposal to recommit clause 48 instead of engaging them in a straight-out fight. A similar attempt to bludgeon the Government was made in Committee, but honorable members opposite were defeated by a majority of one. Now they hope to accomplish in the House what they failed to achieve in Committee. It has been urged that the Government ought to have made this question a vital one. What is the meaning of the amendment proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corinella? It means taking the business of the House out of the hands of the Government. I trust that those members of the Opposition who may soon occupy the Treasury benches, will not be so completely lost to sight as to retain Ministerial office if they are defeated under similar circumstances. It is not creditable to those who are responsible for the present position that they refused to submit a motion of no-confidence, under cover of which the merits or demerits of the present Administration could have been discussed. The real question involved in this debate is not one of granting a preference to unionists but of extending a preference to honorable on the Opposition side of the have grown tired of sitting on that clause 48, in the form of Government proposed to amend it, with my approval. I regret very much their desire to meet the views of honorable members, whom they create sincere desire to secure a measure of compulsory arbitration, they have conceded more than they should have now awakened to the real issue before the House is reference to unionists, but of certain honorable members.

MR.—We went to the last extreme of the Bill.

MR. N.—Under the circumstances my vote on this issue with the Government although I do not know that as submitted is one I should have before my constituents.

MR. CARPENTER (Fremantle).—I am much that the action of the honorable member for Corinella prevents honorable members to consider in this matter which is altogether new, in my opinion, is of the very importance. If we could have got the Bill, and I could have had an opportunity to ask honorable members to question to which I refer, I am sure they would sympathize with the Government. The position arises from the Bill substituted by the honorable member for Corinella, either at the suggestion of other honorable members or own initiative. I feel sure of the result which I propose to discuss even those on the other side, who are opposed to compulsory arbitration as, at least, of some importance in the first place, however, I will say a few words in regard to the Bill by the honorable member for Ballarat. I must express my surprise at the unwonted heat of the honorable and learned member in the debate. Such warmth I have with him. So far as I am not aware that the honorable member has ever gone so far in his feelings, and in bringing himself into conflict with the forms of the Bill as this afternoon.

MR. CARPENTER.—The honorable member was "hard hit."

MR. CARPENTER.—If to be told the "hard hit," I can understand the remarks of the Minister of External Affairs having such an effect on the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. I wish to discuss the matter before us with as little heat as possible, but at the same time to express my opinion in a very straightforward way, without mincing my words in the least degree. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat, pointing his finger somewhat dramatically at honorable members who sit on the Government cross benches, affected to warn them of something that would happen as a consequence of their support being given to Ministers on this question. The reason given by the honorable and learned member for the warning was that the Labour Party are always most bitterly opposed to those who are most closely allied to them, and who desire to help that party to carry out their measures.

MR. KENNEDY.—The honorable and learned member could speak with some experience in that respect.

MR. CARPENTER.—I do not know what the honorable and learned member's experience has been. I am only concerned in expressing my own views. Whether it be a question of preference to unionists, the qualifications necessary to obtain preference, or any other matter affecting the interests of workers, the latter take a keen interest to-day—an interest keener, perhaps, than in days gone by—in what goes on in this and other Parliaments. They take note of members who, on the platform, express on broad general principles all sorts of sympathy with the labour movement, but who, when they are elected, at once begin to water down their principles, with the result, again and again, of emasculating measures to such an extent as to render them of no benefit to those who hoped so much.

MR. WILKS.—The Government accepted a clause which struck politics out of the Bill.

MR. FISHER.—The Government went to the last extremity to save the Bill; and the honorable member for Dalley knows it.

MR. CARPENTER.—Why is it that the Labour Party have to oppose men who work and fight with us in nine battles out of ten? The fact is, that there always comes a time when we have to deal with a crucial question. When we come to the last ditch our false friends desert us; and it is of those false friends of whom the outside electors take note, and whom we shall have to fight when the elections come round. We do not fight such men because they are our friends, but because they profess to be our friends, and, when the test is applied, desert us, and fight against us with our bitter opponents. I am glad to be able to say that, so far as I know, the personal relations of members on either side of the House are as good as they could be, and I hope that will always be so, in spite of our great political differences. But outside the House we have to deal with those who have been referred to as "our masters." Those are the people who make our politics for us, and who say who shall be opposed and who supported; and the choice then rests not on personal like or dislike, but simply on the distinction inevitably made between friends and foes. When the honorable and learned member for Ballarat warns honorable members, I reply that so long as he has been true to the people, who sent him to this or any other Parliament, they have been true to him. If, in the case of that honorable and learned member, and of any other honorable members, there is now a breaking away, it is not because the people are less true to them, but simply because the people suspect them of falling away from political grace. I hope that before we have to go to the electors on this or any other question, those honorable members to whom I refer will give some signs of repentance, and that there will be no necessity whatever to oppose candidates whom we should like to have with us fighting in the interests of the people. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat sought to show that there was really no difference between the amendment which was carried on a snatch vote in Committee and the amendment which the Government desire to propose. I am aware that legal gentlemen have a great deal of subtlety, and can associate different ideas with the same words; but when the honorable and learned member seeks to tell us that it is only necessary to satisfy the Court that a majority connected with the trade are represented in order to have preference granted, I say he is not correctly interpreting the proviso inserted at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella. If it were simply a question of satisfying the Court that there was a majority connected with that industry, I could understand the objection to making any alteration. But I would point out that the amendment goes very much further than that. The proposal of the honorable and learned member for Corinella reads—

Mr. Carpenter.

And provided further that no such preference shall be directed to be given unless the application for such preference is in the opinion of the Court approved by a majority of those affected by the award, who have interests in common with the applicants.

Who is going to determine how many people have interests in common with the applicants, and who those people are?

Mr. CONROY.—The Court will decide that.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Who is going to decide whether the majority is in favour of the application for preference? If the legal members opposite are so willing to leave it to the Court, why do they not accept the proposal of the Government, who simply says to the Court, "If you are satisfied that the applicants substantially represent the industry, you can give preference."

Mr. LONSDALE.—What is the difference?

Mr. CARPENTER.—If the honorable member cannot see the difference he cannot see much. Here is a direct statement that there has to be proof that a majority have approved of the application being made. Not only that, but a majority of those affected by the award, a majority of those who have interests in common with the applicants must also approve of the application. The objection seems to me to be so plain that I wonder how any honorable member opposite can give his adherence to the proposal, and expect that anything workable will come out of it. Take my own trade. We have in Western Australia a Boilermakers' Association, in which I make it to say all the competent men in the trade are enrolled. Outside that association there is a floating number of men who have a smattering of knowledge of the trade, and who go away to the north and north-west portions of the country engaging themselves casually in certain of the simpler branches of the trade. Those men cannot belong to the union, because they are not tradesmen. Probably they would not join it if they were, because the work in the part of the country where they live is so intermittent that they have to get a day's work here and there, and then turn their hands to other occupations.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What is the qualification for membership of the union?

Mr. CARPENTER.—The usual qualification is having served an apprenticeship to the trade.

ORREST.—Cannot a man be a wise?

CARPENTER.—No; having served to the trade is a very necessity. These men who are not all, and who merely do a day's trade now and then, would, in division, claim to be connected with the trade, and to be affected by the trade. Would it be possible for the Government to give the Court any evidence that these men approved or did not approve of the application? They could not do it.

ORREST.—The amendment of the Bill requires that the members shall be substantially represented.

CARPENTER.—No one would disapprove of an Association, covering the chief of the State, substantially representing the State. In a case of this kind, the Government should be paid to those who have practical experience of what they are doing. If the question under consideration is an agricultural one, I should like all times to listen to the agriculturists, and to take advice from them. I should like to know that they knew more about the matter. It would be folly for me, as a Minister, to rely on a theoretical knowledge of the matter, to go to pit that knowledge against practical experience. In this case, I should like to hear the honorable members on this side of the House who have some practical knowledge of the matter dealing with. Nevertheless, the honorable members opposite refuse to pay attention to what we say. There is evidence that the question is decided on its merits. There is a combination of parties, who take pleasure in refusing to allow any fresh light to be forced upon their minds. I should like the Ministry upon having decided what they have done, and re-elected to office if the vote is cast against them.

We have been taunted again because the Government have accepted amendments, and have been defeated by the Opposition half way. We have been taunted with backing down, and sacrificing everything for the purporting office. The answer is that the Government stand upon which there is going to be no backing down. Wherever there has been a prospect of improving the law, the Government have been prepared to meet the Opposition half way. But honorable members are now insisting upon an amendment which would take all the vitality out of the Bill, and make it unworkable. I am proud to sit behind a Government which says that rather than put through a make-belief Bill they will resign office, and allow others to take their places. I am sure that the great public of Australia will approve of their action.

Mr. FISHER.—If we agreed to this amendment honorable members opposite would immediately propose something else.

Mr. CARPENTER.—There is no satisfying those who oppose, simply because they sit in Opposition, and who have no desire to pass legislation unless they have the sole direction of it. It has been claimed that, in the present instance, honorable members opposite are simply doing what was done in connexion with another part of the Bill some three months ago, when the previous occupants of the Treasury benches took a similar stand. There is no parallel whatever. I think I can speak for every honorable member in the party behind the Government, when I say that it was with very much regret that we heard that the ex-Prime Minister intended to take the stand that he did in connexion with the amendment relating to the railway servants. I should have preferred him to remain in office, and would have given him a loyal assistance in perfecting the measure.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—He made a mistake.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I am inclined to think that the honorable and learned gentleman has now come to that conclusion himself.

Mr. KENNEDY.—He is more convinced than ever that he was right.

Mr. CARPENTER.—If the ex-Prime Minister thinks that he was right, I am very sorry indeed for the position in which he finds himself to-day. I believe that the honorable and learned member, who has moved this amendment, is acting on his own initiative. But his conduct resembles that of the cat in the fable. Honorable members will remember that the monkey made use of the cat's paw to pull the chestnut out of the fire. It has been said by some honorable members that that is not so, and I accept the disclaimer. But I should like the leader of the Opposition to attend in the chamber, and give us some reason for what is being done. The people of Australia have a right to be suspicious of a leader who, at a time like this, is conspicuous by his absence. If those who are following him have confidence in him, they are very easily pleased. The people outside are watching what is being done here. They are following the actions of honorable members who have pledged themselves to pass a workable Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. In the report of the general secretary to the Victorian Amalgamated Miners' Association, just published, I find these words—

Almost every one admits the necessity of unions, and that all workers should be members of same, yet Mr. McCay is endeavouring to put a sprag in the wheel of the unionistic coach, and prevent its progress. The opponents of the measure will again support him, but I trust those members who pose as workers' friends will now see their way clear to vote in favour of the excision of Mr. McCay's amendment, and then there is no doubt that the Bill will speedily become law.

The miners of Maldon, Talbot, Maryborough, and other Victorian mining centres, are looking for the passing of this measure, and are hoping that their representatives will stand by it. They are watching very keenly the action of honorable members who are supporting those who are referred to as the opponents of industrial arbitration.

Mr. SALMON.—The Government did not expect me to support them. Over three weeks ago a member of the Government asked the miners in my district to put a labour man in my place.

Mr. FISHER.—Is that why the honorable member is now opposed to arbitration?

Mr. SALMON.—I mention the matter merely to show that the Government did not expect to get my vote.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I did not wish to refer to the honorable member personally; he has projected himself into the debate; but the remarks which I have read deal with those who have been with us hitherto, and are now turning their backs on the measure. I will not discuss what may take place between the honorable member and his constituents.

Mr. SALMON.—The honorable member was discussing my position. The places he mentioned are in my electorate.

Mr. CARPENTER.—In discussing questions affecting the workers, we have heard those who attack the Labour Party say that they are as good as labour men.

Mr. CROUCH.—Who has said that?

Mr. CARPENTER.—If the honorable and learned member has not said it, I am sure that he thinks it. But while I have heard both Conservatives and Liberals claim to be as good as labour men, I have never heard any one claim to be as good as a Conservative or as good as a Liberal.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is the honorable member now discussing clause 48?

Mr. CARPENTER.—I am replying to the honorable member for Laanecoorie. I do not, however, wish to refer to anything which is not strictly relevant. At the commencement of my remarks, I spoke of a matter which I do not think had been mentioned before, though I have discussed it with one or two honorable members, and hope to bring it forward in Committee. It is of the utmost importance, and may have considerable effect on the future of the Bill. Western Australia has been particularly referred to while the measure has been under discussion. We have been told that, in that State, the Act, which does not give preference to unionists, has worked well. But there has been continuous agitation for such an amendment of the Act as will give preference to unionists, and that agitation will stop until the desired end is achieved. There are always a few amongst the work classes, as amongst other classes, who are not prepared to take all the benefits they can get from the exertions of others, but will do nothing to help themselves. The men who speak of are willing to join unions to obtain awards from the Court, but an award having been obtained, they say, "Why should we continue to subscribe to the union?" The Arbitration Court will keep up our wages. That is a short-sighted view to take. In any case if it had not been for the creation of the union, they could not have applied to the Arbitration Court in the first instance. It is necessary to give preference to unionists to meet the objections of men of this stamp. If there were many such men, of course, there would be no such thing as industrial arbitration. But the more important matter to which I wish to refer is this: We have in the Western Australian Act a provision similar to that in the clause which has been so much discussed, and which, I believe, purports to be a copy of it—I refer to the sub-clause which allows the Court to fix the minimum wage in an industry. I suppose that most honorable members understand the meaning of those words. We are accustomed to the term on account of the minimum wage which is fixed generally by our trades unions. When we fix a minimum wage we intend that no man taking men on the average—shall work for less than that wage; but the employer can more. It was on the basis that the words were inserted in the Australian Act; but, when some time after the Act was passed, an interpretation that was unexpected was placed upon it, to believe that even the right member for Swan, who had a good knowledge of the passing of the measure, had not seen that such an interpretation was possible. This is what the Judge said. The wages which have been fixed by the Act, I desire to point out that they are not only the rate only. The Act under which the Court is to fix these rates by section 48, in its award, may prescribe a rate of wage, or other remuneration, or special provisions for a lower rate.

For those who, through incapacity, are not capable of doing their own work.

It is what we are authorized to do. It will be observed that the Legislature does not authorize the Court to fix wages, but "to prescribe a minimum wage or other remuneration" (section 48). I take it that the meaning of that is that the Court is to fix what is a fair wage that shall be paid to the particular trade possessing the experience.

Honorable member expect such action to be placed upon the Bill? The words there are intended to convey what is understood by the members, namely, that an average wage, and that every man who is worthy to be employed shall receive more than the rate fixed. The Bill is placed upon the term "minimum wage" in Western Australia was such a measure fixed the minimum wage for a competent worker in an industry, and it is left to the employer to grade his men from that. The Judge expects that the employers, whilst paying the lowest wage to the least competent of their workmen, would grade them in such a way that they would be more to average men than the minimum rate. In almost every case, in which the minimum wage has been fixed, the least competent employer brought down the minimum rate. As a consequence, there has been continual friction, and last week a deputation waited on the Premier of Western Australia, to have the Act might be amended to correct the effects of the interpretation now placed upon the term "minimum wage." I had intended to ask honorable members to insert in clause 48 some words which would make it plain that the term was to be interpreted in the way in which it was understood by trades unionists. Unless that is done, we shall probably have the same experience in connexion with this Bill that has been passed through in Western Australia. The action of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and those who are associated with him, will prevent me from adopting this course, and I fear that, even if the Bill is passed eventually, it will fall very much short of what we desire. Honorable members know how precedents are followed in the law courts, and that on occasions they have been almost the sole basis of very extraordinary decisions. Only recently a lady applied for admission to the Bar in Western Australia, and the only reason given for refusing to accede to her request was that there was no precedent to justify it. Although the attitude assumed by the members of the Opposition may lead to the resignation of the Government, and delay the passage of this measure, it will not prevent the workers of Australia from eventually securing a satisfactory Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. I have never known of any case in which the action of a minority, or of a combination of minorities, has prevented the people from working their will. The very fact that nearly every honorable member in this House was pledged, to a greater or less extent, to support this Bill, affords proof that the people of Australia are determined to have such a measure, and, although the struggle may be long and bitter, and may cause Governments other than the present one to lose their seats, I believe we shall win eventually. It will not be long before we have such a combination of forces in this House as will relegate to the background the Tory minority which has allied itself temporarily with other honorable members holding more liberal views, and which, by an unhappy combination of circumstances, has been enabled to disappoint one of the fondest hopes of the people of Australia.

Mr. TUDOR (Yarra).—I do not intend at this late hour to delay the House at any great length. I do not think that I should have risen had it not been that the honorable and learned member for Ballarat went out of his way to cast a slur on the Government by suggesting that the Attorney-General was the only member of the Ministry for whom he had respect.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—No.

Mr. TUDOR.—I admit that he subsequently endeavoured to tone down his statement, just as he has sought to whittle down other statements that he has made. He tried to wriggle out of the position in which he found himself involved.

Sir PHILIP FYSH.—The words used by him were: "The Attorney-General, for whom I have respect."

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable and learned member said that the Attorney-General was a member of the Ministry for whom he had respect, thereby suggesting to the mind of any reasonable man the inference that other Ministers, because they happened to be members of the Labour Party, were not worthy of the respect of the House.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The honorable and learned member did not say that the Attorney-General was the only member of the Ministry for whom he had respect.

Mr. TUDOR.—Later on the honorable and learned member pointed to the Opposition corner, in a melodramatic style, and suggested that the association of certain honorable members with the Labour Party would mean that the latter would either destroy or swallow them. Perhaps he was thinking at the time of the way in which he had been swallowed, metaphorically speaking, by the Free-trade Party. The right honorable member for East Sydney recently made some reference to an "untamed tiger," seeking whom it might devour, but it seems to me that he has practically swallowed nearly the whole of the party with which the honorable and learned member for Ballarat has hitherto been associated. With one exception those honorable members have not had the courage to discuss the motion now before the Chair, the exception being the honorable member for Moira. It is, to say the least, somewhat singular that the honorable and learned member for Corinella should have moved an amendment to prevent the recommittal of clause 48, in order that honorable members on this side of the House might be gagged, and prevented from dealing with the situation as fully as they would have been able had a direct motion of want of confidence been submitted. Many of the amendments proposed by the honorable and learned member while the Bill was in Committee were of such a character that they reminded me of the story when the Commandments were brought down from the Mount they were submitted to Satan, who, when asked to express an opinion upon them, said, "I desire to make a slight alteration in each; let me take the 'nots'". It seems to me that the honorable and learned member for Corinella acting in a somewhat similar way, would like to deal with various clauses of his Satanic majesty would have done with the Commandments. I shall apologise to him with the honorable and learned member for Corinella; but at all events I apologise to the House if my illustration be unparliamentary. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat asserted that the seats were lost by the late Government at the last general election were lost through the action of the Labour Party, that it was owing to the action of that party that they suffered defeat in certain constituencies. I would remind him, however, that the only seat which the Deakin party lost in this State was that of Corinella, and that it was not contested by a Labour candidate. Not one of the seats previously filled by supporters of the late Government was lost to the Labour Party at the last general election. I might go further, and say that the Ministry of which the honorable and learned member for Ballarat was the leader, did me the honour to bring out a candidate to oppose me, while the Melbourne daily newspaper which supported them did its utmost for my opponent, and gave me only one very short report. Notwithstanding this opposition, well as the opposition of the other party, which, of course, I expected, I succeeded in securing a victory by a small majority.

Mr. WATSON.—A majority of something like 10,000.

Mr. TUDOR.—I polled a larger vote than did any other honorable member presenting a constituency in this State, and also obtained the largest majority. The honorable and learned member said that the Labour Party opposed every Liberal. I would remind him, however, that we had him a walk-over at the last election, though we might have made a good fight against him.

Mr. DEAKIN.—No.

Mr. TUDOR.—At the next election we will probably find that we shall be able to make a very fair fight against him. As so with the honorable and learned member for Corinella, who was not opposed by at the last election. I think known—

—Clause 48.

R.—If the honorable and desires to discuss clause so. When he dared to rise in a view, apparently, to cause the arms of one of thrown about him, and he resume his seat.

ER.—The honorable member in discussing that mat-

—I am simply waiting for answer.

ON.—The honorable and er is held down by the R.—I do not wish to detain I am anxious that a vote without further delay. I owever, that the honorable member for Corinella has t to render the Bill ineffec- g various amendments. By ssertion of various provisos, hich he succeeded in adding he has sought to make the useless. He knows very er—

ON.—What about the—

R.—If the honorable mem- speak, why does he not do that he, too, has submitted will of the caucus. There conspiracy of silence on the able members opposite, and sible that when we take pos- Opposition benches we shall ay the game as well as they

ON.—The Labour Party will numbers.

R.—The incoming Govern- that we are not so unscrupu- of their number have shown be. Surprise has been ex- the Opposition should have s method to secure the defeat ment. I, for one, am not ed. Over a fortnight ago I Prime Minister that it was at the Opposition would en- prevent the recommittal of t my honorable leader replied not think they would lower y resorting to such tactics der to prevent legitimate dis- were told this morning by the honorable member for Barker that more than a week ago—

Mr. WATSON.—A fortnight ago.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable member said that more than a week ago he was questioned as to whether he would vote for or against the recommittal of the clause, so that this plot, including the determination to gag the Opposition, was hatched some time since. We had an example of this conspiracy of silence last night, when the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, after rising to speak, was prevented from doing so. Such an incident has never been witnessed, so far as I know, in any other Parliament.

Mr. CONROY.—The statement is not true.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I call upon the honorable member to withdraw that remark.

Mr. CONROY.—I withdraw it, sir, and will say that the statement is incorrect. I explained last night to the honorable member what really took place.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable and learned member will admit that he was muzzled.

Mr. TUDOR.—I know that the honorable and learned member rose to speak, but that as the honorable member for Moira desired to make a personal explanation, he was given precedence. At the close of that explanation, you, Mr. Speaker, called on the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, but when he rose various honorable members of his party displayed a desire to prevent him from speaking. The right honorable member for Swan shook a bundle of notes at him. I do not know whether it was a bundle of notes of a speech which he was going to deliver, or a bundle of bank notes to be used for some other purpose.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think the honorable member will see that he certainly owes it to the House to withdraw that remark, and to apologize to the right honorable member.

Mr. TUDOR.—I certainly withdraw it. I only made it by way of a joke. The right honorable member probably produced the notes to satisfy the honorable and learned member for Werriwa that he had intended to speak upon this particular question. I trust that I shall always play the game of politics with more fairness than has been exhibited by the Opposition on this occasion.

Mr. CHANTER (Riverina).—I desire to make a few remarks upon this question, which I regard as one of very great importance. This event will be recorded in history. As far as I can ascertain, it has no parallel in the history of British Parliaments. We are about to establish a precedent for which, from my stand-point, there is no justification. At this stage, I may be permitted to remark that the honorable member for Yarra misunderstood the observations of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, otherwise he would scarcely have credited him with an intention to cast any reflection upon the Ministry as a whole. I followed the remarks of the honorable and learned member very closely, and I understood him to say that he had been very much influenced by the statements of the Attorney-General, for whom he entertained the very highest respect. I am thoroughly satisfied that the honorable and learned member had no intention whatever of casting a slur upon the Attorney-General's Ministerial colleagues. Concerning the Bill under discussion, I regret that we are not permitted to debate it in detail. As one who was recently before the electors, I desire to say that I fully explained to them the objects of the Arbitration Bill introduced by the Deakin Government, and to which the present Ministry have sought to give effect. That Bill had my approval. I was prepared to support it when it was submitted by the Deakin Administration, and I am equally prepared to support it now. Upon the hustings, I pledged myself to the principle of compulsory conciliation and arbitration. I regard it as a cure for a very grave evil. Various matters connected with this Bill have been dealt with in Committee and otherwise, but the particular question now engaging our attention has never received consideration, either in Committee or in the House. I have a very distinct recollection of the circumstances under which the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella was agreed to. A number of honorable members were anxiously watching the clock as the time approached for the departure of their trains to the capitals of New South Wales and South Australia. The amendment referred to was read from the Chair, so that honorable members did not have an opportunity of carefully considering it. I voted for that proposal, because I thought that it aimed at making a majority of the employes engaged in any industry privy to an application to the Court for the granting of a preference to unionists. When I came to analyze it subsequently I realized that it was absolutely practicable, because it applied not to those directly interested in an industrial dispute, but to all having interests in common, and to all affected by it. In other words, it applied to the whole community. I claim that it would be absolutely impossible to satisfy any Court that a majority of those employed in a particular industry desired that a preference should be granted to unionists.

Mr. Chanter.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does the honorable member mean to suggest that the Committee did not understand what it was doing?

Mr. CHANTER.—I know that frequently words are inserted in Acts of Parliament with a deliberate intention, but when those words are interpreted by the Court a very different construction is placed upon them. That fact has taught me that, as lawmakers, we should be extremely careful to employ in the Statutes of the country language which is so clear that its real meaning cannot be questioned. We have been assured by honorable members upon the Opposition side of the House that there is practically no difference whatever between an amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella and the proposal of the Government.

Mr. WILKS.—The Prime Minister has admitted that.

Mr. CHANTER.—Then, I ask, "What justification have honorable members on site for refusing to extend to the Government an opportunity to remedy a defect which has made itself manifest"? This clause can be amended only in Committee. Every honorable member who has had any political experience is aware of that. In this debate we are bound by the Standing Orders to confine our remarks to the question that is immediately before the Chair, though I am aware, sir, that, in discussing it, you have very generously permitted honorable members unusual latitude, because of peculiar circumstances in which they are placed. I desire to know whether it is the intention of those who are pressing this amendment to division to defeat any Arbitration Act, whether, by adopting a procedure which is absolutely without precedent, they wish to prevent honorable members who vote upon this matter rather hurriedly on n, from reconsidering their ght of the further evidence duced?

—They have had six weeks
e matter.

ER.—The honorable mem-imilar remark previously.
e have not had six moments onsider it. Clause 48 can-ered in the House. It is tee that honorable members unity of remodelling it.
ng whatever in this matter.
onorable and learned member o carry his amendment; but ime I desire to maintain ls which have been set on with this Parliament.
wer to those who sent me ledged myself to do all I the passing of a Conciliaration Bill, in order to pre-strikes, with all their dis-sometimes involving dire ven ruin, to so many in-
. It is my desire to see the kind placed on the e early as possible. I have ok at the mere amendment, ow far it involves the existence ment; I have to look at the e passing of such an amende on the prospects of a Con-Arbitration Bill. I have with honorable members who pledged to do their utmost to ation of the kind, and I hope that alliance. Certain hon-ers, whom I need not indi-o are going to support the have declared themselves in opposed to compulsory con-rbitation, and I cannot there-hem to assist in promoting such
On this occasion I regret elf severed from friends have been associated for but it appears to me that the of the vote to-night are likely more disastrous to the great h of Australia than is at ed. We have an object les-United States, where, in the medial legislation of the kind, ers have been locked out by
s. It is an old saying that ts itself; and in view of these cannot be too careful what ke. It is only in some of the States of the Commonwealth that Conciliation and Arbitration Acts are in operation, and unless the Commonwealth Parliament steps in and fills the gap, there is nothing to prevent strikes of the most ruinous character. The absence of legislation of the kind may be a great temptation to both employers and employed to resort to the barbarous system of strikes or locks-out.

Mr. CAMERON.—Can the States Parliaments not pass Conciliation and Arbitration Acts if they think fit?

Mr. CHANTER.—We have no power to compel the States Parliaments to pass laws of the kind. We are here as members of the Commonwealth Parliament, to promote the common weal of Australia; and it is our duty, where necessary, to fill up gaps in necessary legislation. Can we hope that a Parliament, whether it be long-lived or short-lived, composed of and supported by those who are to-night opposing the present Government, will succeed in passing a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill? I am one who had the honour, pride, and privilege to follow the late Prime Minister, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat.
Although there was a time when circumstances prevented my taking my seat in this House, I kept myself well acquainted with what was taking place; and when I read what the late Prime Minister and his party had done, I felt that we were about to realize a higher ideal in our Federal parliamentary life. With others of the party who followed the late Prime Minister, I pledged myself to give the present Government fair play, and, notwithstanding that I voted for the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella to include the present clause 48 in the Bill, I cannot in conscience now give what appears to me to be one of the foulest blows which one party in Parliament could give to another. To deny the right of the humblest member of the Chamber to recommit a clause of a Bill would in itself to a straining of parliamentary practice; but to deny that right to a Government, who are in charge not of their own Bill, but of the Bill of another Government—a right which it is sought to exercise to meet the wishes, not only of Government supporters, but of members on this side of the House—appears to me to be straining the rules to breaking point, and establishing a precedent which may in the future render legislative progress almost impracticable.
When we meet in this House each day our opening prayer asks that we may not resort to petty and tricky political warfare, but may legislate for the benefit of the whole community. It is not for me to consider what the effect of the division may be; on that point I know nothing, except from general rumour. My duty is only to remember that the result may cause a stoppage of parliamentary work for a time; and, in my opinion, we ought to take a more honorable and dignified position, and assist the Government in transacting the business of the country. The moment we feel that the Government does not retain the confidence of the House, or of the country, let us challenge them in a straightforward, open way. This is a motion of want of confidence, without the privileges which honorable members ought to enjoy in connexion with such a proposal. After a political experience of twenty years, I can say that I never before saw an attempt of this kind; and I have been used to the political life of a State where a great many political tricks were indulged in. I never knew an occasion in that State where this method was resorted to in order to defeat a Government.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Methods twenty thousand times worse were resorted to.

Mr. CHANTER.—The honorable member's Ministerial experience was greater than mine. My Ministerial life was short. But I was allied in New South Wales with a very honorable gentleman, recently deceased, Sir George Dibbs, who would never resort to tricks in order to obtain his political ends. He was always open and straightforward in whatever he did. Whenever he had to attack a Government he always did it in a straightforward and honorable manner. Why should I be denied the privilege which could be exercised only in Committee of explaining the reason why, on a former occasion, voting in haste, I supported the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member can do that now.

Mr. CHANTER.—I cannot do it now without trespassing upon the generosity of Mr. Speaker, who, I may remark, has been exceedingly generous throughout this debate in allowing honorable members to enter into what were really second reading speeches, and to deal with all the ramifications of the question of preference. But the matter before us now is not that of preference. That has already been decided. This proposal is a direction to the Court. It is an attempt to tie the hands of the Court as to when it shall shall not grant preference to members organizations. I was perfectly prepared to leave that to the discretion of the Court. But we have got beyond that stage. I now proposed to shackle the members of the Court. Who could be in a better position to deal with the granting of preference than members of the tribunal to whom disputes are referred? I can see serious danger from the amendment if carried in its present form. While I do not side with employers on the one side or employes on the other, still I must say that I have known cases where employers have deliberately gaged non-union men in order to create dispute. That may happen again. If it should happen, is it not equitable and that the Court, which is seized of all the circumstances of the case, should have power to say to the employer—"You have done wrong, and have improperly discharged those men, and we will give them preference as against others"? The matter is surrounded with so many difficulties that behoves every honorable member to put aside one side party feelings and to recognise, before it is too late to rectify it, that a mistake is being made. If we allow the Government to take the Bill into Committee, and afterwards we find that they are conducting the proceedings improperly, it will be perfectly competent for the House to remove them from the Treasury benches. But that is not the proper method to adopt. It is for the Prime Minister to consider certain amendments which have been made very widely in the press. We are asked whether it is the time we retired from the present position in which the majority of the members of this House are dominated by one or seven members who happen to be Ministers of the day, with respect to amendments in legislation? Has not the House the right to say to Ministers—"You do not represent the Commonwealth of Australia and whatever your views upon this matter may happen to be, we ask you to go away from the Bill, and to accept the wishes of the House in regard to amendments"? That position is upheld by some of the greatest jurists of the day. I urge the Government to consider this point, because at present we are absolutely shackled by the position in which we place ourselves.

Mr. WATSON.—Surely the honorable member would not wish the Government satisfaction upon honor-opposite.

FER.—I am afraid that the misapprehends what I have

N.—The Prime Minister is

FER.—No, he is not sarcas-had the privilege of know-Minister for many years, Minister, but in other capacialways looked upon him as t earnest and sincere of our
This House is not the place display of sarcasm and ow that some honorable ge themselves in that really, but I am per-that any honorable memon the platform, and told that he wished to get into alth Parliament for the pursarcastic, would be told by wished to send to Parliaen, who would attend to the e country. It is in that ave always regarded legisla-not impute improper motives are supporting the amend-eve that the honorable and r for Corinella, having cardment which has been made naturally anxious to see it

I do not think that he is unworthy motives. But I t to him that the precedent set on this occasion will be very great danger to Parlia-ture. It will be used against ents. It may be used to de-ent after Government. Surely of the honorable and learned e politics of this country is for him to allow himself to ther honorable members for
s. I believe that he hon-nscientiously desires to see w a proper Conciliation and Bill. But he ought to present associates. Pere no like or dislikes in poli-I am satisfied that the politis of my associates are in ac-mine. I urge the honorable member to consider whether supporting him are doing so e ends which he has in view.
s amendment when he origin-
On this occasion I intend contrary direction, in the interests of justice, and in the interests of fair play to a Government who ought not to be condemned in this manner. I trust that honorable members will give them that fairplay to which they are entitled.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON (Capricornia).

—I am not going to say that I am surprised at the attitude taken up by the Opposition with regard to this question. Having for some years studied the political conduct of the right honorable member for East Sydney, I am not at all surprised at his attitude, nor at that of those honorable members who sit behind him. But I am surprised that the honorable and learned member for Corinella should allow himself to be used as a tool in a matter of this kind.
The attempt that is now being made to dislodge the Government is not one that has been sprung upon the House.
It is a well thought-out scheme to "down" the Government on the first opportunity. For a considerable time past the New South Wales newspapers have been urging the right honorable member to challenge the Labour administration; but he has not been game to move a straight-o-motion of want of confidence, because he knew that he had no chance of carrying it.
The Government have conducted the business of this House too well for that. Now, however, he finds them in a tight place. He knows that the Prime Minister is a man of his word, and that when he said that he would recommit clause 48 he would stick to his statement. There is no "yes-no" attitude for him. The sweets of office are as nothing in comparison with the passing of a good Arbitration measure. He knew that the Bill as amended would be of no use to the unionists of Australia, and that they would refuse to register under it. No union would register unless its members could obtain a preference.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The unions register under other Acts which do not allow them to obtain preferences.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—They would not register under this measure, because they know that it would take probably six months before they could prove to the Court, when applying for a preference, that they represented a majority of those employed in an industry. Fancy trying to obtain the opinions of a majority of the Australian Workers' Union!

Mr. HUTCHISON.—It could not be done in six years.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—The right honorable member for East Sydney himself has recognised that it would take a considerable time to find out what were the opinions of a majority of those connected with a large industry like the shearing industry. I hold that it is enough to require that the applicants shall represent a substantial majority of those employed in any industry. If there were 100 men on the books of a union, it would not follow that that number of men was at any given time engaged in the industry to which they properly belonged. Seventy-five of them might be working at their proper trades, but the other twenty-five might be engaged in other occupations. Therefore, forty would represent a substantial majority of those connected with the industry. It would probably be impossible to obtain an actual majority. In 1890 I had something to do with a strike in a coal-mining district, and I remember how, after the funds of the unions were exhausted, the wives and families of the bread-winners who were out of employment were practically starving, although the blacklegs were getting from 12s. to 15s. per day. I do not wish to see a repetition of that kind of thing. The honorable and learned member for Werriwa has repeated time after time that six out of every seven workers are not unionists. I dare say that not twenty people in every 100 attend the churches of the land; but it could not be contended that all who do not go to church are not Christians. In the same way, it cannot be said that all who do not belong to unions are non-unionists. In my district 2,000 or 3,000 men are working in the Mount Morgan mine who are not members of a union, because they are not organized; but they, like almost every working man in Central Queensland, sympathize with the unionists of Australia. In the early seventies I was connected with a strike, but those engaged in it were not unionists, although we were battling for ourselves and for our fellow workers. There are men at work all over the country who, although for some reason or other they are not members of unions, are, nevertheless, in sympathy with unionism. Although six out of seven may not be unionists, every working man is in sympathy with unionism. The only exceptions are those who hang around street corners, and will never accept a job unless they can get a high wage for doing practically nothing. The honorable member for Moira is probably the only man on the Opposition side of the Chamber who knows anything about bush work. I am surprised that one has had experience of such work, and is aware of the privations and hardships which those who undertake it have to suffer, should vote against preference unionists, and should talk as he against unionists.

Mr. David Thomson.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have not spoken against unionists, though I spoke against the coercion of majorities by minorities.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—How can those who have to hump their swag in place looking for work coerce anyone?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have done as much for the workers as the honorable member has done for them.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—No doubt the honorable member has. I have done much manual work myself for a number of years past; but my sympathies are with the workers. I have kept in touch with them. Perhaps the honorable member has managed to keep a few shillings and is now independent. The honorable and learned member for Corinella aims at emasculating the Bill, which is intended to benefit the workers, who are trying to get a living for themselves and their families. What does the honorable member care about how they fare? Through his profession he can live upon the life blood of the workers. The members of his union want a preference, but he is not prepared to tend the same privilege to manual workers. No wonder we have to direct our attention to the declining birth rate. The honorable members display so much difference with regard to matters affecting the interests of the working classes. The right honorable member for East Sydney says that he intends to go on with the Bill, but how does he expect to succeed in getting a workable measure when sixteen of the strongest supporters are absolutely opposed to its principles? Are those honorable gentlemen going to stifle their consciences?

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—They have no consciences.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Probably their consciences are so seared that they are of no further use. I have been working with my hands since I was fourteen years of age, and I cannot help expressing indignation when I see a lot of the bludgers trying to kill this Bill. They have been gagged. Our caucus is nothing to them. We could not silence the members of the party by means of the caucus. I do not think it possible for any one to gag d learned member for Werapparently he has been hypno-members of the Opposition y have the numbers, and that nt will resign. They are per-are that the Prime Minister is o" man, but that he means

I can assure honorable mem-that when we cross to the opes we shall give them the live-y ever had. Some years ago member for Parramatta was ne Labour Party in the New Parliament, and I assisted to at position. Now we find him the preference clause. He man who is endeavouring to e workers and to rob them of and to destroy their privileges.
 amendment of the honorable member for Corinella was prod smiles which illumed the ble members made them look bring morning. I could see that ething behind the amendment.
 got well under way, the two

Opposition, or whatever they nspicuous by their absence.
 tent that the ends which they in should be achieved through ality of others, and they have whilst unfair methods have ous the Government from pty that honorable members he Bill to be recommitted and on its merits. Like brigands, ing the Government and holdsom; but the case is hopeless,
 f the Government are forfeit.
 (Maranoa).—After the breezy ed by the honorable member a, I hope that honorable mem-will extend some little cone. In the first place I should why there should be a con-nce among members of the very one of them is eager to re not say anything. The mber for Werriwa was pulled nt.

KER.—I do not think that to the honorable and learned erriwa is in order.

—I was endeavouring to con-ble and learned member with want to give him that hich he is refusing to e says that he is not in s in any shape or form, al-atter of fact, he belongs to one of the most exclusive unions, the members of which enjoy distinct preference. Today's Age contains a report of certain remarks made by the Honorable B. R. Wise, who introduced the New South Wales Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. Last night he said—

"It was pretty certain that there would be a dissolution of the Federal Parliament—"

I hope that his prognostication is correct.
 If so, some honorable members will soon get their walking tickets. He went on to say—

if not immediately, at least before very long.
 It was equally certain that the issue of the elections would be whether there was or was not to be a Federal Arbitration Act. If they did not want a Federal Arbitration Act, then clearly it was their duty to vote against it; but if they did want it, then let them see that they voted for it, and were not misled into voting for a Bill, including the amendment proposed by Mr. McCay, which, he said deliberately, would make arbitration a dead letter. If they wanted the Bill they should not support candidates who posed as friends of arbitration, and yet supported the clause which would make it inoperative. Any Arbitration Act which deprived the Court of power giving preference to unionists would be a dead letter.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable gentleman was not game to go to the poll.

Mr. PAGE.—I do not know whether he was game or not. If he had a safe seat in the Legislative Council of New South Wales, he would be a fool to go to the poll.
 I do not think that the honorable member would leave his seat in this Chamber to contest a seat in another House.

Mr. WATSON.—The opponents of the Honorable B. R. Wise were not game to interfere with the Act which he was largely instrumental in placing upon the statute-book.

Mr. PAGE.—So far as preference to unionists is concerned, I am rather pleased that the present situation has been brought about, because the Bill, in its present form, would have been of very little use to the Australian Workers' Union, the body to which I belong, and which has put such a big bee into the bonnet of the honorable and learned member for Macquarie, Mr.
 Kelly.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—The honorable member for Wentworth.

Mr. PAGE.—I beg the honorable member for Macquarie's pardon. Whatever may be his view in regard to this Bill, I know that he has nothing to say against the Australian Workers' Union. It is useless to beat about the bush; and, therefore, I think it well to say that, had it not been for the Australian Workers' Union, in Queensland, six of the nine honorable members who now represent that State, would not be here. Yet, the Opposition are asking us to give up our unions; they are literally asking us to give up our seats to them. We took the advice which had been gratuitously tendered to us times out of number. It was said to the workers again and again, "Do not strike, but seek redress at the ballot-box. Send men into the Parliaments of the States, who will represent your grievances, and in that way alone will you secure the means of redress." We have adopted that course, and now many honorable members opposite have the assurance to tell us that we have no business here.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. PAGE.—That cry has repeatedly been raised by them, and they complain because we were returned on the labour ticket. Machine politics were invented by honorable members opposite, in order to secure our defeat, and now that we resort to the same weapon, but use it much more effectively than they have been able to do, they decry us, and seek to render it impossible for our organizations to be continued.

Mr. WEBSTER.—We are here.

Mr. PAGE.—And we are going to remain here. We are like a porous plaster, which takes a lot of pulling off. It is said that unionists exact a pledge from every labour candidate, and that statement is correct. They exacted one from me, and I was delighted and proud to give it. As a matter of fact, I would give them twenty pledges if they asked for them. Honorable members may wish to know the reason. In the olden days the workers of Queensland voted again and again for men who promised us everything, the Kingdom of Heaven included, provided that they were returned. The consequence was that we secured their election; but as soon as they reached Brisbane they forgot all about the poor back-blockers, and we never heard of or saw them again until the next election came round. Then they served up the same old dish, dressed up with a little green-stuff.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is the honorable member discussing the clause?

Mr. PAGE.—I am referring to that which led up to the demand that preference should be granted to unionists. I signed the pledge required by the unionists. We had been tricked so often that we thought it well to endeavour to secure the return of men from our own ranks. We feel that no one could better voice our grievances in Parliament than me who had been through the mill—unionists who had suffered for the cause. That is why we are here to-day. And yet honorable members opposite blame us for advocating the claims of those who send us here. Unionists are not the only supporters of the Labour Party. As a matter of fact I receive support from all classes, squatters included. The latter know very well that they will get a "square go" all the time, and I expect a "square go" from other representatives. I am pleased to say that our expectations are usually realized. On the occasion, however, such is not the case. Members of the Opposition are a lot of sand-baggers and political highwaymen.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is distinctly out of order. He is not discussing the clause under consideration, and it is not in order to speak of honorable members generally, or in particular, as sand-baggers.

Mr. PAGE.—I applied that term in a political sense. I do not mean to say that the Opposition are sand-baggers, but that their tactics are worthy of such men. If honorable members opposite object to me so designated, I shall apologize for calling them such a bad name, but I do not know a worse one to apply to them. Those who have had experience in other Parliaments assert that the course of action adopted by the Opposition on this occasion is unprecedented, and that being so, there must be "something rotten in the State of Denmark." The Opposition did not relish the statement made to-day that they had applied the gag. When the opportunity offered we may give them a dose of their own physic.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Do not follow a bad example.

Mr. PAGE.—When the Opposition teach us such tricks they cannot blame us if we resort to them. They have been pleading the cause of the non-unionists, and the honorable member for New England appears to be very much afraid that such men would not be fairly treated if the clause were amended as the Government propose. I wish to show him that he is raising a mere bogey. He need have no fear as to the position of non-unionists in Queensland, at all events; for there, under freedom of contract, they fare far better than do the unionists. It is the unionists who suffer in that State. I wish to re-which appeared in the Argus under the heading, "Gippsland Free Labourers and how nicely the Argus puts it. In question were unionists. For what they conceived to be and they starved rather than injustice. They were not suffering, for their wives were pinched for food, and old weather which we have living, have even lacked sufficient. Times out of number these to the mine-owners for a conciliatory request was refused. Had as we desire been in force, state of affairs would have been, and I contend that the refusing to accept a clause which the Government practically acquiescing in the action of the Outtrim mine.

Mr. LONSDALE.—No.
—I repeat that they are seeking to take away the only the workers have hitherto employ in their defence, and them nothing in return. So concerned, I prefer the good of striking. I do not desire conciliation and Arbitration Bill is prepared to give us. I the workers, "Let us resort old-fashioned strikes, and let win." If that course were should know where we were. The control of the public affairs of the Commonwealth, the Military Forces are ours, and we shall see strike are justly treated. The which I have referred is as

RA, Friday.—Notwithstanding Miners' Union has been dissolved, connexion with the mines is not manager of the Coal Creek mine concerned in the recent strike these men were selected because, they were well conducted through- in this respect differing greatly their fellow unionists, who took part in the strike. It appears that employes—free labourers—on dis- go strikers were going down the shift, held a meeting, and decided at they would not work with the manager, Mr. P. McDonald, the mine—he is just recovering from a severe attack of influenza— decided to work the shift, and afterwards, and the two strikers arrangements had been made for to go on the afternoon shift, and at the change of shifts the free labourers held a mass meeting, and resolved, without a dissentient, that if the strikers were kept on they would cease work in a body. They interviewed the manager en masse, and put their demands before him in writing. They said that for over twelve months their lives had been made miserable by the insults and gibes of the strikers, and that opprobrious epithets had been applied to them whenever the opportunity offered. They stated that their decision was unalterable, and asked for an immediate answer, as if the strikers were not put off they would not go down to work that shift. The strikers had refused to work with them, and the positions were now reversed. The manager, in the circumstances, did not care to have the mine idle, and decided, pending full consideration, to put off the four strikers at once.

What has the honorable member for New England to say to that state of things? He would not give the wives and children of these men who had stood by their union an opportunity to live.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Yes, I would.

Mr. PAGE.—The report goes on to say—

Two other unionists are employed at the new shaft, but as they are entirely separated from the other miners no objection has been made to them.

Are these men lepers that they should be ostracized in this manner? Are they to be so treated merely because they are unionists and men of principle? It makes my blood boil to think that they should be subjected to such treatment.

It is stated that several unionists formerly employed at Coal Creek have obtained work at the Jumbunna mine under assumed names, they being unknown to the free labourers there. No further steps will be taken in connexion with the Coal Creek trouble for a day or two. About sixty men are employed at the mine now.

I would ask honorable members opposite whether they favour the state of things described in that report.

Mr. LONSDALE.—No.

Mr. PAGE.—It is useless for honorable members opposite to say that they do not mean this, that, or the other. Does not the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella practically deny a preference to unionists? The honorable and learned member for Bendigo represents one of the great labouring constituencies in Victoria, and I cannot understand his action upon the present occasion. I cannot understand the action of a man who represents a mining constituency in opposing the extension of a preference to unionists. Every honorable member must admit that unionism is good for everybody. Why were trades unions established? For the benefit of the workers. Employés have organized for the purposes of mutual benefit. The moral of their action is appropriately represented upon many of our industrial banners by a bundle of sticks, with the inscription beneath, "United we stand, divided we fall." I believe in unionism in every shape and form. If a man is not a member of a union he ought to be. No man has a right to live upon the earnings of another. If there are a hundred men employed in the carpentering and brick-laying trades, and if ninety of them are members of a trades union, I claim that the remainder are parasites, because the ninety are responsible for the maintenance of fair conditions, in the benefits of which the others participate. What happens to a body of men who have no union? They cut into one another's wages every week. If a rush takes place for the work, even if the men have wives and families to maintain, those who can do the job cheapest always secure it. That is the cursed feature of the contract system, which the pastoralists are now attempting to introduce into the shearing industry. If the Shearers', the Seamen's, and the Waterside Workers' Unions registered under this Act, there would be no more strikes. Those honorable members who have had experience of these disastrous industrial upheavals know perfectly well that it is not the men who chiefly suffer by them, but the women and the children. They suffer from lack of food and clothing. During the shearers' strike of 1891 there were women in Queensland who actually sent their wedding rings to the nearest town to be pawned, rather than allow their husbands to "scab" upon their mates. Those are the true unionists, and those are the men to whom I want to give preference in this Bill. I feel that while I am fighting their battle, I am fighting one of the noblest battles on this earth. The manhood and womanhood in the back-blocks of Queensland, New South Wales, Victoria, and the other States, are the bone and sinew of the Commonwealth, and it is their battle we are fighting. We are fighting not only for the workers in the different metropolitan cities, but for the workers throughout the length and breadth of the land; and how honorable members opposite, who have been through the mill, and know what I am talking about, can give a vote which will "down" those men, is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. Page.

Question—That the figures proposed be left out stand part of the motion—

The House divided.

Ayes	34
Noes	36

Majority	2
----------	-----	-----	---

AYES.

Bamford, F. W.	Malcney, W. R. N.
Batchelor, E. L.	Mauger, S.
Bonython, Sir J. L.	O'Malley, K.
Brown, T.	Page, J.
Carpenter, W. H.	Poynton, A.
Chanter, J. M.	Ronald, J. B.
Cook, J. N. H. H.	Spence, W. G.
Crouch, R. A.	Storrer, D.
Culpin, M.	Thomas, J.
Fisher, A.	Thomson, David
Frazer, C. E.	Watkins, D.
Groom, L. E.	Watson, J. C.
Higgins, H. B.	Webster, W.
Hughes, W. M.	Wilkinson, J.
Hutchison, J.
Isaacs, I. A.
Lyne, Sir W. J.
Mahon, H.

Tellers:

McDonald, C.
Tudor, F. G.

NOES.

Cameron, D. N.	Lonsdale, E.
Chapman, A.	McCay, J. W.
Conroy, A. H. B.	McColl, J. H.
Cook, J.	McLean, A.
Deakin, A.	McWilliams, W. J.
Edwards, G. B.	Phillips, P.
Edwards, R.	Quick, Sir J.
Ewing, T. T.	Reid, G. H.
Forrest, Sir J.	Salmon, C. C.
Fuller, G. W.	Skene, T.
Fysh, Sir P. O.	Smith, B.
Gibb, J.	Thomson, Dugald
Glynn, P. McM.	Wilks, W. H.
Harper, R.	Willis, H.
Johnson, W. E.	Wilson, J. G.
Kelly, W. H.
Kennedy, T.
Knox, W.
Lee, H. W.

Tellers:

Robinson, A.
Smith, S.

PAIRS.

Kingston, C. C.	Turner, Sir G.
Fowler, J. M.	Liddell, F.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Amendment agreed to.

Debate (on motion by Mr. WATSON) journed.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WATSON (Bland—Treasurer)

In view of the importance of the vote which has just been given, it is necessary that the Government should have an opportunity to consider its position. I therefore move—

That the House, at its rising, adjourn on Wednesday next.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

PAPER.

N laid upon the table the
:—

claim of Mr. E. Palmer against ers, telephone inspector, Bris-

JOURNMENT.

ON (Bland—Treasurer).—

do now adjourn,

take the opportunity to con-table members upon the at has been displayed durwhich has just closed. The ere not able to elicit any m honorable members op-r intentions, in view of ceries, is perhaps, from our rather a pity. But, never-are that all honorable memfested an anxiety to have ght to a conclusion with the degree of friction, and I n behalf of the Government
g that fact.

lved in the affirmative.

adjourned at 8.51 p.m.

Representatives.

ay, 17 August, 1904.

took the chair at 2.30 p.m., rs.

GOVERNMENT BILL.
ed.

ON OF MINISTERS.

ON (Bland—Treasurer).—I te to the House that, fol-te which was given on Fri-ited upon His Excellency eneral, and offered certain ich His Excellency did not then tendered the resigna-and colleagues, which His pleased to accept, contin-aining office until the apr successors. As I under-v Administration is in pro-on, I now move—
do now adjourn.

lved in the affirmative.

adjourned at 2.33 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Thursday, 18 August, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

NEW ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. REID (East Sydney).—It will be remembered that the late Prime Minister made a statement at the last sitting of the House with reference to events which had occurred since the meeting of the House on Friday, and I now wish to state that, in view of the resignation tendered by the late Prime Minister of himself and his colleagues, I was commissioned by His Excellency the Governor-General to undertake the formation of a new Administration, and that I have performed that task. Before naming the Ministers, and the offices which they will hold, I wish to make an explanation. It will be remembered that I invited the right honorable member for Balaclava to join with me, upon terms of perfect equality, in the construction of this new Government, and he has acted on that footing, and in that capacity with me, in the formation of the Government whose names
I shall presently announce. My right honorable colleague, in view of the state of his health, still suffering as he is from the effects of a prolonged illness of a serious character, and in consideration of the duty which he owes to himself, has asked me to relieve him from any extra political work beyond that attaching to the Department with which he will be intrusted. As honorable members know, the position which he occupied under the arrangement made would entail a considerable amount of political work outside the particular duties of a Department, and in the present state of my right honorable colleague's health he would be absolutely unequal to any such task. Under these circumstances, he has asked my honorable friend, Mr. Allan McLean, to take the position to which I have referred in the Cabinet.
I shall myself fill the office of Minister of State for External Affairs, and the list of my colleagues in the new Administration, with their respective offices, is as follows:—

The Hon. Allan McLean—Minister of State for Trade and Customs; Senator Sir Josiah Henry Symon,
K.C.M.G., K.C. — Attorney-General;

The Right Hon. Sir George Turner,
P.C., K.C.M.G.—Treasurer;

The Hon. Dugald Thomson—Minister of State for Home Affairs;

The Hon. James Whiteside McCay—Minister of State for Defence;

The Hon. Sydney Smith—Postmaster-General.

These gentlemen will occupy the whole of the Departments allotted by the Constitution. I may add that the position of Vice-President of the Executive Council will be filled by Senator Drake.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—Before the business of the House is proceeded with, I may perhaps be permitted, on behalf of the direct Opposition, to offer my congratulations to the new Prime Minister upon the names which he has submitted to the House as those of his colleagues. I am sure that, although we may differ from the new Administration in matters of policy, so far as personal considerations are affected we can extend to them the heartiest welcome as Ministers in the new Government. I suppose that all of us must acknowledge that, in regard to the probable administration of the Departments, there is not the slightest fault to be found; but that, on the contrary, the best anticipations may be indulged in as to the working of the Departments under the gentlemen whose names have been announced. On general matters of policy, I am afraid that we shall not be able to be quite so cordial.

Mr. THOMAS.—Give them fair play.

Mr. WATSON.—Such expressions are capable of such differing interpretations that I do not intend to indulge in them. I can only promise that the Government shall receive at our hands such treatment as they merit in our view of the best interests of the country. I congratulate Ministers, and cordially welcome them upon their accession to office.

ELECTORAL ACT COMMITTEE.

Motion (by Mr. GROOM) agreed to—

That the time for bringing up the report of the Select Committee on Electoral Act Administration be further extended to Friday, 30th September next.

ADDITIONS TO ELECTORAL ROLLS.

Mr. MALONEY.—I desire to ask the Minister of Home Affairs whether he will continue the work which is now being carried out in connexion with the addition to the electoral rolls of the names of persons who are entitled to be registered, but whose names have been omitted to the hurried inquiries which were when the rolls were first compiled.

Mr. REID.—Perhaps the hon. member will allow me to answer that question in this way. I should rather, if any questions are answered, that Mr. should have some time allowed to consider the state of public business.

Mr. MALONEY.—My reason for putting the question at this stage is that if necessary instructions are not issued to the police at once, hundreds of persons whose names have been left off the rolls, but are justly entitled to be placed upon them, will lose their chance of voting.

Mr. REID.—I can promise the hon. member that the urgency of that matter will not be overlooked.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Motion (by Mr. REID) agreed to—

That the consideration of all other business be postponed until after the consideration of Government business.

SUPPLY BILL (No. 3).

Mr. SPEAKER reported the receipt of a message from His Excellency the Governor-General, recommending that an appropriation be made from the Consolidated Revenue for the purposes of this Bill.

In Committee of Supply:

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Balaklava Treasurer).—I move—

That a sum not exceeding £326,422 be granted to His Majesty for or towards defraying the services of the year ending the 30th June,

The passing of this Bill is necessary to enable the Treasurer to provide the means required to make certain payments which will fall due towards the end of the month. The measure was prepared under the supervision of the ex-Treasurer, and I understand that copies of it have been circulated amongst honorable members who have had an opportunity to go through it with the responsible officers of the Treasury, and I find that it makes provision for ordinary expenditure upon the part of the last financial year. In the Department one or two large sums were proposed which I have ascertained for the purpose of defraying the cost of certain ammunition—some of which has been delivered—and for a portion of the expenditure we must pay when ordering. A large expenditure is required to provide at some of the Rifle Ass, which will take place he other items are not of character. Under these cir-umstances that honorable members

Bill to pass as quickly as

N (Bland).—I raise no passing of this Bill. As by the Treasurer, the pared at my instance, be-ve of a new Govern-to office, it would have to obtain Supply. Yes-ly scrutinized its details, it is essential that the items ordinary salary votes for e passed at the earliest opa view to maintaining the Departments.

(Corio).—When the Trea-filled his present office, a le that a refund should be in money which was paid upon trophies. I believe surer also assented to that urgent necessity exists for ants in connexion with the de demonstration, I wish surer whether he will make next Supply Bill for the on?

URNER.—The amounts must Estimates, and be voted in . They do not constitute iture.

I.—Some special items are Bill.

—No; except so far as the munition is concerned.

ORREST (Swan).—I wish tion of the Treasurer to a very urgent character, for liament provided £12,000
y, £7,000 for construction armament, although nothing up to the present time. I nce works at Fremantle.

ER.—What became of the
as voted?

ORREST.—I shall deal presently. Some time ago was made with the Go-stern Australia under which d to provide the necessary purpose of the fort at and to regard it as erty. The public buildings
he land were demolished, was in readiness to give effect to the wishes of Parliament by proceeding with the erection of the fort.

Difficulties, however, arose. The present Treasurer was of the opinion that the work, when finally completed, would involve an expenditure considerably in excess of that which was understood by Parliament when the £12,000 was voted, and therefore he urged me to refrain from expending £7,000 of the amount. He thought that we had not taken Parliament sufficiently into our confidence, and eventually the course which he suggested was adopted by the Government. He, however, undertook to lay the whole matter before Parliament, and to provide a sufficient sum for the current year's expenditure. He also promised to recommend that the necessary financial provision should be made for carrying out to completion the work in its entirety. Last year Parliament voted £5,000 to provide one gun for that fort. I regret to say that this amount was practically used by my honorable friend the then Minister for Defence, without my knowledge, but that fact will in no way militate against the progress and completion of the work. I rise chiefly to remind the Treasurer of the understanding which was arrived at by the Government of which we were both members, and to express the hope that on the Estimates-in-Chief he will give effect to that understanding, which I at the time communicated to the people of Western Australia.

Mr. CARPENTER (Fremantle).—I should like to emphasize the remarks made by the right honorable member for Swan, and to remind him that this is not the first occasion on which this matter has been mentioned in the House. It is only due to the late Government that I should mention that, on my representation, they agreed to provide on the Estimates for 1904-5 a sufficient sum to carry out these defence works, and that I informed the people of Fremantle that this course was to be pursued. I am glad that the right honorable member has confessed that it was with his consent that the money voted by the House for the carrying out of these works was not spent as proposed.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not say that.
It went very much against my grain to see the money devoted to another purpose.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The right honorable member said that he was approached by the Treasurer of the Government of which he was a member, and that he agreed to the £12,000 voted for certain defence works being devoted to another purpose.

while the sum of £5,000, voted for a gun, was commandeered without his knowledge by the honorable member for Eden-Monaro when holding office as Minister of Defence. I did not have the honour of being a member of the last Parliament, so that I am not familiar with the course of action which it adopted; but I was somewhat astonished to find that the House had permitted a vote passed for a specific purpose to be devoted to another object. The disappointment felt by the people of Fremantle because of the failure to carry out these defence works was very keen. This is, I take it, a reasonable opportunity for me to express my disappointment that in the newly-formed Administration, Western Australia has not a direct representative. I do not intend to refer at any great length to the personnel of the Government which meets the House for the first time to-day, or to any act that they may or may not have committed; but it is only fair to point out that the reason given by the Prime Minister for the non-inclusion of a representative of Western Australia in his Cabinet is that honorable members from that State are not to his political liking.

Mr. REID.—If the honorable member will allow me to say—

The CHAIRMAN.—Does the right honorable gentleman rise to a point of order?

Mr. REID.—I wish to say, if my honorable friend will allow me, that it is not a fact that I gave the reason mentioned by him. That is all. I suppose any one has a right—

The CHAIRMAN.—Order. The honorable member for Fremantle will proceed.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I am quite sure that the Prime Minister does not wish to keep this side of the House as silent this week as it was last week. If he has any such desire there is no hope of its realization. I do not wish to criticise the present Administration, but I take this, the first opportunity, to express my deep regret that it does not comprise a representative of Western Australia, and to say that the reason which has been given in the press for the non-representation of that State in the Cabinet is one which ought not to be advanced by a statesman.

Mr. REID.—Hear, hear.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I shall reserve what I have to say on this subject for some future occasion. I hope that the matter brought forward by the right honorable member for Swan will receive the earnest attention of the Government, and that a sufficient sum will be provided on the Est to enable the work to be completed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I may say that I have some recollection of the matter mentioned by the honorable and learned member for Corio; but that the item relates to a refund of duty on trophies for which provision could not be made in a Supply Bill. Such a Bill is passed by the House on the assurance of the Treasurer that it provides for ordinary expenses and a refund of Customs duties would come within that definition. I understand, however, that the Estimates will provide for a refund of the duty in question. Coming to the matter mentioned by the honorable member for Swan, I think it will be admitted by all who have the question any consideration that it is absolutely necessary that a certain sum shall be spent on works necessary for the proper defence of Fremantle and Fremantle. At my request last session honorable members passed a certain resolution relating to these works, which appears in the Estimates, together with a footnote that a further sum would be required in order to permit of their completion. A footnote was inserted as the result of information afforded me by the Defence Department, in response to my inquiries when I subsequently discussed the matter with the Minister of Defence and Mr. General Hutton I found that a further sum—a sum of from £60,000 or £80,000—would be necessary to enable the work to be effectively carried out. Honorable members know that it is useless to only partially carry out an undertaking of this kind and that we must be prepared to vote a sum as will permit of the construction of the complete work, so that it will be, not a sham, but a sure thing. In these circumstances I felt that it was not justified in committing Parliament to the larger expenditure, and would not proceed with the work until I had had the opportunity to put the full facts before the honorable members, leaving them to decide whether an expenditure larger than that in the first instance anticipated should be incurred.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The larger sum required in connexion with the works at North Fremantle.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The work will be made, not on the ordinary, but on the Special Works Estimates, for a considerable sum in relation to this particular work. Certain negotiations which between the Commonwealth and Australian Governments have led to a considerable extent. Government have agreed to treat in respect of which they forgo a large sum, as being part of the money transferred Department, and the actual cash outlay would have been incurred in these defence works, has been reduced. I can assure members that the right honorable member was in no way to be blamed. He desired that the Government proceed, but I have always maintained that the Government has no right to sanction anything which will involve a larger expenditure than was anticipated until he has seen the facts before Parliament. He desired it to say whether the expenditure should be incurred. I said, that a considerable sum had been provided for in the next Special Estimate. When those Estimates are laid before the whole of the facts will be known to the honorable members, and the Committee of Supply will be able to make a larger expenditure provided. After investigating the matter as I was able to do, with the sanction of the responsible officer, I concluded that it was one which should be incurred.

It was moved in the affirmative. The motion was supported and adopted.

Mr. REID) proposed—
That Orders be suspended in order that the Government may be taken to obtain supply, and the Supply Bill through all its stages.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I, like the Opposition, must congratulate the Minister on the manner in which he has obtained office.

Mr. REID.—I would remind the member that the question before the House is whether or not the Standing Orders should be suspended, and that it is for him, on this motion, to decide whether or not the Honorable Member of the Ministry or

Mr. McDONALD.—If necessary, Mr. REID will conclude my remarks by pointing out the scope of debate, and I will discuss such matters. I shall be within my legitimate rights in advancing reasons in support of the motion that the Standing Orders should not be suspended on the ground that the Government have not the confidence of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER.—To such a line of argument as that, I could not object; but I did not understand that the honorable member desired to take that course. On the question whether or not the Standing Orders should be suspended, any arguments which may be advanced in support of the honorable member's contention that the Government have not the confidence of the House might be in order.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Clause 48.

Mr. McDONALD.—I do not propose to deal with clause 48; it has nothing to do with this question. I am prepared to take the course I propose to take at the present stage, or to wait until a later stage when the Supply Bill is before honorable members, as on that Bill we can discuss anything we please. If you, sir, think that that would be a more opportune time, I have no desire to place you in an unenviable position, and I shall be prepared to take that course.

Mr. SPEAKER.—As I said just now, the honorable member would be in order in arguing the question whether the Standing Orders should be suspended or not, to incidentally refer to such reasons as he mentioned, but I think it would be more convenient if the honorable member dealt with this matter on the Bill, when putting forward arguments why Supply should not be granted.

Mr. THOMAS.—We can give the Government a fair show.

Mr. McDONALD.—We intend to give the Government every reasonable consideration. I am prepared to treat them just as they have treated us. They can ask for no more than that. I will defer the remarks I proposed to make until the Bill is introduced, in order that I may not in any way hamper the procedure in connexion with this particular motion.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Give them time to ring up their supporters.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Resolution of Ways and Means, covering resolution of Supply, adopted.

Ordered—

That Sir George Turner do prepare and bring in a Bill to carry out the foregoing resolution.

Bill presented by Sir GEORGE TURNER, and read a first time.

Motion (by Sir GEORGE TURNER) proposed—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—Probably this is a more convenient time to offer the few general remarks I propose to make.

Mr. REID.—I think the best time would be on the message to send the Bill to the Senate.

Mr. McDONALD.—I have no doubt that the right honorable gentleman would prefer that nothing should be said on the matter at all.

Mr. REID.—I wish to have the first word—that is all.

Mr. McDONALD.—Very likely; and no doubt the right honorable gentleman would like to have a good many last words also. When the Labour Party took office under the honorable member for Bland, the Prime Minister rose in this chamber and told us that that honorable member had no right whatever to accept the responsibility of office, because he had not a majority behind him.

Mr. THOMAS.—Who said that?

Mr. McDONALD.—The right honorable gentleman who now sits at the head of the present Government.

Mr. THOMAS.—I thought it was the right honorable member for Swan.

Mr. McDONALD.—The right honorable gentleman was not content with saying that in this Chamber, but he went whining about the country, telling people that inasmuch as he did not send for himself, instead of the leader of the Labour Party, when the Government, led by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat resigned, the action of the Governor-General had been unconstitutional.

Mr. REID.—It has all come right in the end.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The end is not yet.

Mr. McDONALD.—Now, what has been the action of the right honorable gentleman? Despite his continual whine about his not having been sent for on that occasion, we find that he has accepted a similar commission from the Governor-General, knowing full well at the time that he had not a majority behind him, and knowing also that he could not secure a majority except by humiliating himself and those honorable members whom he had to recommend to His Excellency as responsible Ministers. The right honorable gentleman, when he came back from his interview with the Governor-General, was like a man who had secured a mining concession. He started to hawk it around where he could make most of it. He went first to the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, and that honorable and learned gentleman sent him on to the right honorable member for Bclava, by whom he was passed on to honorable member for Gippsland.

Mr. CROUCH.—The honorable learned member for Ballarat would have nothing to do with the right honorable gentleman.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—The honorable and learned member would not take stock in the syndicate.

Mr. McDONALD.—That was the action; the honorable and learned member for Ballarat refused to have anything at all to do with the right honorable gentleman. He said, "No; I have only one political mistake in my life, and that was in joining a Coalition Government. The honorable and learned gentleman refused to have anything to do with the Prime Minister, but he passed him on to the right honorable member for Ballarat. We have then this humiliating spectacle of the present leader of the Government, the right honorable gentleman went, on the other hand, to the present Treasurer, and said to him, "Although I am Prime Minister of this Commonwealth, I am only in that position nominally; I am not really Prime Minister, because you will have co-ordinating powers with myself."

AN HONORABLE MEMBER. — The honorable gentleman sublet half of his tract.

Mr. McDONALD. — As the honorable member says, the right honorable gentleman sublet the formation of half of the Government.

Mr. MAUGER.—Subletting is illegal.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The Government pretends to work on the butt-gang system.

Mr. McDONALD.—I hope that we will not find, in this instance, the amount of sweating which usually takes place in connexion with a contract which has been secured. After finding fault with the ex-Prime Minister, because he did not inform the Governor-General that he could not command a majority, surely it was the absolute duty of the right honorable member for Sydney to give that assurance? But the right honorable gentleman had a party of only four. His whole party, all he could rake together, numbered no more than four. Not only was that so; but when he came to deal with the members of the other party, they said, "We will join you, but you must swallow the whole of your life-long principles." The right honorable gentleman had to swallow his life-long principles, and had to im-

men for whom he has the ALLEY.—Not contempt.

ALD.—The honorable ow that I am not speaking but in a purely political, ber that some time ago the member for East Sydney
y great oration, as we all e, in the Melbourne Town at occasion he referred to arty as the "Steerage that is where the true gentle-ue democrats.

ALD.—I was present in the
the right honorable gentle-remarks, and I know that d them as a compliment to ty.

—The right honorable that every protectionist

ALD.—There was another particular meeting of which vivid recollection. I rethe right honorable gentle-the present leader of the ail in another place, Senator right honorable gentleman,
ort of way, said, "Now, eat and glorious statesman that remark brought rounds
But now we find that this een also swallowed by the member.

There is lots of room!

ALD.—The right honorable down to the House and, en or seventeen occasions—the exact number—told us d to move a no-confidence
y day the unfortunate reewspapers were waiting out-ascertain just when he in-this motion.

ON.—The honorable mem-eve it, did he?

ALD.—We were all de-
right honorable gentleman
ns for getting upon the First of all, he came nt that he must kill the ment. The method he adopnumber of his supporters
a certain direction upon a being distinctly stated that posal were carried it would

Mr. HUME COOK.—They were wreckers.

Mr. McDONALD.—They were wreckers of the Bill, and at the same time desired to defeat the Deakin Government. That Government was defeated. The right honorable gentleman pursued exactly the same course in connexion with the late Government. He was not prepared to move a no-confidence motion. He was aware that if he submitted a straightforward honest proposal of that nature he would be defeated. He could not possibly have carried such a motion. Therefore, he endeavoured to attain his purpose by carrying an adverse vote upon a clause which was vital to the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. I should not have spoken at this length, except that we know the right honorable gentleman and his methods, and we are aware that during the next three weeks he will be granting interviews and delivering addresses in different parts of the country. It is therefore necessary that we should as far as possible put our case before the public. The late Prime Minister is too modest on an occasion like this. There is such courtesy in his disposition, that he wishes to grant to the present Government a concession similar to that which he thinks was granted to him on a recent occasion.

Mr. THOMAS.—We will give the Government courtesy as soon as we have the numbers!

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We have the numbers to-day.

Mr. McDONALD.—We have the numbers now, and the Prime Minister will either have to "stone-wall" this Bill, or he goes out.

Mr. REID.—I would not even encourage a debate upon a question of urgency.

Mr. McDONALD.—The right honorable member cannot complain. I did not complain when he did not submit a straight-out vote of no confidence in the late Government. Honorable members opposite were quite within their rights. They had a perfect right to adopt the method which they did adopt, if they thought fit. Personally, I should not have taken the course which they adopted, because I thought it was a very questionable one; but technically speaking they were within their constitutional rights. But they must not blame us for taking a similar course when we think it expedient.
It is just as well that we should face the situation. I am giving a start to a discussion which I trust will afterwards be carried on with more vigour and ability than I can command. When the Prime Minister had defeated the Deakin Government, he endeavoured to bring about a combination. Just here I feel that something ought to be said concerning the action of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. The Prime Minister and the honorable and learned member to whom I have referred, came to a certain agreement. Of course, we have no right to object to their coming to an agreement, but what I did object to was that while the honorable and learned member for Ballarat had signed an agreement with the head of the present Government to form a coalition, he was at the same time negotiating with our party.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable and learned member for Ballarat never signed an agreement for a coalition.

Mr. McDONALD.—He signed an agreement to this effect—that the terms were to be submitted to his party. But while he signed that, and was negotiating with the Free-trade Party, he was also negotiating with the Labour Party. That, to my mind, was a base act of treachery. Suppose, for a moment, that the Labour Party had agreed to the terms desired by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. What would have been the result? Probably he would have gone to his party and recommended it to sell itself to the highest bidder.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Has not the honorable member heard of a party in this Parliament which made such a proposal?

Mr. McDONALD.—No; I have never heard of a party that did so. Anything that the Labour Party has ever done, we are prepared to bring to the light of day. I am blaming the leader of the Deakin Government for the action which he took on that occasion. I maintain that to negotiate terms of agreement with the Labour Party, and also with the right honorable member at the head of the Government, was not a fair deal. What came of it? When we hear from time to time statements made about the members of the Labour Party signing away their liberty because they have signed a pledge, I ask in what position are other honorable members? What was the position of the head of the Government, and the honorable and learned member for Ballarat when they entered into an agreement? They signed an agreement. Now we have a pledged party on the other side. Honorable members of that party, who, we were told, could always take each other's word, decided, on particular occasion, that they would an agreement drawn up in black white, so that none might back down. I hope that for the future we shall not hear any more about the Labour Party being compelled to sign a pledge, seeing that the leaders of the party opposite cannot do one another without a similar precaution. There is another little matter which I ought to be mentioned, though casually, because there will be ample opportunity later on to enlarge on these topics. I can remember when a Tariff was passed by this House. The present Prime Minister then, in his place in Opposition, made such a pathetic appeal on behalf of poor little children, whose boots were subject to a duty of 30 per cent., that the ladies in the gallery were obliged to use their handkerchiefs; indeed, the honorable gentleman's own tears dropped on his face as he spoke. At one moment he fairly wept, and the next he yelled at the top of his voice, denunciations of what he termed the outrageous duties of 30 per cent. on hats and boots. But what did he find now? The honorable gentleman swallowed the 30 per cent. on boots, and 30 per cent. on hats, and what has become of the little children of whom he spoke? It does not matter, because he has now attained the ambition of his life—he has become Prime Minister of Australia. However I say, there will be ample time later to deal with these matters; but before I do so, I should like to ask the honorable member for Gippsland whether he feels at ease and comfortable in his present position. That honorable member advocated the 30 per cent. tax to its fullest extent, while the Prime Minister vigorously denounced that impost; but now we find those gentlemen in the same arm.

Mr. RONALD.—“Adversity makes us acquainted with strange bed-fellows.”

Mr. McDONALD.—That is quite true. What does this Government, with its various elements, propose to do? The Prime Minister, and those who support him, have talked about the rule of the caucus; but what is their own position now? They are so bound hand and foot that not one of them can move. Even the Prime Minister cannot take independent action, as a Prime Minister should, because he has to consult his co-equal in the Cabinet.

Mr. MAUGER.—His equal in all things.

Mr. McDONALD.—That is so. About shackles! Why, the Prime Minister more than any man of whom of in political life. In what I have had of politics I of a gentleman accepting Prime Minister who allowed backed as the leader of the ment has on this occasion.

Commonwealth will never spectacle—that the Common-ever see another gentleman position as to be only Minister. I shall not, how-that line of comment ;
treading on dangerous have had my little in-noon, and others may folto desire. In any case, there test doubt that at the end just before this Govern-out, we shall have ample let them know what we ne Minister cannot take ex-course which I am following ;
has been set by him-
the amendment was sub-resulted in the defeat ernment, the Prime Minisat the tactics to which he ing might be used against I promise the honorable so long as I sit in the fully avail myself of such within my knowledge.
Government and their sup-doubt, a perfect right to dis-Government, even by the methods then adopted ; and erty have no cause to feel
We are a growing party ;
the most powerful political lia. There never has been in this country ; and our shown in the fact that the eaders of Australia have had their life-long principles in a momentary victory. The ould not have been beaten ay than that which the late owed. The power of our g from day to day ; and hon-opposite, who see that it going to rule the Common-t a straw in the hope of ar-gress. I congratulate the r on selecting, as his conorable member for Gippsman whose fine democratic ideas are well known all over ough it is a fact that he a Conservative vote. We now have the extreme protectionist in the person of the honorable member for Gippsland, and the extreme free-trader in the person of the Prime Minister, in the same Government. Those gentlemen might rightly be termed the "heavenly twine," though whether they will ever wear the heavenly wreaths is quite another matter.

I regret that the Prime Minister has already had to announce a slight split in the Cabinet, he having had to accept another co-equal in place of the gentleman he desired to have. In any case, I can assure him that he has my hearty congratulations on his attainment of the position he now occupies ; and I also can assure him that there are a large number of honorable members on this side who will give him encouragement and ample opportunity to deal with the business of the House.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir). — I rise to congratulate the Prime Minister and his colleagues on the feat they have accomplished during the last few days. I am not going to complain—I have no right to complain—of the turn events have taken in regard to the Ministry of the Commonwealth. As a labourite, who belongs to the advancing army of democracy,
I am delighted to find that at last, after only a few years of organizing and of political work, we have, by the aid of the arch Conservative of the Commonwealth, separated those who are with us from those who are against us. That fact is now indicated by the seats honorable members occupy in this House. The position of parties to-day, in this Parliament, is to me a pleasing feature in the political history of the Commonwealth. No one in the ranks of the Labour Party ever expected that the time would come so quickly when we should be able, without any doubt, to single out our opponents and mark them off for what they are. What is the object of this strange combination that we see? The honorable member for Kennedy has hinted at the object as though it was something which was unwelcome to the people of Australia. In the Cabinet I see elements which, before the Labour Party became the factor that it is, fought bitterly one against the other, on the alleged sacred principles of protection or free-trade. But when they find, as they do to-day, that the Labour Party has been growing apace like the bay tree, and is spreading its branches over the democracy of Australia, and welcoming converts from every side, what do they do in order to "down" that party? They do what has never been witnessed in the history of any Legislature within the Empire. What will those persons who for years have admired the standard-bearer of the glorious doctrines of free-trade and liberty say when he returns to Sydney, and they recognise that the banner under which they have worshipped and fought has been changed, and that it is not merely a question of "yes" to-day and "no" to-morrow, but is a question of "Yes—no" perpetually? "Yes—no" is a fitting conjunction of words to describe this Cabinet. It is no longer a question of altering opinions. We have before us a combination which is unprecedented in the political history of this country. Of course the Labour Party are highly delighted, because, whilst our right honorable friend on the opposite side imagines that he is going, as it were, to steal a march on the army of democracy by singling out those respected protectionists who have long commanded the respect of their party, and believes that he will thereby bring behind the Cabinet the large mass of the protectionist support, is it likely that that will happen? When he appeals to the country he will get the support of only the Conservative section of the protectionists. The democratic section of the party will never stand behind a Conservative Cabinet such as they see in this Chamber to-day. What is the position? A new line of demarcation has to-day been laid down in the political history of the country. Hitherto the protectionists have been combined, and have worked in unison, believing that the doctrine they preached was for the benefit of all. But to-day we find that the people, by reason of education on the fiscal question, are beginning to realize that there are two sections in the Protectionist Party, just as there are two sections in the Free-trade Party. The people are beginning to realize that the Conservative protectionist is the man who wants protection so that he can favour the manufacturer all the time, so that monopolies may grow and overshadow the rights, the liberties, and the very living of the people. The people are beginning to realize that there are Conservative protectionists who are prepared to work for monopolies every day they sit on the benches here, every day they speak in support of their principles. The Democratic protectionists comprise the men who have sympathy with the toiling men and women in our factories, who wish to make the lives of these people brighter than they have been. This section of the protectionists are going to tear themselves asunder from the old monistic protectionists, and stand by the people for whom they are fighting. Liberal protectionist who to-day stands for the people in the interests of that faith, as it might be called, says, "I want to make work in this country: I want protection, not merely for article after article of manufacture, but also for the lives and freedom of the workers in those industries. We desire that the conditions under which the people work in protected industries shall be such as to tend to their advancement. We desire that these people shall be allowed to work under conditions which will improve their constitutions, make them better members of society. We desire that they shall work for only a few hours a day, so that they may have some time for recreation and education. We desire also that the people who work in protected industries shall be preserved to them the right to obtain a living wage for their labour." That is the position of the Liberal protectionist to-day. The right honorable member for East Sydney is welcome to his allies. He has selected the most Conservative Cabinet which has been created in Australia. If he had questioned every man in the Chamber, he could not have succeeded in constructing a more Conservative Cabinet than he leads today, and I congratulate him on his wisdom. It is a distinct step in advance for the labour movement. We know exactly who are our foes, and what we have to do. Hitherto we have been deceived, to some extent, by men who have professed to be friends of the people, whether as protectionists or free-traders. We have been deceived by the platform utterances of these men, when they have been appealing to the proletariat to give them place and power. They will no longer be able to throw in the eyes of the toilers, because the people who are fighting for the toilers have seen through themselves—for ever, I hope—from gentlemen who are prepared to support a protectionist policy only so long as it gives a moral victory to the capitalist and a greater pull out of the Customs duties which the Parliament has imposed. I do not intend to deal fairly with the Government, although I have not shown to me or to the party I long to that fairness which we might have expected to receive. I recognise that wrongs do not make a right. I do not intend

Mr. Webster.

the same treatment to those ers who would not allow other day, who kept me corners of the strictest who were always raising and making interjections
herwise. As I said dur-I would not support any a mean advantage of any t whenever war is pro-field is cleared for action, ont ranks, or, if necessary, wder monkey, to assist to to an honorable conclusion, the best side may win. We those honorable gentlemen—s, those protectionists, those and "freetectionists"— w define, so far as Social-d, who have sunk their ombed for the sole pur-g place and power. I honorable member for without fear or hesi-ever before, in Aus-ader display such anxiety mbition of his life, show hen he thought that it was or so abuse the ordinary r play. I could forgive d learned gentleman for the used, but how can any one who has sacrificed those ples which have kept
s for so many years?
right honorable gentleman
wn Hall at Sydney, and in the Commonwealth, that doctrine for which he has iration. We all know his
e. If he cannot influence his logic or his rhetoric, ir support by his humour, ding his versatility, I am South Wales free-traders rotectionists alike must feel been deceived. He has the mercy of the protecbeing supported to-day by enemy he was a year or enly sympathize with the -traders who stand be-servative combination. I are hobbled and haltered.
ster complimented them in er morning for their loyalty
"They never questioned me ne whether I did right or hen I took an unmanly attitude in regard to the Labour Government I was able to tell them to sit down, and they sat down." Even the most robust member of the right honorable gentleman's party, the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, a hitherto untamable character, whom the Prime Minister was never before able to bring under his hypnotic eye, was compelled to be silent on that occasion. When that debate was in progress, I said that it was unfair to tie the hands of the Labour Party, and that it was also unfair to tie the hands of the democratic section of the free-trade party. But what does unfairness matter to a man who is eager for office. There are democrats behind the right honorable gentleman, who for years have fought for democracy; but they have succumbed to his hypnotic influence in a manner which I did not think possible. We look to them to help us to carry out the great work of liberal reform; but to-day they are bound and helpless, and unable to say a word in defence of their position. We know how uncomfortable they must feel, because they are Radicals at heart, and represent constituencies of working men, who know what they want. Yet these unfortunate members have to support the most conservative Ministry that has yet been hatched in Australian politics. Why did not the Prime Minister exercise some charity towards them? Why did he not allow them to say a word in defence of their position?

Why did he not allow them to act as free men, instead of gagging them, and binding them hand and feet? The Labour Government were put out on a technicality, and by methods repugnant to British instincts of fair play. The followers of the present Prime Minister were not allowed to exercise the right of free speech, and to criticise the policy or administration of the late Government. All that we heard on this side of the Chamber, hour after hour, was "Clause 48." If the present Government receive similar treatment, they will have no ground for complaint. My political existence has been threatened by those who have humiliated so many of my old colleagues; but I am ready to go down fighting for the cause which I have supported so long. I would rather die than haul down my flag, as some men have done. It is a degrading thing that a man who has received the Cobden Medal, and who has spoken for years on the advantages of free-trade, should now combine with men who have supported a policy which he has referred to as industrial strangulation. What a blot upon Australian history it is that there should be such a combination brought about, not to secure the administration of the affairs of the Commonwealth on constitutional lines—because there is nothing but praise to be given to the late Government for the manner in which they administered the affairs of State—and not because the legislation put forward by the late Government was antagonistic to the views of a majority; but to secure merely personal ends. The members of the Labour Party were forced out of their position on the cross benches to take control of the Departments of the Commonwealth, but the nine or ten free-traders who helped to put them in that position have since gone back on their principles, in order to give office to the right honorable member for East Sydney, who has desired it so eagerly and so long. These honorable members, although they condemned the Bill in toto, acting under the hypnotic influence of the Prime Minister, walked over to the other side of the House, in order to give him the opportunity for which he was longing. The Deakin Government went out ostensibly on a matter of principle, and the Labour Party came into power, not at their own desire, but simply because the trap set by the Prime Minister did not serve his purpose. Now, the very men whose votes contributed to place the Labour Government in office have assisted to confer power upon the deadly enemies of democratic legislation. The Prime Minister says that he will take up the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. He will embrace that measure in the same way that he has embraced the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. The right honorable gentleman is capable of embracing anything. He is such a generous political godfather that he is prepared to adopt anything that comes his way, provided that he can retain power. This has been characteristic of the right honorable gentleman throughout his political career. Many of us are well aware of this, but other honorable members, who have not taken the trouble to inquire closely into his political history, will have cause for regret before very long. Does the right honorable gentleman suppose that when we reach clause 48 of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill we shall be content to allow it to retain its present form?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member must not anticipate the debate on the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I thought that motion was broad enough to cover the subject under the sun. If it is not, we shall deal with the Arbitration Bill at another time. No one desires more than I do to serve the rules of the House, and if I transgress it will be because we are human, and liable to err.

Mr. SPENCE.—What does the honorable member propose to call the present Government? Is it a Socialistic Ministry or what?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I should call it an arch-conservative combination of the British Empire.

Mr. REID.—Every combination ought to be conservative.

Mr. WEBSTER.—That is, no doubt, a sound proposition. The right honorable gentleman can prepare the way for himself better than any man I know. The matter on which side of the fence he stands for himself, he can always give reasons for. He should not be on the other side. The honorable members on the Government benches are very uncomfortable because they are not in their proper positions. I sympathize with them in the same way. I should sympathize with the bird caught in the snare of the fowler. I believe the time is not far distant when they will realize exactly where they stand. We are not troubled about being relegated to the other side of the House. This is the first change that we have had, as a party, to fight as members of a direct Opposition. The Prime Minister has never before had the Labour Party in direct opposition to him. He should be glad of the opportunity which is now presented to put them to the test in that capacity. Whether his tenure of office will be lasting is quite another matter. From to-day it should go forth to the public that the fiscal question has no longer any political existence within the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID.—I thought that the Labour Party was a free-trade-protectionist combination.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I have nothing to do with that. The right honorable member thinks, but I am dealing with the question presented to us. I sympathize deeply with the deluded free-traders of New South Wales—with those men who have been misled by the free-trade flag, and have honestly and sincerely battled for the policy which, in their opinion, would give freedom to the people, and enable them to over-of life with greater success possible under other conditions. Men have travelled miles near the Prime Minister, and their boots out in working for his supporters. What are they doing? I have been in New Zealand for only 48 hours since Friday last, and the impression from the demeanour of the people here was that a double funeral place in that State. In the course of my travels I met some of the supporters of the Free-trade party. One man said, "What do you think you would have believed that the Liberal Party would be sold as they are now? We worked for years to supplant the protectionist doctrine, and longed for the day to subject it to a practical test. Alas! the man in whom we trusted, the idol whom we have worshipped so long, has broken asunder, and is practically absorbed by the man whom he was the avowed enemy of." "Did they say that I was?"

—Did they say that I was?

MR. KENNEDY.—No; they said that a gentleman was burst upon the scene. Ambition bursts many men. The consequence has been visited upon the greatest men who ever lived. Politically speaking, ambition is the ruin of a right honorable gentleman. Also, with the people of Victoria in the past pinned their faith upon the champions of Protection. The learned member for Ballarat played such a prominent part in the coalition, occupies a position so far as the fiscal question is concerned inexplicable to me. When I came into this House, I listened with attention to the eloquence of the learned member, and I felt there was a sincere man here. Now, however, that I have seen the contrast of the actions of the learned member with his magical flights, and his assurance with the Conciliation Bill, that he did not wish to be a member, except so far as might be made it read correctly, I am sure a few months after I was so addressed by the honorable and learned member I see him sitting side by side with the enemies of democracy, acting as a buffer between the free-trade and protectionist parties, and endeavouring to soften the effects of the collision which must sooner or later come. Why? Because he hopes that his opportunity will come some other day. Does he stand aloof from the present Ministry because he anticipates that within a comparatively brief period a little inspired message will come from the British Isles, urging the leader of the Government to adopt a policy of preferential trade? Is it not possible that the Prime Minister, who has gone back upon his free-trade principles, will be found advocating such a policy? I venture to say that he will prove quite equal to the occasion should it arise. He will declare that his duty to the Empire upon which the sun never sets impels him to adopt a policy which will insure to the mother country a certain amount of freedom from the competition of those nations which are fast wresting her commercial supremacy from her hands. If that be the secret of the split which has taken place between the Conservative protectionists and the Liberal protectionists, we shall know it very shortly. At any rate, I cannot congratulate the honorable and learned member for Ballarat upon his action in practically strangling the Arbitration Bill. I appeal to the democracy of Australia, irrespective of whether they be free-traders or protectionists, to be "up and doing," because our day is coming. The sun is up; it has not yet set. I urge the democracy of the Commonwealth to prepare for the political battle which is inevitable. The Liberal Party will be no longer sundered by rival fiscal creeds. Its members will meet their opponents in a fair hand-to-hand fight. I welcome that fight, and I rejoice at the prospect of affording the people of Australia an opportunity to combat their arch enemy. In my opinion, the life of this Government will be a brief one. Our turn must come, and it will last so long as we serve a majority of the electors, so long as we make Australia a better country than it is, and so long as we continue to remove the shackles of those who are oppressed. When our party resumes responsibility it will continue to hold office, whilst that which is led by the Prime Minister will rapidly sink into decay.

MR. KENNEDY (Moir).—In view of the charges which were recently made by honorable members opposite to the effect that they were "gagged"—

Mr. WATSON.—The gag is now removed.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Since the supporters of the late Government crossed to the Opposition side of the chamber they have ungagged themselves. When they sat behind the Watson Administration we heard no fiery invective from the honorable member for Gwydir.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I was "gagged" last week, otherwise the honorable member would have heard me to some purpose.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member was not "gagged" by the Opposition.

Mr. WATSON.—Did we not hear the honorable member for Gwydir upon this day week?

Mr. KENNEDY.—We did, and as far as I am aware, he could have continued to address the House until the present time.

Mr. TUDOR.—No; the debate upon the motion which he submitted was interrupted at half-past 4 o'clock.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That marked only one stage of the proceedings. It seems strange that this little rift in the lute is now being held up to scare the protectionists of Australia. An effort is being made to show that, as the result of the action of some honorable members in recording an important vote last week, the protective policy of the Commonwealth is in jeopardy. That is the whole burden of the song of the honorable member for Gwydir. He accuses those protectionists whom the Prime Minister has taken into his Cabinet, of being Conservative protectionists.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Those who are acquainted with the political history of the gentlemen who now form part and parcel of the Reid-McLean Administration, know that they were the standard bearers of liberalism, progress, and protection throughout Victoria before the honorable member for Gwydir entered public life. The workers of this State—not the monopolistic manufacturers—have to thank the present Treasurer, and the Minister of Trade and Customs, for whatever industrial advantages they enjoy to-day.

Mr. McDONALD.—The honorable member should read the State Hansard reports of McLean on Turner and Turner on McLean.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is true that they had their political differences in the State Parliament; but it is well that the people of Australia should be reminded that the only vital point of difference between them was in respect of the method to be adopted to reform the Victorian Constitution.

As far as I am aware, it was only in regard to that matter that any difference ever occurred between them as leaders of their respective parties. One believed that the proper method to adopt was to give Parliament opportunity first of all to make an effort to bring the Constitution up to date; while the honorable member for Gippsland, who was then Premier of Victoria, held that the matter should be dealt with by a Convention somewhat similar to that which framed the Federal Constitution. I think I am justified in putting these facts before the House in view of the suggestion on the part of the Opposition that at one time there was considerable rivalry and jealousy between these honorable gentlemen. Both have fought for liberalism and progress, and for the industrial welfare of Victoria, yet the Opposition to-day hold them up to ridicule as representing the Conservative section of the political life of Victoria.

Mr. TUDOR.—The Conservative section are supporting the Government to-day.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Honorable members of the Opposition would have us believe that that is so.

Mr. TUDOR.—The Argus is supporting them.

Mr. WATSON.—All the Conservative forces are with them.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Be that as it may, I propose to place a few hard facts before this House.

Mr. FISHER.—The honorable member protesting too much.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am not protesting but I wish to place a few facts before the people, who are the jury that will decide this question. Some reference has been made to the position of the Protectionist Party, and the side on which it ought to sit. But what had the Protectionist Party to expect from the late Government? What assistance did they receive from honorable members of the Labour Party when the Tariff Bill was before the House? Was there a more bitter opponent of the Protectionist Tariff as introduced, than was the ex-Minister of External Affairs? He was, if anything, a stronger opponent of the Tariff than was even the present Prime Minister. What attitude did the late Government take when they were questioned on notice as to their intention with regard to the Manufactures Encouragement Bill? Did I say that they would deal with it as a matter of Government policy? No; that that after consideration they do not allow a private member to introduce the Bill, and to afford him the opportunity to submit it to the consideration of the House.

MR. WATSON.—Will the present Government support that Bill?

MR. KENNEDY.—They have not been asked.

MR. WATSON.—The honorable member asks them on the subject.

MR. KENNEDY.—I shall make it my duty to do so; because it relates to a matter in which I am pledged. Not only members of the House, but the Government as a party helped to kill the Bill introduced by the Barton Government.

MR. WATSON.—It was not made a condition.

MR. KENNEDY.—It is absolutely true that the Government, with the late Prime Minister at their head, and with the assistance of the free-trade section of the House, introduced the Bill.

What had protectionists, who were given secure bonuses for agricultural purposes, to expect from the Government?

—The honorable member asks something with regard to the bonus.

MR. KENNEDY.—Let that matter be decided by the House.

—It is quite strong enough to support the Bill.

MR. KENNEDY.—That is so. I have no doubt in support of the degree of morality.

MR. WATSON.—Immorality.

MR. KENNEDY.—I have nothing to say of the standard of morality. I am going to the evidence given before the Commission, obtains in our community. But what has that to do with the present political situation?

—Those who are being examined by the Commission are not members of the Government Party.

MR. KENNEDY.—Labour members are not angels of sweetness and light; they are men of the average.

—It is a "Kyabramite" who is being exposed.

MR. KENNEDY.—That may, or may not, be the case. Honorable members opposite do not charge me with "Kyabramism." They seem to forget that at the time I had the pleasure of fighting for the Reform League.

MR. WATSON.—We merely say that the honorable member is in bad company.

MR. KENNEDY.—With such an opponent I may have been in bad company, but circumstances have forced me into the company in which I now find myself. Much stress has been laid on the allegation that the protectionists are to-day in bad company, but what had we to hope from the late Government?

MR. FRAZER.—The honorable member admits that there are more protectionists on this side than on the Government side of the House.

MR. KENNEDY.—That merely goes to show that there are more protectionists gone wrong. What has the industrial life of Victoria ever been able to obtain from the Labour Party, so far as the protectionist policy is concerned? The party prides itself on being a body of fiscal athletes.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—Not the majority of them.

MR. KENNEDY.—Why is it that they gave no adhesion to fiscal principles when the Tariff Bill was before Parliament?

MR. HUME COOK.—What did the free-trade party do for the industrial life of Australia?

MR. KENNEDY.—What is the honorable member for Bourke squealing about? He has probably been forced into his proper position—a position which he should have occupied before. I wish him luck.

SIR WILLIAM LYNE.—He is sitting where the honorable member should be.

MR. KENNEDY.—That is a matter for the people of Moira to determine. The honorable member is not the guardian of my conscience or of my political principles. What hope had he of passing the Manufactures Encouragement Bill while the late Government was in office?

SIR WILLIAM LYNE.—Every hope.

MR. KENNEDY.—What was the reply which the honorable member received when he inquired what course the Government intended to take in regard to that Bill? He was simply informed that the Government would afford him an opportunity to bring in the Bill before the House. Will he ask the present Government to accord him the same privilege?

SIR WILLIAM LYNE.—I would not ask for any privilege from them. So far as I am concerned, it will be a stand-up fight against them.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is immaterial to me on which side of the House I sit; I am not stripped of my political principles from my support of any party.

Mr. FRAZER.—That reduces the Government majority to one.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It does not so far as the Government programme is concerned.

Mr. FRAZER.—The programme of the Reid-McLean Administration has not yet been published.

Mr. WATSON.—It is bound to be a "crawling one."

Mr. KENNEDY.—A programme was formulated by the party now in office, and we were told by the late Government that it in no way differed from their own.

Mr. TUDOR.—That being so, why were the late Government displaced?

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is a question which the honorable member will have to decide for himself. The late Government selected their own battle-ground, and said that if a certain vote were given they would have to leave the Treasury benches. That vote was given, and their lamentations are now being poured forth.

Mr. WATSON.—Where? All we say is that we had no chance to fairly deal with the position.

Mr. KENNEDY. — I venture to say that the Opposition will have ample opportunity to reflect.

Mr. WATSON.—I am afraid it will not be very long before we shall have to get to work again.

Mr. KENNEDY. — Honorable members may yet see the error of their ways. I am really delighted that the enthusiastic supporters of the Government recently dispossessed have found their voices so readily. For the last three months I have been in some doubt whether they had not pledged themselves to complete silence. Now that they have found their voices again, it is pleasing to reflect that whenever any question comes before us, we shall have their opinions freely expressed. I think that will be found best for all parties. I desire to emphasize the point that these honorable gentlemen, and more particularly the members of the new organization which has been brought into existence by the circumstances by which we have been confronted during the last few days—the members of the Liberal Protectionist Association, which is going to be the be-all and end-all of industrial life in Australia—those honorable members appear to forget that so far as protection, as represented on the statute-book, is concerned, the electors of Australia, at a last general election, decided what the policy of this Parliament should be. They decided that the Tariff should not be interfered with, except in connexion with questions incidental to preferential duties. Now what are honorable members saying about? They are claiming that the re-opening of the Tariff is the practical business for which protectionists were sent into this Parliament. How utterly absurd that is, and especially coming from such honorable members as a honorable member for Bourke, and the secretary of the Protectionist Association.

Mr. SPENCE.—Surely it is the business of protectionists to see that protection does not disappear?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Is there any danger to protection, so far as it is represented by the Tariff, whilst the honorable member for Gippsland is administering the Customs department?

Mr. SPENCE.—Yes; there is.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have as much confidence in that honorable gentleman's administration of the Tariff as I have in the administration and respect for its administration by the late Minister of Trade and Customs. The honorable member for Wide Bay whom the letter and spirit of the Customs Act was faithfully adhered to.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Does the honorable member not think that there is some danger when the protectionist party is split into two?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Before honorable members who complain that the protectionist party is split into two accuse members of another party, they should take a little retrospective view of the situation, and ask themselves who is to blame for the split. They should not accuse the other fellow of all the sins in the Decalogue.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Surely those protectionists who are now supporting the free-traders are to blame for the split?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Might I ask what the fiscal creed of the party whom the honorable member is now supporting? Do they represent no fiscal creed.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The majority of the party are protectionists, whilst the majority of the party which the honorable member is supporting are free-traders.

Mr. KENNEDY.—How is the majority of the party to be ascertained? Has the honorable member for Bourke any doubt that the majority of the party, in the the smallest joint, have any of their own?

COOK.—Has the honorable member proof that the free-traders will EDY.—It is not expected to help us.

They are not traitors.

LYNE.—That is just what the whole set of traitors—and the gentleman is the arch-traitor

EDY.—I have this comfort—that as soon as there is any the programme laid down, I am here to support, the honorable member who constitute the present party that they cannot hope to be of mine. My political career will not be wrecked for the party. With that confidence does not lie in the mouth of the honorable member, and especially of the honorable member for Gwydir, whose name I have taken him round the politico reproach me. I apprehend which honorable members have extended to honorable members on this side, but I may be permitted to say that, so far as I am concerned, in the least degree uncomfortable.

CR. — The honorable member

EDY.—It is not what I ought to say, but what I actually am. When I am asked for my fiscal creed, it is useless for me to look to a man proclaiming themselves the industrial workers of Australia any fiscal creed whatever.

LYNE (Hume).—When I say now I had not the slightest idea of saying a word. I really cannot say it is that the honorable member has just resumed his seat taken with such heat.

—No heat at all.

—The honorable member himself.

LYNE.—There was considerable glow, if there appears to me that there is something underlying the very statements the honorable member makes that the honorable member should continue to be friends, because

I trust that no one will hurt the honorable member's feelings; but I must say, in reply to the remarks he has made, that I think there is a very much greater probability of protectionists getting some of that which they desire from a party, the majority of whom are protectionists, when they are supported by a not insignificant minority of protectionists who do not accept the whole programme of the Labour Party as given by them, than from a Free-trade Party. When the honorable member for Moira boasts of thirteen or fourteen straying protectionists going over to the other side, to carry with them about twenty-six or twenty-seven free-traders, he must believe that those thirteen or fourteen misguided honorable members have very great power over the twenty-six or twenty-seven free-traders. The honorable member made an attack on the honorable member for Bourke which I do not think justified. That honorable member stood by his colours. He is a protectionist, and we on this side who are protectionists have stood by our colours, whilst others have done their very best to destroy the Protectionist Party in this Parliament. If they do not mind what they are about they will absolutely destroy the party and themselves too. The public like consistency; they do not like any "Yes-no" business, nor do they like honorable members who are followers of "Yes-no" politicians. One is just as objectionable as is the other. The honorable member for Moira asked what chance I had, as honorable member for Hume, of getting an opportunity from the late Government to deal with the Manufactures Encouragement Bill. I say that I had every chance and a promise honestly made, and if it had not been for the action of misguided protectionists who are now following a free-trade leader, the honorable member would have found that this week the Manufactures Encouragement Bill would have been dealt with, and become the law of the land.

Mr. JOHNSON.—What an escape the country has had.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—By their vote the other night, the protectionists to whom I refer intercepted the opportunity I should have had of dealing with that particular measure. The onus of preventing the consideration of that and similar measures, which would have been of great value to the country, must rest upon them. The honorable member was, therefore, incorrect and unfair when he said that I should not have had an opportunity of dealing with the Manufactures Encouragement Bill. I was faithfully promised that opportunity, and I was promised that once I got the opportunity of dealing with it, the business would have been uninterrupted until the Bill was finally dealt with by the House.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member might have had an opportunity as a private member, but not as the member of a Government.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—As a private member I should have had all the rights given by the message. The late Prime Minister was aware of that, and the Speaker also decided that I had as much right to deal with the matter as if it had been dealt with by a member of the Government. Let me again emphasize the fact that the protectionists who voted against the last Government have for the time being destroyed the measure to which reference is made.

Mr. JOHNSON.—So much the better for the country.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — That is the kind of company that these protectionists are now keeping! I should not have said a word, except for what fell from the honorable member for Moira, but I feel that an opportunity to deal with this measure which had been offered to me has been intercepted to the serious injury of the iron industry in Australia. A time will come, I hope, when those persons who believe in dealing with a matter of this kind will be able to record their votes with regard to the action of protectionists who have acted as they have done. I presume that the Prime Minister intends to ask for an adjournment for three weeks. That, of course, will be granted, but when the House again meets, the question whether the right honorable gentleman has a majority on certain points will have to be tested. Whatever my feelings may be, I have never wavered from my principles as a protectionist, and never shall waver; and I regret to see joining a free-trade Prime Minister certain honorable members whom I never expected to see in that position, and some of whom personally informed me that they never would join such a combination.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a second time, and passed through its remaining stages.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

Motion (by Mr. REID) proposed—

That the House at its rising adjourn until Tuesday, 7th September next.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I have no objection to the adjournment of the House until the 7th September. I think it is only reasonable that we should allow the Ministry to have time in which to lay down a policy or a programme. We must not take exception to the time proposed. But I must say that the probabilities are that that time will hardly be sufficient to enable the right honorable gentleman to harmonize the discordant elements under his command. Seriously, however, I have no objection to the adjournment.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I should like to point out that an adjournment until the 7th September gives the Queensland representatives insufficient time to get to their homes. If the adjournment were extended for another week—

Mr. REID.—I am quite agreeable to wish to meet the convenience of honorable members.

Mr. McDONALD.—Speaking personally my position is that I was not able to get home for Queensland on Wednesday, and I have now no opportunity to leave till next Tuesday. I must waste a week either in Melbourne, or on the way to my electorate. The position is awkward. I do not wish to offer any antagonism to the motion, but if the House has no objection I should like the Prime Minister to extend the time for another week.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan).—A Western Australian member, who could not get home and return even in the time suggested by the honorable member for Kennedy, I think that we ought not to ask the Government to adjourn for a longer period than has been asked for. The session is far advanced. We shall soon be approaching Christmas. In the interests of public business we ought not to have a longer adjournment than is necessary. The shortest possible adjournment has, I think, been asked for. I should strongly object to forcing upon the Government a longer adjournment than they consider necessary. In fact, the session has been made up of adjournments, and we have done very little useful work. I hope the Prime Minister will not consent to a suggested extension of the time proposed in the motion.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 4.37 p.m.

Senate.

y, 24 August, 1904.

NT took the chair at 2.30 prayers.

EXPENSES OF RIFLE TEAMS.

HESON.—I desire to ask neral if the Government decision on the application al Rifle Associations of the for assistance towards the ses of representative teams g to Perth, Western Aus part in the Commonwealth

JOSIAH SYMON.—It is st in the direction intended.
l be definitely determined,
ed to the Senate later on.

SERVANTS' ASSURANCE POLICIES.

ANIFORTH SMITH.—I
the Attorney-General how wealth civil servants have assurance policies with the Departments, as provided
6 under the Public Service

JOSIAH SYMON.—The Commissioner reports that 215.

GENERAL HUTTON.

VSON.—I wish to know
ey-General if he has noticed ne Melbourne Age of Mon-effect that the Government ring Major-General Sir Ed-re-engagement as General
ing for another three years?
undation in fact for such a

OSIAH SYMON.—I have onorable friend for his nating to me that he pros question. I have no know-on the subject, and so far as nly authority for the rumour y honorable friend to judge is the newspaper statement ers.

Col. NEILD.—I desire to yson if it is a fact, as stated ress, that when he quitted office he left in the Department a memorandum seriously reflecting upon the conduct of the Major-General Commanding the Forces of the Commonwealth?

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think that that is a question which can be asked. The Standing Orders provide that questions may be asked of Ministers concerning public matters generally, and of a private member concerning any matter of which he has charge, such as a Bill, or other business before the House.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Then, I beg to give notice that I shall, on the next day of sitting, move for the production of the paper referred to.

PRIVILEGE: CASE OF SENATOR
LT.-COL. NEILD.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I desire to ask Senator Best, as Chairman of the Select Committee on Privilege appointed to deal with the charges of Senator Neild against Major-General Hutton, if he is aware that one of the principal witnesses for the defence has asserted in the public press that "The Colonel will go down. We have got Best all right"? Secondly, is he aware that the same person has also indicated that the firm of which the honorable and learned senator is a member was advising Major-General Hutton in regard to the matters coming before the Select Committee?

Senator BEST.—I must be permitted to make some reply to these startling statements, which have now come to my ears for the first time. Neither directly nor indirectly have I or my firm at any time advised Major-General Hutton; and I have never heard even a rumour to the effect that the facts were otherwise. The other statement contains about the same amount of truth as that to which I have just replied.
It is utterly without foundation.

Senator HIGGS.—If any witness said what has been alleged to have been uttered, he committed a breach of privilege.

Senator BEST.—I think it is most offensive for Senator Neild to bring a matter of this kind before the House.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable and learned senator ought not to say that in answering a question.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Mr. President, in view of—

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator ought not to make a speech.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not wish to make a speech; but I should certainly like to offer a personal explanation.

Senator BEST.—We are certainly entitled to one. It is a disgraceful thing to do what the honorable senator has done.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think that the honorable senator can make a personal explanation. Does he wish to make a personal explanation in regard to some matter arising out of the answer which he has received?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Yes; I think that Senator Best misunderstood my question. Otherwise he would not have made the reply which he did. As the matter was a public one, and it was known that these statements had been made publicly, I thought it desirable that the opportunity for refutation should be equally public.

Senator BEST.—I prefer to treat such statements with contempt.

NEW ADMINISTRATION.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia—Attorney-General).—I have to announce to the Senate that, consequent upon the resignation of the Ministry of which the Honorable John Christian Watson was Prime Minister, His Excellency the Governor-General commissioned the Right Honorable George Houston Reid to form a new Administration. That task he undertook and accomplished, with the result that His Excellency has been pleased to make the following appointments:—

The Right Hon. George Houston Reid, P.C., K.C., Minister of State for External Affairs;

The Hon. Allan McLean, Minister of State for Trade and Customs;

The Hon. Sir Josiah Henry Symon, K.C.M.G., K.C., Attorney-General;

The Right Hon. Sir George Turner, P.C., K.C.M.G., Treasurer;

The Hon. Dugald Thomson, Minister of State for Home Affairs;

The Hon. James Whiteside McCay, Minister of State for Defence;

The Hon. Sydney Smith, Postmaster-General;

The Hon. James George Drake, Vice-President of the Executive Council.

It has fallen to my lot to be the leader for the Government in the Senate, a position the honour of which I value very highly, and I hope that in discharging its duties I shall secure the good-will of honorable senators, even though we may differ upon question of policy. The House of Representatives has adjourned until the 7th September, to enable the Government to consider and prepare their programme, and to arrange the course of public business, and if it will be the convenience of honorable senators to be present at this cause, in this matter, I am entirely in their hands—I shall conclude with a motion for the adjournment of the Senate, at its rising, until that date. My own feeling is that it would be consistent with the dignity of the Senate and its importance under the Constitution, that the policy of the new Administration should be made known in the House, at least concurrently with its announcement in the House of Representatives. But if honorable senators desire a lengthy adjournment, I shall be prepared to meet the general convenience. I move.

That the Senate, at its rising, adjourn on Wednesday, 7th September.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—I rise to congratulate the Attorney-General upon his assumption of the leadership of this important branch of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, and I am sure that when the measures introduced by the Government are in the interests of the general community, he will have no reason to complain of want of support from the Senate and the House to which I have the honor to belong. We have always endeavored to conduct ourselves as to show the people of Australia that our intentions are of the very best. In view of the fact that a majority of honorable senators desire to return to their homes this afternoon, I think that the present is an occasion on which long speeches should be declined. I therefore content myself with again offering my congratulations to the new Minister.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

ARMY SERVICE CORPS: SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

Senator STORY asked the Attorney-General, upon notice—

1. Is there an Army Service Corps in Australia?

2. Is it a fact that members of the Convoy (Ordnance Department) were called at the late Easter encampment to perform duties of the Army Service Corps, and received no remuneration for overtime formed, but are ordered to take time off ten days each)?

3. Is the Minister aware that this course considerably hamper the business of the Ordnance Department?

JOSIAH SYMON.—The which I have been supplied

Service Corps has yet been established in Western Australia.

The question was dealt with by the Minister of Defence, and as payment was made, in accordance with the offer made, the Minister is not prepared to reconsider the matter.

ON THE PURCHASE OF GUNS.

THE HON. SENATOR asked the Attorney-General—upon notice—

What is the cost of converting a 12½-pounder into a 15-pounder B.L. gun, including packing, shipping, and all ship charges, to the works in England?

What is the cost of a new 15-pounder, of modern construction, in England?

What is the cost of an 18-pounder recently adopted by the British Government?

What is the cost of the Commonwealth Government purchasing twenty 15-pounder B.L. guns, and the fact that guns of this type are being replaced in the British Army by 18-pounder guns?

JOSIAH SYMON.—I have asked the questions have already been answered. Even so, there is no answer to them again. The Attorney-General's answer is as follows:—

The cost of conversion of a 12½-pounder into a 15-pounder B.L. gun, including packing, insurance, and shipping, is £23; total, £523.

The cost of a new 15-pounder B.L. gun, including estimated charges for packing, insurance, and shipping, would be £23.

The information available here is that no decision has not yet been arrived at.

THE HON. SENATOR.—I wish to ask the Attorney-General out of that reply. Could he please inform me as to the cost of the 18-pounder guns to be paid to the States for the obsolete guns?

JOSIAH SYMON.—I have asked if the honorable senator would like to ask a separate question, and the Attorney-General has said that he will do so.

ON THE PURCHASE OF OBSOLETE GUNS.

THE HON. SENATOR asked the Attorney-General—
upon notice—

As stated in the Age of the 6th August 1904, the Government of the Commonwealth has agreed to return to the Government of Western Australia for presentation to municipalities a number of obsolete muzzle-loading field guns at present in that State; and that the Government of Western Australia have declined the offer on the grounds that the cost of sending the guns in question to the municipalities would be too heavy?

2. If so, have the Government any objection to making the offer direct to the principal municipalities on the gold-fields and at the coast in Western Australia?

3. Has the Minister any objection to laying on the table for perusal any correspondence on this subject that has taken place between the two Governments?

4. On what date do the Government intend to remove the obsolete field guns now being offered to and distributed among the municipalities of the various States, from the effective list of eighty-two field guns belonging to the Commonwealth as set out in Appendix "K" of the General Officer Commanding's report for 1903-4?

I should like to explain that two of the questions were answered on a previous occasion, but, owing to some irregularity, the answers could not be included in the records.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The replies to the honorable senator's questions are as follow:—

1. In reply to a communication from this Government, stating that there were some obsolete guns available for distribution to public parks, &c., in Western Australia, the Premier of that State wrote as follows:—"The military authorities inform me that there are at present only two guns which could be granted to parks, &c., namely, those stored at Karrakatta; but these would entail a heavy cost in removal and mounting. As the guns referred to have little interest, I question if any public body would care to pay the cost of removal, &c. There are eight smaller guns which will be available when replaced by ones of more modern pattern. These guns would, no doubt, be suitable for the purposes indicated in your letter. In view of the above facts, I think it wiser to deal with the question as it arises, and do not care to commit the Government as to its future action.

2. The Government sees no reason for doing so.

3. No objection.

4. None of the eighty-two field guns mentioned in Appendix K of the General Officer Commanding's report for 1903-4 are at present being distributed to municipalities, as the intention of the General Officer Commanding is to utilize the same until they are replaced by modern guns.

SUPPLY BILL (No. 3).

Bill received from House of Representatives.

Motion (by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON) proposed—

That this Bill be now read a first time.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).—Probably honorable senators are not aware that if they wish to debate this Bill they must do so on the motion for the first reading.

THE PRESIDENT.—The statement of the honorable senator is scarcely correct. The Standing Orders provide that in the case of Bills in regard to which the Senate may make requests, but which they cannot amend, a discussion may take place upon the motion for the first reading, with regard to matters which may not be relevant to the subject-matter of the measure. That does not, however, affect the right of honorable senators to discuss matters relevant to the Bill upon the motion for the second reading.

Senator PEARCE.—I know that some honorable senators wish to discuss matters which are not relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill, and I merely wish to point out that if they wait for the motion for the second reading their remarks must be confined to the subject-matter of the Bill. Whilst offering my congratulations to the members of the Ministry, I am sorry that I cannot compliment them upon the methods which they have adopted in order to secure their places upon the Treasury benches. As has been said in another place, they have initiated a new system in our methods of party government. They find themselves in this House with, I believe, a majority opposed to them, and they must take the responsibility of having, in another place, where they happen to have a majority, adopted methods which cannot be called fair, and which, if followed here, might place in an uncomfortable position any Government, even though it happened to possess the requisite majority to enable it to weather an ordinary no confidence motion. I think that most honorable senators have been struck with the peculiar combination now on the Government benches. Senators whose one object in political life seems to be the promulgation of the fiscal belief of free-trade are now associated with men whose one aim seems to be the advocacy of the fiscal belief of protection.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator knows that that issue is dead for the next two years.

Senator PEARCE.—Certainly, if anything can kill, or discredit it, it is the action of honorable gentlemen in regard to it. After having told us that it was a most important question—more important than was any other—

AN HONORABLE SENATOR.—But they older now.

Senator PEARCE.—They have covered that it is a very secondary question. Hence we find the present wonderful combination. We have only to look at the members of the Government in this House to recollect the fulminations of the Attorney-General when he occupied the position of leader of the Opposition against the present Vice-President of the Executive Council. We all remember the war which he pulverized that gentleman when the Tariff was under consideration. In collecting these facts we cannot avoid thinking that politics occasionally proceed with strange bed-fellows. At the present time, there is before another branch of the Legislature, a Bill with which we presume, we shall shortly be asked to deal, and one in which the country is intensely interested. Looking at honorable senators opposite, and knowing by a perusal of the press of this State the opinions which some of them entertain towards that legislation, one cannot help feeling apprehensive of the fate of that measure, if it is dependent upon the good-will of the present combination. For instance, the declared followers of the present Government include Senator Dobson and Senator Fraser, two of the most irreconcilable members of the Chamber, who are always prepared stoutly to oppose anything in the nature of reform, or progression.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—The honorable senator has no right to say that.

Senator PEARCE.—I do not think I am falsely accusing them.

Senator CLEMONS.—Why does not the honorable senator speak when Senator Fraser is present?

Senator PEARCE.—I am perfectly prepared to do so. But I would point out that it is Senator Fraser's duty to be present. From the safe obscurity of a distance given by the Employers' Federation hurled epithets at honorable senators on this side of the Chamber when they were not present. I take this opportunity to reply to some of those epithets, and to some of the criticism directed at this party.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—It is a waste of time.

Senator PEARCE.—It may be so. In any rate, I intend to avail myself of the opportunity to reply to some of those statements. So far, the Government have announced their policy, and consequently we can only gather what it will be from f their followers. The Governor, are dependent for their influence upon their supporters. Supporters, and particularly Mr. Fraser and Dobson, I gather the Administration is bitterly hostile to a White Australia.

MR. DOBSON.—The honorable senator is wrong.

MR. DOBSON.—Then Senator Dobson is wrong with the press.

MR. DOBSON.—No; I quarrel with the honorable senator. Everybody is in the White Australia with a few reasons; but everybody does not go to the extremes as the honorable senator does.

MR. DOBSON.—Senator Fraser is wrong. He said that—

He referred to had been very much surprised and some of it should be repelled the sugar-growers of Queensland to employ white men when they were there. The climate of Cairns is not at all of Mauritius.

It is a libel upon one of the members of the Commonwealth, because our honorable senator, when in ill-health, visited Cairns, with the object of visiting. In this Chamber, too, the honorable senator with whom we are in contact to part, but who recently visited Queensland in quest of health, now returned thoroughly reinvigorated, a country which is declared to be injurious to the health of white people. He expressed hostility to the White Australia, Senator Fraser said—

He referred to the recent change in politics. Mr. Reid and Allan McLean were

He was received with applause. He said—

He said the Watson Government had no clause in the Arbitration Bill which common sense or justice could

MR. DOBSON.—The honorable senator is wrong in the Ministry, because we have not yet proposed to do in connection with the Bill.

MR. DOBSON.—If they intend to present the Bill in the present form, in the opinion of the honorable senator they are “destitute of sense and justice.” Senator Dobson also found fault with the Bill in this Chamber. He proposes to amend the Bill in the Senate. The honorable senator who objects so strongly to the Bill because there are agitators who propose to revolutionize this country to place it upon a different footing. He claims that the Senate does not represent the second thought of the community, and is not a check upon legislation. I would ask, “Is not the honorable senator himself a most appropriate representative of second thought?” Is it not a fact that upon almost every vital issue which has come before the Senate he has had a second thought, a second opinion, and given a second vote? Time after time, when the Tariff was under discussion, did he not reveal himself as a “free-trade man”? When one vote would have meant the imposition of a duty, he suddenly remembered that he was a free-trader, and his second vote was cast in favour of free-trade. Similarly, after posing as a free-trader amongst free-traders, he has, upon critical divisions, saved the protectionist cause by giving a protectionist vote. We all recollect the historic occasion upon which he recorded four votes upon one question, and distributed them absolutely impartially by casting two in favour of allowing electors the privilege of recording their votes at any polling-place within their electoral division, and two in favour of permitting them to vote only at the polling-place for which they were enrolled. The honorable and learned senator desires not only to exercise this impartiality, but to see a Senate that will also exhibit it. He said last night that he desired to see a Senate that would exercise a second thought, and would put a check on legislation. I presume that the votes which he cast in the erratic manner to which I have referred were designed on second thoughts to check his own legislation. I warn the Government that if they are to depend for their support on the honorable and learned senator, it will be necessary for them to see that he leaves the Chamber when once he has recorded a vote on any question, for otherwise it is absolutely certain that he will avail himself with the utmost alacrity of any opportunity that may be given him to reverse it. It is somewhat singular that the Government have come into power on the plea that they are not opposed to the principle of compulsory arbitration, but favour it—that they are not opposed to preference to unionists, but are favorable to it. In the words of Mr. Deakin, however, they will give that preference only when it is asked for by a majority of those working at the trade affected. It is claimed that the McCay amendment, agreed to in another place, was carried on that principle, and yet the two honorable senators to whom

I have referred have rejoiced at the undoing of the Labour Government, for the reason, as they put it, that it means the downfall of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. They rejoiced at the carrying of the McCay amendment, not for the reasons given by Mr. Deakin, but because in their opinion it would render the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill nugatory. When we find that the Government have come into office depending upon the votes of men who hold that opinion, and that they may retain office only by the support of such men, we cannot feel very sanguine as to the class of legislation that will be introduced by them. I should like to ask whether any person—whether he be a member of the Labour Party, or of any other party—can hope for democratic legislation from a Government which has to depend for its political life upon such supporters. I cannot understand how any honorable senator who has any belief in democracy, who has any wish to see democratic legislation passed by the Parliament of the Commonwealth, can support a Government which is dependent for its political existence on the votes of men who are opposed to the principle of compulsory arbitration, and are prepared to make the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill utterly useless for the purpose for which it was originally intended. I wish the Government to understand that anything I can do to make their path more difficult, and their political life as short as possible, will be carried out with the utmost good nature.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is a very straightforward intimation.

Senator PEARCE.—I recognise that they are opposed to everything that I believe to be in the nature of progress.

Senator DOBSON.—Everything?

Senator PEARCE.—They are opposed to everything which, in my view, is in the interests of the Commonwealth. That opinion may be due to short-sightedness on my part; but holding it as I do, it may readily be understood that anything which lies within my power to make the stay of the Government on the Treasury benches as short as possible, will be done with the utmost enthusiasm.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—Before the motion that the Bill be read a first time is agreed to, I also have a few observations to make. I should like to preface my remarks by joining with other senators in congratulating the members of the new Ministry holding seats in this Chamber on their accession to office. No matter how we may differ politically, I think we can congratulate them on the high position which they have attained. We may agree with the methods by which the Government obtained office; we may not agree with their policy, or even with the method of administration which may be put forward by them, yet I hope that our personal feelings will not debar us from offering our very hearty congratulations. In eliciting the leader of the Senate, I should like also to express the hope that he will find it convenient, now that he has attained to so high and distinguished a position, to be more regular in his attendance than he has hitherto been.

Senator HIGGS.—He attended very regularly when the Tariff Bill was before the Senate.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I shall do so.

Senator GIVENS.—The Government administering the affairs of the Commonwealth seems to be about the most peculiar—I would almost go so far as to say the most shameless—combination of political parties that we have yet seen in Australia. In the first place we have at the head of the Government a right honorable gentleman who has frequently denounced some of his present colleagues and their policy in the most unmeasured terms. It has always been the doctrine of the free-traders, which the Prime Minister is the head of, that protection means robbery. They have invariably said that those who support giving of protection to any Australian industry are simply robbing the rest of taxpayers, and they have denounced the most violent language, all protection being robbery. And yet we now find members of the Free-trade Party arrayed arm with men whom they formerly denounced in these terms. What particular purpose they have in view I do not know, although I may be able to give a shrewd guess. On the other hand, the protectionists used to denounce free-traders as having a desire to strangle Australian industries—as men acting entirely in the interests of foreign importers—and these very protectionists, who were so vehement in the pursuit of their alleged principle, are now to be seen arm in arm with the free-traders whom they formerly denounced in this way.

Senator GRAY.—Do we not see a similar combination in the Labour Party?

ENS.—No. Every member of the party is entitled to vote as he sees fit on a question having any bearing on the Government. We have not combined to govern as advocating a system of Government which we have not combined to support. We have combined to support the members of which have been publicly denounced by some of our members, and we have desired to strangle the Australian industry. Every member is absolutely free, and that is what should be said of the members of the Government now before us. It is not that we should now find men who have raised these views—who have raised them on a pedestal, and we have people to fall down and send them into Parliament in their behalf—swallowing and sinking everything in the name of the Labour Party; or, we have “down” the party which has the great bulk of the Australian people, the great mass of the Australian people. I said just now that it was not the honorable gentlemen in the Government who are retactics; but on further consideration to me that that is not the right honorable gentleman in the Government has spent a great deal of his political career in principles that he formerly advocated, his capacity for swallowing what I believe that, if he only commenced with, he would be celebrated acrobatic snake charmer. A man is reported to be carried about the country, and he is seen in swallowing himself. He is a member and representative, Senator Drake, who has been specially congratulated on his inclusion in the Ministry. The present Government of the Executive Council is an exceptionally fortunate political combination. One of Tennyson's ministries may come and Minister, but Senator Drake appears to be in the Ministry; no matter which Ministry, Senator Drake is in office all the time.

SENATOR.—He is a politician, Mr. Bray.”

ENS.—Senator Drake is a complacent gentleman, who is not going to embarrass any Administration which he may be connected with, even allow his dignity to be affected by his acceptance of office. He was Attorney-General in the previous Administration, he took second place in this Chamber, giving the first to the Vice-President of the Executive Council; but now that he occupies the latter position, he immediately sinks his dignity again, and is content to give first place to the present Attorney-General. Such humility might be envied even by a Uriah Heep.

SENATOR SIR WILLIAM ZEAL.—That is most unfair!

SENATOR GIVENS.—If the contentions I put forward have no foundation they will have no effect; if they have any foundation, then it is right they should be uttered. At any rate, I shall not apologize to Senator Zeal, or anybody else, for what I may say on the present occasion.

SENATOR SIR WILLIAM ZEAL.—I do not wish the honorable senator to apologize; I should feel it a great humiliation if he offered an apology.

SENATOR GIVENS.—While representatives of Queensland may congratulate Senator Drake on his inclusion in the Ministry, I do not think they have any reason to congratulate themselves on that event. We have had considerable experience of Senator Drake in Queensland politics, and we find in him no political stability. On the present occasion Senator Drake is willing to join a Ministry, the head of which, on many occasions and in various places, has spoken of him in the most contemptuous terms. No matter how unkind or cruel my remarks may appear, what I now say is a mere circumstance compared with the contemptuous terms in which Senator Drake has been frequently spoken of by the head of the Administration of which he is now a member. Yet Senator Drake is willing to join with the present Prime Minister, and forget the past; and doubtless if I were in a position to offer the office of Vice-President of the Executive Council to Senator Drake to-morrow, the severity of any remarks I may make to-day would not, in the slightest degree, prevent his accepting the position under me. So far as the representatives of Queensland are concerned, we have no confidence whatever, judging from the past political history of Senator Drake, that the democratic legislation, which the Commonwealth Parliament has passed, and of which the people of the Commonwealth are so proud, will be faithfully administered. If there is one question that agitates the people of Queensland more than another, it is that of alien coloured labour; and it must be remembered that legislation on this point is to a great extent permissive. This legislation, which has been passed by this Parliament, may or may not be effective, according as it is administered by the Government in power. The Act dealing with coloured labour does not say that certain things must be done, but only that certain things may be done. The Administration may or may not apply the education test; and we know that the members of the present Administration, and the vast majority of their followers are totally opposed to the spirit, intention, and principle of that legislation. What sort of guarantee have we that the legislation will be carried out in accordance with the intention of the Parliament, or of the people who approved it? Senator Drake is specially interested in this question, seeing that he is the Queensland representative in the present Administration, and it is on that account that I make these remarks to-day. This has been a burning question in Queensland for a number of years. The people of other portions of the Commonwealth have told us that Queensland is a place which must have coloured labour, although the Queensland people, especially the people in the far north, have for the last fifteen years been opposed to the employment in their midst of coloured labour in any shape or form. We should be exceedingly pleased to have some assurance that the people of Queensland, through their representative in the present Administration, will be secure against any violation of the principle of the legislation we have passed—against any danger of large numbers of coloured persons being allowed to enter that State. But in view of the political history of the Vice-President of the Executive Council, what sort of guarantee or assurance can we have to that effect? Let me briefly state, for the benefit of honorable senators, what has been the political history of the Vice-President of the Executive Council in Queensland.

Senator DOBSON.—Spare us all that!

Senator GIVENS.—I would remind Senator Dobson that there is plenty of time to deal with the matter. Senator Drake entered the Queensland Parliament as an ultra-Radical and an out-and-out opponent of all coloured labour. He joined a Radical Party, which undoubtedly had the good-will of the people of Queensland at that time. Events brought about a coalition similar in some respects to that which has been effected recently in the Commonwealth Parliament. Senator Drake refused to have anything to do with that coalition, and separated, with a remnant of the old party who stuck loyally by him; and he gained a good deal of confidence and support in consequence of his independent attitude. When the time came—when the Queensland Government, known as the continuous Government, were actually defeated and replaced by another Administration—Senator Drake immediately abandoned his independent attitude and sacrificed his party in order to join a Ministry which was the conservative and reactionary Queensland Government ever saw.

Senator DAWSON.—What did Sir Horace Tozer say the reason was?

Senator GIVENS.—I am not going to repeat what Sir Horace Tozer said; I intend simply to express my own opinion. Senator Drake at that time joined an Administration which, to all intents and purposes, consisted of the greatest advocates of coloured labour ever seen in Queensland, and this fact the people of that State are not likely to forget or forgive. Senator Drake had, at that time, as loyal and as true a little party behind him as any leader might wish to have. The party was not so large in numbers as probably he might have had, but for fidelity and loyalty no leader who ever entered Parliament could have had a better little following. Yet the honorable senator sold that party. Although it was announced that he had joined the Government, no member of his party knew anything of the matter until he was actually been sworn in as a Minister. He never asked their leave. He never consulted them. He sold them, politically, and joined another party that was totally opposed to every principle which he had formerly professed. We cannot congratulate him on the possession of pliable political principles, as have enabled him to blow hot, and to blow cold, to join one party to-day, and to connect himself to-morrow with another professing entirely different principles, and, in fact, to do every thing which most honorable gentlemen should not be done. He was very lucky in being able to join the first Queensland Ministry. When the late James Dickson, who was the first Queensland representative in the Government, died, Senator Drake was nominated for the position by the then Queensland Government. He accepted it. That Government passed some good legislation, which, in Queensland, at any rate, hope will be carried into effect. I believe that Senloyally and faithfully to the whole of its legislation. Yet, we now find him Government which is totally the best principles of that which I believe cannot administer it. I do not doubt that aspect of affairs at I trust, notwithstanding, that the Government will, remain in office, proceed with administration of that legislation. I fear, I do not believe the administration to be for the country. I fear that the Government to use its influence in a particular class—the private class. That little class, a minority of about one-tenth of the community, will, in all things, highly approve of the work of the Government, and if the Government continues in office for any length of time, a minority is likely to obtain the things which it demands can be granted only at the expense of the vast majority of the people. It is impossible to grant privileges to any particular section at the expense of the mass of the community with which I am associated to all privileges and all that we ask for is a fair field, and no favour.

MR. KER.—What about preferences?

MR. EVENS.—Preference is absolutely fair, as will, I think, be conclusively shown to the honorable members when the question comes to be discussed in the Senate. Our Standing Orders require us to anticipate debate, and not go into that question now. I am very happy when the opportunity is given to argue it with Senator Dawson, or any other honorable senator. I know that what we desire is no favour shall be shown to any particular section of the community, but that all shall be given to all. So I insist upon obtaining from the Government Administration that may be in office that we intend to be very careful to see that administration of the Immigration Restriction Bill, which I could mention, is as far as possible to be beneficial to the community, and to give expression to that in the Parliament. For my own part, I believe that there are people in this community who are so disloyal to the Commonwealth—so disloyal to the legislation which has been enacted—that they take every opportunity to defeat its purpose, and the object which Parliament, in passing it, had in view. We, therefore, look upon it as somewhat disastrous that the administration of that legislation should be placed in the hands of the present Government. It will have to be watched very carefully. I hope that my anticipations in this regard will not prove to be correct. No one would be more pleased than myself to find the Ministry giving loyal effect to Commonwealth legislation. Should that prove to be the case, I am perfectly certain that their administration will meet with the approbation of the majority of the members of the Senate. It is too early to discuss questions of policy, because, so far, the Ministry have not announced their programme. But, as some of the members of the Government are more or less pledged to certain progressive legislation, I hope that they will keep their promises, and that it will be proceeded with. I trust that they will not make any such excuses as that there is not sufficient time to pass progressive legislation this session, and that we must wait for a more convenient session. I hope that nothing will intervene to prevent the Government from proceeding with a liberal programme, which will enable the members of this Parliament to pass some of that progressive legislation for which the public are so eagerly waiting, and the benefits of which they so strongly desire.

Senator O'KEEFE (Tasmania).—Like the honorable senators who have preceded me, I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the Attorney-General and his colleague upon having attained to their honorable positions, on the occasion of the recent reshuffling of the political cards. I do not propose to detain the Senate at any length, nor do I intend to touch upon matters of policy. This is not the most opportune time for dealing with the policy of the new Administration.

Senator DAWSON.—Their programme is that of the Labour Party.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I hope that will prove to be the case. I do not take it as a bad thing for the democratic side of politics in Australia, that the present Government has come to occupy the Treasury benches. I feel that those whose political ideas are on a par with my own will have far more to gain while the present Administration occupies the Treasury benches than if they were in Opposition; because I am satisfied that the right honorable gentleman at the head of the Government is not likely to make any proposal that may be carried fatal to the life of his Cabinet. I feel sure that when alterations are made by the Senate in legislation which is submitted to Parliament—as alterations will be made, because we have a sufficiently strong democratic majority in this branch of the Legislature to make them—and when Bills are sent back to another place with those alterations embodied in them, the head of the Government will always be willing to give the most earnest consideration to our amendments before he will imperil his position by making any proposal vital to the life of his Cabinet. But my chief reason for rising at the present juncture was to call attention to what I believe to be a very serious departure in Federal politics. The other representatives of Tasmania in the Senate do not seem to be anxious to put forward the argument which I intend to submit, and in another place none of the five representatives of Tasmania took the opportunity to represent this phase of the situation. It has been the custom that the States, which are the component parts of the Commonwealth, shall be represented in the Cabinet. Probably I shall be met with the statement that the last Administration of which I was proud to be a strong supporter, made the first departure from the practice adopted in the formation of the Federal Cabinet. But there were many circumstances surrounding the last Administration providing a reason for that action, which cannot be claimed by the members of the present Government. It seems to me that the smaller States are in a very great danger of having their best interests jeopardized in the future if a practice which gives the whole of the Ministerial representation practically to two States, is to continue. The course now followed gives six-eighths of the total representation in the Cabinet to two States, one-eighth each to two other States, and leaves the other two States entirely unrepresented, and without the slightest voice in Cabinet councils.

Senator DAWSON.—Without even an honorary Minister.

Senator O'KEEFE.—They have not even an honorary Minister, as my honorable friend interjects. Whilst the departure was made by the late Administration—and, I am free to avow, against my inclination—there were, in the view of Ministers, certain very reasons for making that departure, and reasons cannot be advanced by the members of the present Administration. A reason why Tasmania found no representation in the last Cabinet was that there were only two supporters of the Administration in the Federal Parliament by the State of Tasmania, out of eleven representatives from that State, and there were many of whom had far greater claims on various grounds to Ministerial rank and office than the two members of the party representing Tasmania. In this case, however, we find that in the other branch of the Legislature there are five representatives from Tasmania, one of whom has had more than a quarter of a century of parliamentary experience as a gentleman who was a Minister in the Government of the Commonwealth, and against whose administration of the Land and Telegraph Department nothing was urged, either in the press or in either branch of the Federal Legislature. That honorable gentleman has been passed over in the formation of the Reid-McLean Administration.

Senator DAWSON.—This is not the first ten season.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Then we have another Tasmanian representative, who has been a hot and strong supporter of the present Prime Minister. So warm a supporter of that right honorable gentleman was he a few weeks ago—I do not know whether it is so now—and so bitter an opponent of the late Deakin Administration, that on the night before the Deakin Administration went out of office, that gentleman sent a telegram from Tasmania to the whip of the Opposition, to this effect, "Try to keep the debate going, because I want to be in at the death of the Deakin Government." The bitterness of this gentleman's opposition to the Deakin Government was as keen as the strength of his allegiance to the party led by the right honorable member for Epping, Sydney. Yet that gentleman, who has had a very long political experience in the Senate from which I come, has also been passed over.

Senator DE LARGIE.—He will be in at the death of the present Government.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Then we have another Tasmanian representative, who has had many years' political experience, and was returned last December as a supporter of the Deakin Administration, but who immediately after taking his seat in the Federal Parliament, seemed to develop a most intense admiration for the right honorable t the head of the Govern-h that gentleman was re-ctionist, and was recog-tionist in his State career, cacy of that fiscal faith in veloped an intense admir-ent Prime Minister. That all matter nowadays, when side to side so easily.

AY.—Might I ask to whom ator is referring?

EEFE.—I am speaking of mber in another place. I at it is necessary that I name, though I should be do so if it were necessary.
senator should know very am referring from the de-I have given.

AY.—I thought the honor-referring to a member of

CE.—Did the honorable cap on?

EEFE.—I referred first of postmaster-General; then to representative, who was so nt of the Deakin Adminisret that the boat could not fast enough to enable him death of that Government;
rred to a third Tasmanian

As there are but three orters of the present Reidistration in the House of Senator Mulcahy should are.

ON.—Let us into the secret.

EEFE.—If Senator Dawson to learn their names, I can im privately. Of the five of Tasmania in the House es, three are hot and strong e present coalition Govern-ow to deal with this branch ure in which Tasmania, is, has equal representation
State in the Commonwealth.

Chamber six honorable senamania, and at least four of warm supporters of the pre-Government. I think that only a few months ago were supporters of such a com-think it will be found that prepared to support almost the present Government in this Senate.

CAHY.—The honorable sena-

Senator O'KEEFE.—It is quite easy to be a prophet in these matters. In politics nowadays he who runs may read. A Member of Parliament has only to make a few speeches and we know exactly where he stands, and what are his political leanings.
These honorable senators will, I think, be found supporting the present Government.

Senator DAWSON.—It is not because they love them well, but because they hate us more.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Very likely that is true. We know that we have in the Senate an honorable and learned senator from Tasmania whose place should decidedly be at the table. That honorable senator has earned a place in the present Government by the splendid work he did for the party in connexion with the Tariff during the first long session of seventeen months. That honorable and learned senator, by reason of his ability and general capacity, also is entitled to a seat at the table of the Senate as a member of the present Administration, but he has been passed over. We have in Senator Mulcahy also an honorable senator who has had a long political experience.
During his political campaign the honorable senator made himself out to be a supporter of the Deakin Administration, but I am sorely afraid that he is likely to find himself in bad company during the next few weeks. I am sorry to have to believe that we are not likely often to have the pleasure of the honorable senator's assistance in divisions likely to take place on such measures as the Arbitration Bill.

Senator MULCAHY.—Occasionally, when honorable senators opposite go right, I shall be with them.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I shall not go too much into prophecy with regard to the honorable senator, because I still have hope that his past democratic ideals will not be altogether forgotten, and that he will not entirely desert the democrats who have placed him in Parliament.

Senator MULCAHY.—I never have.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I still have hope that we may find the honorable senator sitting with us in divisions on important legislation, which will mark a distinct line between the democrats and the reactionaries.
The honorable senator has, however, been passed over in the formation of the Reid-McLean Administration. We have then another honorable and learned senator, who, I am sorry to say, is not at present in the Chamber, an honorable and learned senator who can be all things to all men, and who is, therefore, quite eligible for inclusion in any Ministry. Seeing that the present Reid-McLean Administration is admittedly and openly a coalition Government, comprised of four protectionists and four free-traders, in order that it might be a genuine, fair, and square coalition, I shall probably be met with the reply that it was not possible in the circumstances for some of the Tasmanian representatives to whom I have referred to be included. But even that argument will fall to the ground. I have no doubt that the honorable and learned senator, whose omission from the Ministry will cause great disappointment in Tasmania, was passed by because he happened to be a free-trader, and a very consistent one indeed, and it was necessary for a protectionist here to be chosen in order to balance the Government.

Senator PEARCE.—Senator Dobson a free-trader!

Senator O'KEEFE.—No; I am referring to Senator Clemons, and not in any offensive way. If that is the reason for his exclusion, it is a very strange thing that since a coalition implies an equal representation of each side, the palpable claims of other senators should have been disregarded, and that some of the States should have been entirely ignored. But if we leave out the honorable and learned senator, whose claims, I say, to a place at the table here, stand first, we still have my honorable friend opposite, who certainly has not been long in the Senate, but who, I am sure, has come to adorn it. He came here as a common-sense protectionist. Where was a bar to his admission into the Ministry?

Senator MULCAHY.—Do not forget that they have a protectionist policy.

Senator O'KEEFE.—We have a protectionist policy, but there was absolutely nothing to prevent the honorable senator's inclusion in the Cabinet, and thereby give Tasmania a voice in the counsels of the Commonwealth.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator said that he was a common-sense protectionist, and that was the bar.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Senator Mulcahy knows what he meant by that definition, I do not. He came into the Senate as a protectionist, and almost as though he had the gift of second sight, and could see six months ahead, he said in his electoral campaign that he was a common-sense protectionist, and a supporter of the Deakin Government with an "if," that he believed in the policy of a White Australia with "but"—with certain reservations. I not quite sure, but I think that he pressed his belief in a system of old pensions, with a reservation.

Senator MULCAHY.—No; I believe that without any reservation.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable senator was a protectionist, and a supporter of the Deakin Government, but a strong admirer of the policy of the present Administration, and of at least some of its members. I intend that no honorable senator more fit, by reason of his plauds, pledges, and apparent political ideas, have a place in the coalition Cabinet, was my honorable friend. We now have to the fourth representative of Tasmania in the Senate. It seems to me that Senator Dobson would "fill the bill," in either a protectionist or a free-trade Government, in either a democratic or a reactionary Government, because, in that smiling way of his, he can be all things to all men at the same time.

Senator FRASER.—That is very unkind.

Senator O'KEEFE.—It may be unkind and no doubt it has often fallen to the lot of Senator Fraser in his political life to make remarks which, although very unkind, were still very true.

Senator FRASER.—Not personal, though.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—That is they have been doing—blackguarding.

Senator O'KEEFE.—These events should not be given point to without occasion using names, and I do not think that Senator Dobson needs Senator Fraser or Senator Zeal, or any one else, here, to look a him.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—He does not want the honorable senator's support anyway.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Senator Dobson does not want my support, because he has the support of the honorable senator and others behind him. As regards any speaking offensively of Senator Dobson, is, I think, the one agitator in this Parliament, who is going round Australia, stirring up strife between the classes.

we had a few more gentlemen of his political line of thought, speaking as he has been doing lately, that revolution of which he is so much afraid might soon come to pass.

Senator FRASER.—It would suit the honorable senator's crowd.

Senator O'KEEFE.—No; nor would it suit the honorable senator's crowd either.

amusing to observe the attitude of Senator Dobson, who has a very dictionary for epithets to the Labour Party.

Mr WILLIAM ZEAL.—What has the senator been doing for the rates? Nothing else but black-

O'KEEFE.—When any one else is to say, the friends of Senator are very anxious that his name be mentioned, and that nothing be said about him. I have taken the liberty of pointing out that a serious departure has been made. When a State returns a number of members of a party it should have the Cabinet. In this instance four of the eleven representatives had a claim to Ministerial rank at least one of them should have

I shall leave it to the representatives of Western Australia, if they think with the omission of a representative from the Cabinet. On the 11th, when there had been a shuffle of portfolios, the honorable and learned member is now in the proud position of the Senate, congratulated the members. Speaking from this side of the Chamber referred to "this Ministry of fragments." The phrase was striking, and it stuck. Without being as able as Senator Symon to use striking phrases, I think that they might be called a Ministry of extremes, because they are ceremotomists in fiscal faith, and react on matters of general policy for the State and progress of the people.

TRENWITH (Victoria).—I am glad that we were to have a discussion of this character this afternoon. I do not think it wise that we should, for I cannot see that any good result can accrue from a discussion of this kind. It is not desirable to have such a discussion at this time; a fortnight ago would be the proper time. I rise for a moment. Since we have met this afternoon I have been accosted by a friend with the words, "You have not changed your position, are you supporting the Government?" This has led me to question whether a change of Government is considered necessary, in order to fully inform every person, that a change of Government taking place, a change his seat. I do not know so. I have felt that the Senate in the House of Representatives should give consideration, not so much to men as to measures of legislation. In that respect, its functions are different from those of the other House.

Senator PEARCE.—No. Are we not concerned with administration?

Senator TRENWITH.—I think that we are. I am explaining my own position, so that no one shall make a mistake about it. I should not like to deceive any section or individual member of the Senate; and it is because of the remark made to me by a friend that I have felt it my duty to say a word or two upon this head. So far as I know, I am opposed to the present Government, that is, I disagree with their policy of refraining, during the lifetime of this Parliament, from amending our notoriously incongruous protective Tariff. Protection may be a good thing, but we have it not; free-trade may be a good thing, but we have it not. In the minds of fiscal thinkers there appears to be no middle course in this matter. They range themselves on one side or the other. Men like Senator Pearce believe that the best thing for any country is absolute and unrestricted free-trade, while others, like myself, believe it to be perfect and complete protection for native industries. Neither side has achieved its desires in connexion with the Commonwealth Tariff. There must be a majority in the Commonwealth in favour of one of these two policies, and my own view is that a very substantial majority favour the imposition of a complete and scientific protective Tariff.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Hear, hear.

Senator TRENWITH.—It is a debatable point, and one which we should discuss. As I differ from the Government in regard to it, I feel it my duty at a very early stage to make my position plain. The contention of Senator O'Keefe that it was wrong not to give Tasmania a representative in the Ministry, cannot be too firmly deprecated. There is no vested right in any part of the Commonwealth to be represented in an Administration.

Senator O'KEEFE.—It is all very well for an honorable senator who represents a big State, which has three Ministers in the Government, to say that.

Senator TRENWITH.—I am a native of Tasmania, and think a great deal of it.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable senator does not represent Tasmania.

Senator TRENWITH.—I feel that I do, just as I feel that I represent the most northern part of Queensland. I am a Member of Parliament for the Commonwealth, and the Government is the administrative body for the Commonwealth, whose people are entitled to the best to be obtained from the material to be selected from.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Has the Commonwealth got that?

Senator TRENWITH.—I shall not discuss that matter. I am dealing now simply with the question of principle. To consider arbitrary geographical lines in the selection of an Executive would be unwise, and I, for one, shall always set my face against such a course. There may come a time when the splendid little island where I was born may present to this Parliament—

Senator MULCAHY.—The whole Government.

Senator TRENWITH.—The whole Government. To my mind that is not at all impossible.

Senator O'KEEFE.—My contention was that some of the best men available have been left out simply because this is a coalition Government.

Senator TRENWITH.—I do not wish to labour the question, though it is an important one. As a Parliamentarian of considerable experience, I know that geographical considerations have often led to the formation of weaker Governments in connexion with the administration of the affairs of the States than would otherwise have been obtained, and I hope that the practice of considering geographical lines will not obtain in connexion with the formation of Commonwealth Administrations. If there is anything to be said in favour of the present Government, it is that, in some measure, geographical lines have been disregarded in its formation. At present that is all I can say in favour of it.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Why was Senator Dobson left out?

Senator TRENWITH.—I do not know that the Prime Minister would have done anything wrong if he had taken in Senator Dobson, whom I know very well, and with whom I had the honour to work as a fellow-member of the Convention which created the Constitution under which we now live.

Senator O'KEEFE.—It would have been a different Constitution if Senator Dobson had had his way.

Senator TRENWITH.—I very rarely agree with Senator Dobson, and, though I am perhaps as vain as another man, I think that if every member of the Convention had always agreed with me, the Constitution might not have been as it is. It might perhaps have been. The fact that we had men of various views, of high ability, of strong passions, and of great courage, led to our Constitution which, on the whole, I think, very general satisfaction. I shall not take part in any department of belittling of Senator Dobson which happens not to see as I do. I think to be wrong when he does not see but he no doubt thinks that I am wrong when I do not see as he does; and, all, no one can have a perfect patent of right.

Senator FRASER.—Yes; the members of the Labour Party have.

Senator TRENWITH.—As this question has been discussed, I wish to say in my opinion, it is a great misfortune that there is growing up a reading of the Constitution of the meaning of responsible government which is extremely prejudicial to the well-being of the Commonwealth. I have been a member of the Government for a period of only eight months—there have been two changes of Government of which we should have had, but for a strained and, I think, uncorrected interpretation of the meaning of responsible government. Responsible government is the growth of practically the system which has just passed. Original Administrations were held responsible for every item and detail of administration for carrying on the government of the country. Responsibility for legislation was attached, in the first instance, and, recently, only to financial measures to measures for carrying on and maintaining His Majesty's Government. Merely ordinary legislation did not come under the meaning of measures for which governments were responsible, and that it is a pity that we have from that reading of the term "responsible government." The action of the Government in making a change upon which it went out of office a change is to be seriously deprecated, and that is that of the Deakin Administration. In my opinion, it is owing to the narrow, proper, and restricted definition of the term "responsible government" that we are in the trouble in which we are now; and we should set our face against a future adoption.

Senator DAWSON.—But suppose a majority take the essence out of a Bill?

RENWITH.—I think that if action placed upon responsible by recent Governments were Parliament would be deprived responsibility, because members deterred from making a measure it ought to be from the fear of every issue, upon every detail, of voting of an "i" or crossing of might put out of office the men who had confidence.

DAWSON.—Therefore, the honorable senator is opposed to party government.

RENWITH.—I am not.

DAWSON.—I am.

RENWITH.—I am not opposite to party government; neither am I of the new doctrine now being which seems to me incompatible with the continuance of the monarchy, and the proposal that we should have a republic. I am in favour of the principle of responsible government, restricting very materially the "responsible." The Government should be responsible for carrying on its Administration—the Government of the country—and the Parliament responsible for taking up and discussing every piece of legislation. I should not have made these remarks in a discussion which has arisen. I have a question as to the place in which I desire to explain that my remarks are dictated by physical reasons. When I came into this Chamber I took a seat, because it suited me physically. I have only one eye, which happens to be right one, and whilst sitting in the right-hand corner of the chamber I am in a position to keep my eye upon the honorable senators. If I sat anywhere else I should not be able to see the whole of the honorable faces about me. Therefore, if there is any objection on the part of the Attorney-General and of my honorable friend Senator Drake, I prefer to sit upon the benches. I shall oppose the Government upon issues in connexion with the Government, and support them in regard to which I agree with them. It would be my attitude in what I do in the House I might sit, and I am in a position in saying that whatever is in power, I shall in the future do the same as was done in the past, namely, concerning anything else the character of the Government that is proposed. Even if men whom I do not like personally—there are not many of them, because I am of an affectionate disposition—introduce legislation of which I approve, I shall vote for that legislation, and altogether disregard the men.

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—I wish to explain my position in regard to the proposal to create a Council of Defence. As honorable senators will remember, the amendment to the Defence Bill proposed by me, and agreed to last session by the Senate, provided for the constitution of that essential body. The amendment was rejected by the House of Representatives, and I had intended as soon as the session commenced to bring in a small Bill to amend the Act, and to give effect to what I understand is the desire of the majority of honorable senators. When I went to see Senator Dawson, who was then Minister of Defence, I found that he had become thoroughly converted to the views I held last session, and that he had, as a matter of fact, appointed a committee of experts who were looking into the question, which was afterwards to be brought before the Cabinet. Under these circumstances, it was obviously unnecessary for me to bring forward an amending Bill.

Senator DAWSON.—Why does the honorable senator say I was converted?

Senator MATHESON.—Because the honorable senator declined to support my amendment.

Senator DAWSON.—I differed from the honorable senator only upon a matter of detail.

Senator MATHESON.—I did not know that the only difference between us was with regard to a detail; but, however that may be, I am very glad that the honorable senator agrees with me now. Now a new Government has been formed, and I know that at least one member of it, Senator Drake, is opposed to my scheme. I am unacquainted with the views of the other Ministers. I was prepared to speak at some length to-day, with a view to eliciting from the Government, when we re-assembled, a statement as to their intentions upon this matter. The Attorney-General has, however, assured me that the question will be taken into consideration, and that there is no necessity to direct special attention to it this afternoon. To my mind the question of appointing a Council of Defence is one of the most important that could engage our attention.

Senator GIVENS. — Why not afford us an opportunity to consider and deal with the matter?

Senator MATHESON.—I am assured by the Attorney-General that that opportunity will be afforded to honorable senators on another occasion. I consider that the appointment of a Council of Defence is essential, and I understand that a substantial majority of honorable senators are in favour of the proposal.

Senator PEARCE.—The Government do not believe in substantial majorities.

Senator DAWSON.—Is there not a wide divergence between the scheme proposed by the honorable senator and that which was adopted by the late Government?

Senator MATHESON.—I am not aware that the late Government adopted any scheme. All that I know is that a committee of experts gave the Government certain advice, and that the subject was to be brought before Parliament for discussion.

Senator DAWSON.—A précis of the proposed scheme was published in the press.

Senator MATHESON. — That is true. I am not quite in accord with the scheme of which a précis was given, but I am not aware that that truly represented the Government proposal. I think that the honorable senator knows that it was not accurate. However, I have been requested to abstain from discussing the matter at this stage, and I shall wait and watch events.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland). — I desire to offer my congratulations to the Attorney-General upon having attained his present very high position. His presence here this afternoon makes it very difficult to say all the complimentary things I should have liked to say with respect to him, however much I may disagree with his political principles. I can also congratulate two other members of the Ministry, namely, the Prime Minister and the Postmaster-General. My congratulations, however, partake very much of the nature of the applause with which one might greet a man who had succeeded in climbing a greasy pole, or one who had succeeded in tying himself into a knot and walking down a ladder.

An HONORABLE SENATOR. — Fancy the Prime Minister tying himself into a knot!

Senator TRENWITH.—That is not conceivable.

Senator HIGGS. — I deplore the fact that the right honorable gentleman has succeeded in attaining the position of Prime Minister of Australia.

Senator GRAY.—That is because the honorable senator does not know him.

Senator HIGGS.—I know a good deal about him. I have watched his political career for many years, and I must say I am not at all surprised at his having adopted the particular methods which resulted in his attaining office. If honorable members of the Federal Parliament had been of the same mind as myself, the right honorable gentleman would not have succeeded. I cannot understand Senator Symon and others, who hold similar political principles, could find it possible to support such a Government. Those who saw or heard those honorable senators during the four months occupied by us in discussing the Tariff, who heard the doleful pictures they painted regarding the burdens imposed upon taxpayers by that Tariff, will, I am sure, be very much astonished to learn that they are prepared to fall in with Mr. Reid, and the Government, in their determination to sink the fiscal question for a period of years. I agree with all that has been said of the Vice-President of the Executive Council by Senator Givens. It is a hard thing to say, but I must confess that the honorable and learned gentleman deserves the whole of the condemnation heaped upon him. His career in Queensland was that of a democrat. For years he kept the flag of a White Australia flying, when that policy was unpopular with the classes with whom he is now allied. To me the subject is a painful one, and, therefore, I do not propose to pursue it. The present Ministers claim that, in carrying on the Government of the Commonwealth, they adopt a method which is quite different from that adopted by members of the Labour Party. I point to the caucus, and to the platform given by members of the Labour Party as proof that our methods ought to be criticised and condemned by every right-thinking person in the community. I may say, and I am sure that most honorable senators who know anything about the history of the Labour Party will agree with me, that if the members of other political organizations had only discharged their duty to the people of Australia, the Labour Party would never have made its appearance in politics. The fact is that we were compelled to adopt our present methods to keep certain gentlemen up to the point of scratch.

TRENWITH.—It fails every time.
HIGGS.—It does not fail. Of e are some instances in which no sign pledges break them, but y the adoption of the pledge and ation of a political programme fect of keeping out of politics a men who would sell the people occasion. A great deal has y the party at present in power our caucus. Our caucus method, freedom itself compared with Reid and his party. No mem-Labour Party has any diffidence a caucus meeting to give expressions, but if report be true, the no attend the caucuses convened ne Minister dare not open their this afternoon we have an examin the silence of honorable sena-e. Senator Matheson alone has then only by way of explanane it is evident that Mr. Reid an edict that members of his s Chamber are not to speak, with-on of the leader of the Senate, make a few observations in ex-f his views. I desire to place the political pledge which the the Labour Party are required
It reads—

pledge myself not to oppose the cand by the recognised political Labour and, if elected, to do my utmost the principles embodied in the Fede-platform, and on all questions affect-form, to vote as a majority of the y Party may decide at a duly cons meeting.

CLEMONS.—Where can I obtain that pledge?

HIGGS.—The platform of the ty is published in the Queens-er every week. This particular rs only to the Federal platform, drawn up in Sydney in Decemby a conference of delegates rethe labour political organizations the Commonwealth. Those or-are open to any barrister or busi-or, indeed, to any person in the who cares to pay a shilling per here is the restriction upon free-tech or individual liberty under stances?

GRAY.—Do they not agree to ny action of the caucus after-

HIGGS.—No. I will tell the enator what may happen.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator will give the Labour Party away in a minute.

Senator HIGGS.—Senator Dobson objects to the true position of affairs being explained. If any member of the Labour Party thinks that sufficient progress is not being made in a certain direction he can ventilate his opinion at the caucus. If a majority are of opinion that the rapid passage of any Bill should be urged—the Arbitration Bill, for example—its leader conveys that wish to the proper authorities in a respectful way. That is all the pressure that has been brought to bear upon any Government by the Labour Party at any time in its career.

Senator DOBSON.—Are not members of the Labour Party bound by the decision of the majority?

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator has something in his mind that does not exist in reality. We are not bound by anything save the planks of the platform to which I have referred; but we are bound to do our best to get those planks embodied in the legislation of the Commonwealth.
What is there in that pledge which would make it derogatory for any honorable senator to sign it?

Senator GRAY.—Was there not a meeting of the Labour Party held in reference to the drought?

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator who is making so many irrelevant inter-jections is a free-trader, but nevertheless he declined to sanction the remission of the duty upon fodder which was intended for starving stock. As he is one of the representatives of the great free-trade party in New South Wales, I should like to know whether he is going to flout the wishes of the 176,000 electors who voted for him, because he was a free-trader, by sinking for a time the fiscal issue.

Senator GRAY.—If the honorable senator will pardon me, I will tell him—

Senator HIGGS.—I cannot allow the honorable senator to interrupt me at this stage.

Senator GRAY.—Then I can only say that what the honorable senator said is not in keeping with my remarks.

Senator HIGGS.—I signed the Labour platform, and the Labour pledge, and have never felt myself any less a man because I did so. It is, after all, a purely business transaction. If a candidate advocates certain legislation, and wishes to represent the Labour Party, he is invited to put his signature to a document, embodying the principles of the party, so that if at any time he go back on them, the party will be able to confront him with it. If an honorable senator called on Senator Walker, as a director of the Bank of New South Wales, and sought to obtain a small loan from the institution, he would find that he could not secure it unless he were prepared to attach his signature to a document, setting forth that he would repay the amount. If that be necessary, surely it is equally necessary that candidates for election to Parliament, as representatives of a party, should be asked to put their signatures to the platform which they propose to support? In order to show that all the talk about want of dignity shown in signing a platform is mere sham and hypocrisy, I would remind the Senate that the Governor-General would not accept the word of the right honorable member for East Sydney, when he called upon him to form a Government. He required him, as well as every other member of the Ministry, to take an oath or make an affirmation, far more drastic than anything demanded of a labour candidate, to the following effect:—

I, George Houston Reid, being chosen and admitted of His Majesty's Executive Council in the Commonwealth of Australia, do swear that I will, to the best of my judgment, at all times when thereto required, freely give my counsel and advice to the Governor-General for the time being for the good management of the public affairs of the said Commonwealth; that I will not directly or indirectly reveal such matters as shall be debated in Council and committed to my secrecy, but that I will in all things be a true and faithful councillor. So help me God.

Did the Prime Minister, or any other member of the Executive Council, think that there was anything undignified in taking that oath? If there was not, why is there something that is to be deprecated in the action of a Member of Parliament putting his signature to a paper setting forth a series of principles, and pledging himself to advocate those principles, and do his best to place them on the statute-book? I do not know whether the Governor-General was specially glad to obtain Mr. Reid's signature to the oath which I have just read, or whether he gave the matter any thought—and I do not use the Governor-General's name in any disrespectful sense—but any one who is familiar with the present Prime Minister's political career must recognise that such an oath was certainly necessary from him. I have taken a considerable interest in the Prime Minister's career.

Senator Higgs.

Senator GRAY.—The honorable senator seems to know little about him.

Senator HIGGS.—I have before me report of a speech which he made at Toowoomba in March, 1901, when this great leader of the Free-trade Party, in addressing the electors of a protectionist constituency, said—

He was a free-trader himself, but he thought they must all recognise that in the majority of the States protection existed, and that to bring in a Free-trade Tariff would dislocate the whole of the industry and commerce of the Commonwealth. Existing rights must be respected, and whatever was done must be done gradually and carefully, and with due regard for the best interests of the whole Australian people. Mr. Barton had stated, it was probable that a Federal Tariff would be more like the existing Tariff of Queensland than like the Tariff of any of the other States. There must be no loss of time in abstract discussion on the relative merits of free-trade and protection until they had gained some experience of the working of a Federal Tariff, after which they would be better able to judge what the permanent uniform Tariff ought to be.

That is an extract from a speech made in March, 1901; but at the Melbourne Town Hall, on 11th October, 1902, when addressing a particularly well-dressed audience whom he said were being ruined by the policy of protection, he stated, in referring to the Tariff, that—

So ashamed were the Protectionists at the result of their great victory that they would not own it. He fully believed that if he adopted the policy of letting the Tariff alone for a few years he could get a considerable number of votes both inside and outside the Federal Parliament; but that was not the way in which he desired to act in public life. (Cheers.) If he had made one thing more clear than another it was that he had an invincible repugnance to measures of that description. If the power came in his hands—

And I would draw the particular attention of Senator Drake to this sentence—

he would not rest until the Tariff of Australia was based upon sound principles.

Those sound principles, as we know from a review of the Prime Minister's career, consist of the raising of the revenue mostly by way of duties on stimulants and narcotics and the removal of duties of a kind that are likely to protect the industry of the Commonwealth. Having said that, if the power came into his hands he would not rest until he introduced a free-trade policy for the Commonwealth, the right honorable gentleman, for some reason or other, is now prepared to abandon all his political principles, and, if necessary, to sink free-trade a hundred fathoms deep. Honorable senators will therefore see, from a review of these incidents in the Prime career, how very necessary it took office, to obtain from him he would be loyal to the principle at the root of responsible

He was just as willing last year into an alliance with the party as Mr. Deakin was this year, the life of the Barton-Deakin union. Had the Labour Party alone, the present Prime Minister been perfectly willing to make with us on the same lines as those has combined with the Congress of the Protectionist Party. Held in the Town Hall, Sydney, December, 1902, he said—

You all know, intimate and friendly the Labour Party of New South five years whilst I was Prime Minister. I never mind the caucus my road. We had five years alliance. . . . But I do not know William McMillan about the I say that as long as they go my all right.

ones disclose the political character of a gentleman which is at the head of administration of the Commonwealth are the principles which that honorable gentleman, and it is to be satisfactory to honorable men who have changed their seats as Smith, Matheson, Best, and his coalition, to me, is a most one, which one could hardly be in a democracy like that

DOBSON.—“Anything is possible in a democracy.”

HIGGS. — Senator O’Keefe the question of State representation appears to be a combination of conservative elements of Victoria and South Wales against the demonstration in Australia. The other four are, to a very great extent, simply ignored by the Government. It is a matter of satisfaction of the Labour Party to know that the things cannot last. The members of Australia are bound to see the result of the combination—to see the indecent dishonesty of it—and when the Government and their supporters are the constituencies, as they will be, the people will have a right to express their opinion. I must do not think Mr. Reid has been very astute in his selection; and some members of this have a right to complain. I cannot understand how Mr. Reid came to ignore a gentleman who has fought his battles in this Senate, a gentleman in support of whom some 200,000 electors in New South Wales went to the poll. I refer to Senator Neild, and I cannot understand why Mr. Reid should have passed over that gentleman in favour of Senator Drake, who, I am satisfied, is acceptable neither to the democracy of Queensland, nor to the commercial classes whom, I believe, Mr. Reid thinks he is satisfying by his selection. I do not know how Senator Clemons feels. I know that the speeches which he made from this side, when Senator O’Connor and Senator Drake were in charge of the business, expressed, in very strong terms, his admiration for Senator Drake! In fact, Senator Clemons’ appearance this afternoon, and the appearance of the leader of the Senate, the Attorney-General, prove that neither feels very comfortable in his present position. We know that politics make us acquainted with strange bed-fellows; but I am sure that the present position must be to those gentlemen absolutely too exasperating for expression.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales). —I am surprised that it should be supposed for a single moment that there is a gag put upon honorable senators. I am a perfectly independent supporter of the present Government; and I congratulate the country on a coalition Administration composed of a large proportion of the talents of Parliament. I also desire to congratulate the late Ministry on having made a good record. I am no admirer as you, Mr. President, know, of the views of the Labour Party; but the late Prime Minister, and the late Vice-President of the Executive Council discharged their official duties admirably. I think the record of the Labour Government goes to show that the Labour Party has sufficient ability amongst them to conduct an Administration, as well, probably, as could the members of any other party.

Senator O’KEEFE.—Has the honorable senator anything to say against the administration of the late Government?

Senator WALKER.—I am not called upon at present to go into details; but I may say that I have a personal regard for each member of the late Government. Senator Givens delivered a powerful philippic against my good friend Senator Drake, the present Vice-President of the Executive Council. I was one who took an active part in the Federation movement in days gone by, and I know that Senator Drake was always a good federationist. I heard the honorable and learned senator deliver an admirable address in the Town Hall, Sydney, in 1899, on the question, and I have always entertained a great regard for him, although, in the matter of fiscal policy, we are as opposite as the poles. When there is a common danger before the public, parties have a perfect right to coalesce against that danger.

Senator GIVENS.—What is the common danger?

Senator WALKER.—I consider that at the present time there is a great danger of Socialism. I do not think there is a stronger free-trader than I am myself; and, in my opinion, the free-traders are perfectly consistent in their action, in the face of such a common danger as generally unites persons who at other times do not see eye to eye. Certain honorable senators opposite are fond of preaching on the word "democracy," somewhat like the old woman who saw great virtue in the "blessed word Mesopotamia." The idea of those honorable senators seems to be that they have only to speak the word "democracy" in order to settle everything. On our side of the House we are Liberals. We do not call ourselves Democrats; indeed, I regard the word democrat as always a doubtful compliment. Pure democracy is an excellent thing, but we do not see it in its purity out here. One point was, I think, made with some force by Senator O'Keefe. I am quite sure that, although we are Federalists, it is desirable, other things being equal, that each State should be represented in the Ministry.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is all I ask.

Senator WALKER.—I can quite understand that representatives of Tasmania and Western Australia must feel somewhat sore because they are not represented in the present Ministry. As a supporter of the Government, I hope the matter will be seriously considered, and that representatives of those two States will be appointed honorary Ministers. It was understood that there had to be three Ministers in the Senate, a resolution to that effect having been passed, I believe, unanimously. But here we are in the same position as before, with only two Ministers in this Chamber. I hope that when the Government do appoint two honorary Ministers to represent Tasmania and Western Australia, they will be selected in this Chamber, where there is plenty of material to choose from. Senator Pearce made some allusion to the climate of Queensland, as though it were impossible for people to go there without being scorched. Senator Givens, however, certifies that winter in Northern Queensland provides, probably, the most perfect climate in the world.

Senator MCGREGOR.—That is what Senator Pearce said.

Senator WALKER.—But Senator Pearce seems to think that Senator Pearce was inconsistent in going to Queensland on his health, that senator having spoken in favour of the employment of kanakas in the labour. It is perfectly consistent for a senator to be in favour of regulated kanaka labour, and yet to be of opinion that Northern Queensland is a good place for white men to visit during the winter months.

Senator GIVENS.—The climate of Northern Queensland in summer is sometimes cooler than that of Melbourne in summer.

Senator WALKER.—The late Government was composed of four free-traders and four protectionists, and the present Government is composed of the two in like proportion. Yet honorable senators opposite find fault with the Prime Minister on that account.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The Labour Party is not a fiscal party.

Senator WALKER.—The honorable senator knows perfectly well that there are staunch free-traders within the Labour Party.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It is not a question with us.

Senator WALKER.—The Labour Party dare not make the fiscal question a party question, because it would split the party up. The Labour Party unite for one object, and sink the fiscal question; and they blame the other side for doing a similar thing. Members of the Labour Party are not "game" to say whether they are free-traders or protectionists; they are on the fiscal issue, and then blame the other side, as I say, for doing the same thing. But the other side are determined to defeat the Labour Party at the polls. We are anti-Socialists. We believe in individualism—in allowing every one to use his abilities to rise as high as he can in the world. The system of honorable senators opposite is to pull down, not to build up. I hope that my remarks will not be taken not unkindly. Personally, I accord to the present Government independent support, but I am not willing to swallow my free-trade principles. The issue has been sunk by honorables opposite, and there is no reason why it should not be sunk by the support of the Government. Once more I commend the Senate on being led by Senator Fraser, who has an excellent lieutenant, Senator Drake.

SENATOR DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—This is the only opportunity we have to have to say a word or two in praise and congratulation of the new Government. I wish to remark that I entertain a respect for the two Ministers of the Ministry in the Senate, and I am certain that every member of the Senate, on personal grounds, shares that respect. I respect them because of the way in which they have always conducted themselves as members of the Senate, and because of the way in which they have stood up for the principles on which they were elected to Parliament. We turn from personal considerations to the somersaults which have recently been performed in order to bring two direct opposites on the fiscal issue together in a Government. I think that any honest free-trader, any honest politician, no matter what school he may belong to, cannot but feel anything but disgust. I am sure that we see that two gentlemen, for whom we have had so much respect, have allowed themselves to be parties to a combination which, I am sure, will result politically of burying them in the eyes of the democracy of Australia. I do not complain that the Government has been brought to this. It suits the party to which I belong admirably. Never in the history of the Labour Party, I believe, has any man been in a place that will work so directly to his benefit in the long run as the formation of the present Government. By this combination of events all the hopeless conservatives have been put into one camp. That in itself has the effect of causing any man who is a true democrat to go over to the SENATOR FRASER.—We believe in working for the benefit of the whole people.

SENATOR DE LARGIE.—We believe in working for the democracy.

SENATOR FRASER.—So do we.

SENATOR DE LARGIE.—The honorable senator who interjects, has in the past worked only for the benefit of a small percentage of the people, and has been successful in throwing dust in the eyes of a very large section of the electors.

SENATOR SIR WILLIAM ZEAL.—That is what the honorable senator is doing now.

SENATOR DE LARGIE.—Our policy has always been open and straightforward. There is nothing which we have advocated on the public platform but we have been manly enough to endeavour to carry it out in Parliament.

SENATOR SIR WILLIAM ZEAL.—This is very manly—abuse of opponents!

SENATOR FRASER.—It is very manly; if I were the honorable senator's age I would ask him to come outside.

SENATOR DE LARGIE.—I hope that if Senator Fraser intends to take criticism in that spirit, he certainly will select some one who is more nearly his own age. Whatever policy I have advocated on the public platform I have always endeavoured to have carried out in legislation.

SENATOR SIR WILLIAM ZEAL.—The honorable senator should refrain from making attacks on others.

SENATOR DE LARGIE.—I am attacking their political practices, and I am entitled to do that just as the honorable senator has done on many occasions.

SENATOR SIR WILLIAM ZEAL.—I have never done it.

SENATOR DE LARGIE.—We have had sufficient exhibitions from Senator Zeal to be reminded of what he has done in this Chamber. It is of no use for him to apologize now; it is too late in the day.

SENATOR SIR WILLIAM ZEAL.—I do not apologize to the honorable senator.

SENATOR DE LARGIE.—I do not find fault with Senator Zeal, because I believe he is a consistent Conservative. He has always been manly and straightforward in the Senate.

SENATOR SIR WILLIAM ZEAL.—The honorable senator is an inconsistent Conservative.

SENATOR DE LARGIE.—I never thought that I should be accused of endeavouring to sail under the colours of a Conservative. But what I do find fault with is that honorable senators who hold liberal opinions should now be sitting cheek by jowl with Conservatives. Take the remarks made a few evenings ago by Senator Fraser. We find him congratulating his associates on the fact that Mr. George Reid and Mr. Allan McLean, who "were to be depended upon," were members of the present Government.

Senator FRASER.—Certainly; I say so now.

Senator DE LARGIE.—How does the honorable senator make that remark fit in with his 12th of July orations? Fancy Senator Fraser saying that Mr. Allan McLean is a man to be trusted!

Senator FRASER.—Certainly.

Senator DE LARGIE.—That gives the honorable senator's whole case away. If—judging from his past history and the tactics which he has hitherto pursued—there is any thing that is likely to injure his policy it is statements of that kind from a gentleman of his status. The honorable senator, as every one knows, when the Watson Government came into office, became ill. He was laid up with influenza. But since the Watson Government has been out of office he has been nearly insane with delight. Therefore we can excuse his little exhibition this afternoon. I repeat that, personally, I am quite satisfied with the turn that affairs have taken. I am sure that I am on the winning side. I face the situation knowing full well that ultimately events will turn in favour of the party to which I belong. But what I object to is the attitude of men of Senator Dobson's type towards that party. Ever since Mr. Watson, who was formerly a compositor, and Senator McGregor, who was a good old common labourer, with their hobnail boots, obtruded themselves into the Executive Council chamber, these so-called superior individuals have been addressing women's political leagues, employers' federations, and kindred associations, and have taken advantage of every opportunity to decry these men occupying such positions. No doubt the honorable senator now congratulates himself that these dangerous men, as he would call them, are out of office. Not only has he been making such remarks about the Labour Party in Parliament, but he has felt impelled to make attacks upon a gentleman who is not here to defend himself. At one of his meetings Senator Dobson made the following remarks concerning Mr. Tom Mann. He said—

The stupid, wicked, ideas of Tom Mann, and the Political Labour Party were already causing a great deal of misery.

That was one of his statements before one of those afternoon tea-meetings of well-fed and well-groomed dames from up Toorak way. I have no doubt, also, although the newspapers did not report his remarks, that Senator Dobson trotted out the old wheeze about free love, and all that sort of thing, for the benefit of the poor innocent women to whom he was speaking, and who knew no better. I have no doubt that he served out to them the old hog-wash about the violation of the sanctity of the marriage tie.

Senator DOBSON.—Absolutely untrue.

Senator DE LARGIE.—When we find that the man who makes statements of that kind, and talks of the "stupid, wicked ideas of Tom Mann," is an honorable and learned senator who introduced in the Chamber an outrageous and irreligious Divorce Bill, it is enough—

Senator DAWSON.—To make the angry weep.

Senator DE LARGIE.—As Senator Dawson says, it is enough to make angry weep.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator will accept my statement that I never referred to that phase of Socialism at a meeting, and I advised the women's organizations to drop it, on the ground that members of the honorable senator's party had repudiated it.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Does the honorable and learned senator deny that he used the words that he is reported to have used when he spoke of the wicked and stupid ideas of Tom Mann?

Senator DOBSON.—That was a reference to Mr. Mann's proposal to tax people out of their property. In my opinion, that was wicked and unjust.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I have heard some more of the honorable and learned senator's statements, which were made at a meeting of contractors. It will be noticed that the honorable and learned senator is very careful in the selection of the company to whom he says these things. He is reported in to-day's Age to have said—

Politics would be purified, and they would develop into a higher and nobler nationhood.

Fancy Senator Dobson talking of "a higher and nobler nationhood!"

But this could not be done if the Liberal Party went to the falsehood of extremes, as called by the term "blacklegs" those whose consciences would not allow them to agree with it.

"The falsehood of extremes." I know of no political party that has tried to rise to higher ideals in politics than has the Liberal Party. There is one thing which we can say in our praise, and that is that, no matter who may have attempted to drag us from the straight path of the policy we have followed before the country, rather than remain like any temporary advantage offered us in that way, always refused it. Had we hung on to the sweets of office and the methods adopted to bring the present coalition Government, I doubt that the Labour Government remained in office for a very long time. If we had been willing to denounce principles, and practically to sell out, we have no doubt we could have remained in office as long as we chose. But we sell our principles for the flesh-pot, we consented to go out, and we came down with the flag flying, and we continue in office to the disgrace of the country to which we belong. What I cannot do is, that we should find men who have been fighting for a particular principle for so long, and whose only reason for being as a political party, so ready to sell their principles aside. Free-trade has been the one solitary plank in our platform, and when that has been dropped, there is no apparent reason for our existence as a political party, and their opposition to the Labour Government is too soon to criticise the present coalition Government. We have their policy no doubt in our hands. But I hope that if they insist by their principle of opposition to the Labour Platform, they will be obliged not to follow the Labour Government to submit a policy in direct opposition. We shall then have a straight fight before the country on which a Government may be elected, and we shall see whether the country will tolerate free-trade on the hustings, or be prepared to sink that principle when it enters Parliament, and men who are as strong protectionists, are ready to sink their protectionist principles in office. Our party has never pretended to be a fiscal party. Both fiscal beliefs belong to the Labour Party, and fiscalism has never been the vital plank of the Labour Party. I hope that when the Government forward their policy, we shall have a straight-out opposition to our policy. I shall not cry about anti-Socialism; anti-Socialism proposed from the Government is in opposition to the Labour Party. I shall hail such an announcement as being in the best interests of the country to which I belong, if it be that that party should be returned again to power. I believe that we are on the winning side, and that we shall have the flood of public opinion with us if the party opposite are only plucky enough to put to the country a policy of anti-Socialism apart from a policy of free-trade or protection.

Senator FRASER.—Then honorable senators will have to change the Tom Mann policy.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Tom Mann is changing politics too rapidly to suit the honorable senator.

Senator DOBSON.—He is doing the classes more good than anybody else.

Senator DE LARGIE.—There has been an accession of members to the Labour Party everywhere Tom Mann has gone. He has everywhere been successful in increasing our strength, and so long as we get such admirable results from his work, honorable senators may depend upon it we shall stick to Tom Mann's methods.

Senator FRASER.—Does the honorable senator approve of him then?

Senator DE LARGIE.—Most certainly, I do.

Senator FRASER.—Hear, hear. We know where the honorable senator is now.

Senator DE LARGIE.—If Tom Mann only worked as well for the honorable senator as he does for the Labour Party, I have no doubt whatever that Senator Fraser would be prepared to throw over all his past declarations, and take Tom Mann to his bosom.

Senator PEARCE.—Does Senator Fraser agree with Mr. Walpole's statements?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I might ask if Senator Fraser agrees with another paid agitator, Mr. Walpole, a man who so far as I have been able to gather, is disseminating anything but the truth?

Senator MCGREGOR.—Or with Seibright?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not think that Senator Fraser can approve of Mr. Seibright, because he is one of the paid agitators whom the conservatives of Western Australia have been very glad to get rid of. I know that one of the members of the Western Australian conservative association, the so-called "National Political League," has said that Mr. Seibright has done them more harm than good, and that they were very glad to get rid of him. We must have the policy of the Reid-McLean Administration presented to us before we can criticise it, and I hope for the sake of a straight-out fight, which I do not think should be delayed any longer, seeing that there is so much unanimity on the Government side, that it will be a policy of opposition to a socialistic policy. I think that the party opposite should be manly enough to bring forward a policy declaring their opposition to Socialism, that we may have a straight-out issue submitted to the country.

Senator PEARCE.—No more irrigation works.

Senator DE LARGIE.—No more irrigation works, no more butter bonuses, and a hundred and one other measures advocated by some of the party opposite. I have been very much disappointed to find the two representatives of the Government in this Chamber sitting together as members of the same Administration. I expected better things from them. I should have been delighted to see either Senator Symon or Senator Drake at the head of a Free-trade or a Protectionist Government; but their appearance in this Chamber as members of the same coalition Government, which is neither one thing nor the other, does not add anything to their political reputations.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—What was the late Government? They were half and half. What is Senator Dawson, for instance?

Senator DE LARGIE.—Other honorable senators, as well as myself, have explained often enough that fiscalism is no part of the policy of the Labour Party.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Why not concede the same to the present Administration? Why should they not be given equal fair play?

Senator DE LARGIE.—Because the raison d'être of their very political existence is fiscalism, and they should be consistent in the advocacy of their principles. The last Administration was formed by a party advocating labour principles, apart from fiscalism.

Senator DAWSON.—What does Senator Zeal think I am?

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. — A free-trader.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator is absolutely wrong.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I feel quite sure that this Government cannot possibly be in accord with the wish of the electors of Australia, and that fact will soon be found out, unless they are prepared to sink fiscalism and make no further recognition of those declarations which have so often been made here in the past. Senator Symon has declared, on the floor of the Senate, that protectionists were robbers.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Did I use so hard an expression as that?

Senator DE LARGIE.—The honorable and learned senator used that term. Hansard will prove. A free-trader who holds an opinion of that kind cannot possibly reconcile his association with protectionist colleagues unless——

Senator FRASER.—Against a common interest it is quite justifiable.

Senator DE LARGIE.—If that is the honorable senator's policy, I can admire it. I have been satisfied for many years that the Conservatives would be obliged to follow that policy, and therefore I have no faith to find with the honorable senator for doing so. But I contend that it is wrong for the honorable senator who has been elected a free-trader or protectionist to combine with those who politically are opposed to his fiscal faith to form a Government without having gone before the electors and given him his political existence. The honorable senator changed his fiscal coalition the last Parliament. He started the session as a protectionist, and he ended as a free-trader.

Senator FRASER.—To whom does the honorable senator refer?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I am referring to the honorable senator, who moved the Address-in-Reply for a protectionist Government, who was recognised then as a protectionist, and who ended the first session as a free-trader. I am glad to find that he is not alone in that regard; they are all in the one boat, so that he is no worse than the others.

Senator FRASER.—I leave my votes to the Senate to prove that the honorable senator's statements are not correct.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Does the honorable senator still claim that he is a protectionist? (If he does, he will have to convert the protectionist paper of this day into his view, because it has declared time and again that he has gone back upon his fiscal principle on which he was elected, and that it intends to deal with him as he presents himself on the public platform.)

Senator MCGREGOR.—Did he not go to Reid's caucus at the Grand Hotel?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not know if he did, but it was reported that he left his fiscal party, and gone over to the enemy. That statement appeared in newspaper, and if it is wrong, the first time I have heard that it is.

GRAY.—Sir Edmund Barton said his Government was not a pro-government.

DE LARGIE.—We shall not start definitions. Suffice it to say, honorable senator who interrupts me, time and again that it was a policy. Whether it was an out-of-reckionist Government or not, it is not very much at this date, as the Government have gone to that policy which awaits the present Government very long. We shall see what their policy is. I hope in accord with the sentiments of Senators Dobson and Fraser—opposition to the socialistic policy—I shall be quite willing to abide by it when it is presented to the DOBSON (Tasmania).—I do not take part in a debate which has not consisted of personal abuse, motives, and raking up of political matters, and which, I think, has devalued the Chamber. I have risen for the purpose of referring to a grossly unwarranted attack which Senator de Largie has made on me.

DE LARGIE.—I rise to order. The honorable and learned senator has accused me of making attacks on this side of degradation. I submit to you, sir, that it is an insult to its dignity, that that is the order of the day.

DOBSON.—I do not think that the honorable and learned senator ought to make such an expression.

DOBSON.—I withdraw the expression. I do not think that the debate for the last two hours is likely to reflect on the dignity or usefulness of the Chamber or do I think that it is likely to reflect on the respect of even the democracy of the Government. Senator de Largie has made a gross attack, which he had no right to make, and which I have had reason to believe more than once.

DE LARGIE.—The honorable and learned senator attacked me.

DOBSON.—The honorable senator attacks anybody who attacks him. He attacks the honorable senator, but not me. If he will only listen to me, he will see how grossly unjust and unwarranted his attacking me.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The honorable and learned senator attacked a man who was absent.

Senator DOBSON.—I desire, first of all, to speak on general grounds. Ever since I took my seat in the Senate several members of the Labour Party have exhibited a happy knack of making interjections for the sole purpose of belittling myself and others, and exalting themselves in the eyes of the electors. The early pages of Hansard will be found to contain such expressions as "piebald Australia," "scabs," "blacklegs," "smoozers," and "you are in favour of a piebald Australia." All these expressions were interjected by honorable senators in the most irrelevant way, and presumably for the express purpose of belittling myself and others, and exalting themselves in the minds of the democracy of Australia. Senator de Largie caught hold of an expression of mine, in which I accused Mr. Tom Mann of uttering some wicked ideas. I was referring to his attack on the land-owner. At meeting after meeting Mr. Tom Mann has said that if he had his way he would put such a tax on land as would make the land-owner only too glad to sell it or give it back to the Government. I denounced that as an unjust idea, and to my mind it is essentially a wicked idea. I think that my honorable friends opposite will give me the credit of having met Mr. Tom Mann on a public platform, and saying to his face a year or two ago what I repeated recently behind his back. Although I indicated the statement of Mr. Mann to which the term "wicked" had reference, still Senator de Largie went on to jump at a conclusion; and because some men have been, unwise enough to talk to meetings of men and women about the extreme socialistic idea that at some time we are to have a State nursery, to which all children shall be sent, and that to some extent the sanctity of the home is to be invaded, my honorable friend, in order to make a most damaging point against me if he could, said upon no other authority than his inner consciousness, that I had at certain meetings of the Women's League been indulging in this criticism. I desire to state to Senator McGregor, the leader of the Labour Party here, that from the first I have objected to the fourth plank in the platform of the Women's League—"purity in our homes." When I asked what the meaning of it was, I was told that there were some quotations in the Tocsin which represented the views of leading German Socialists. I assured the women and their husbands, again and again, that there was nothing in that plank; that the moment a member in the House of Representatives accused the Labour Party of holding those views, it was repudiated by the whole of them in that House, and that three times an honorable gentleman rose to try to explain away what he had said. From the very first I have asked that that plank be taken out of the platform of the Women's League. I have said that it was a boggy, and had been repudiated by the Labour Party. I was trying to explain this to Senator de Largie, but, in his anxiety to make an unjust and unfair attack on me, he would not listen, and went on to impute to me thoughts which I have never uttered, or held.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Does the honorable and learned senator repudiate Mr. Walpole's statement?

Senator DOBSON.—I know nothing about Mr. Walpole's statement. I have advised the friends with whom I act that the Labour Party of Australia, through the late Prime Minister, for whom I have the greatest respect, had repudiated these notions, and that there was no occasion for them to retain the plank in their platform—to put up a boggy for the purpose of knocking it down.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is just what Mr. Walpole is doing.

Senator DOBSON.—I have nothing to do with Mr. Walpole, and I am not responsible for the views which he expresses. What right has any honorable senator, because Mr. Walpole, or any one else, makes some statement, to impute it to me? Why draw a bow at a venture in making an attack upon me?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I quoted the honorable senator's own words.

Senator DOBSON.—I have made a clear statement, which I think any one can understand, yet the honorable senator imputes to me expressions which I have never used, because I do not believe that the Labour Party hold the views which have been attributed to them. Cannot he express regret for the attack which he has made, instead of trying to bolster himself up? Are the members of the Labour Party going to imagine that persons have said certain things, and then, in this the highest assembly in the Commonwealth, accuse them of having said them? If that is to be the policy of the party, let them abide by it. I make them welcome of it.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New S Wales).—I wish to say a few words, particularly in reply to the observations Senator Higgs, who seems to think that cause a large number of members sitting his side of the Chamber have addressed Senate, we on this side are under a bon silence.

Senator PEARCE.—Was not the honorable senator told not to speak?

Senator GRAY.—I certainly was not.

Senator FRASER.—Neither was I.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I have been a Member of Parliament for something a quarter of a century, and no one has dared to tell me not to speak. Such a command would have been a sufficient incentive to make me talk until "all was blue." I have never entered a House of Legislature to act as the tool of any political party. My object has always been to discharge to the best of my ability my duty to those who have elected me to represent them.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Is that why the honorable senator was ignored?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not recognise the aptness of the interjection. I doubt it is an exceedingly wise one; but I am unable to see the meaning underlying it. I elected to sit on the right of the President, because I knew that my honorable friend and his party were moving on to the bench on which I formerly sat, and I thought that I might be in their way if I remained in my old seat. Therefore I moved to Melbourne, and asked that my name might be placed on a seat on this side of the Chamber, where I hope I shall remain in any one's way.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator will be in the way of the Government if he does not keep quiet.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I have heard it suggested that those sitting on this side of the Chamber should remain quiet during this discussion. I certainly think that no member of the Ministry would be courageous enough to make such a suggestion to me. If such a suggestion were made to me, it would be sufficient to cause me to indulge in what a great orator years ago described as a wild shriek of liberty. I should let myself go. There are, however, one or two matters which I wish to mention. I am not going to deal with any question of politics at the present time, because I do not yet know what the policy of the present Administration is to be, and the fact that I am sitting on the Government side of hamber is an indication of nothing more than my desire to get out of the way of those who are now occupying the benches which I have left.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Will the honorable senator go to the caucus?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I know nothing about caucuses, and I have never attended one. If my honorable friend desires me to attend the caucus over which he so ably presides, I would remind him that I have not yet received an invitation to do so.

Senator GUTHRIE.—The honorable senator is quite welcome.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—There is a matter which I wish to bring under the notice of the Ministry, of Parliament, and of the public, and which only lately came to my knowledge; I refer to an extraordinary traffic in postage stamps of so serious nature that I deem it my duty to at once draw attention to it. It has come to my knowledge that colonial postage stamps to a great value are being shipped from Europe to Australia in single stamps, not in sheets. I learnt recently from a most reliable and authoritative source that between £9 and 10 worth of single stamps have been returned from Europe to discharge a bill owing in an Australian capital.

Senator FRASER.—Does the honorable senator refer to penny stamps?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The stamps are of various values. Those who read the newspaper advertisements will know that used stamps are saleable. Old stamps, of course, are of value to the stamp collector; but advertisers also offer to buy any quantities of stamps which were used recently as yesterday. I have it on a most reliable authority—which I am prepared to give to the Government—that large quantities of stamps, which have been obliterated by the postal officials, are bought by certain persons, sent to Europe, and by a clever chemical process there cleansed of the obliteration, re-gummed, and re-mailed to Australia. As I am making this statement in the presence of the chief legal adviser of the Crown, I hope that he will take note of it. I believe, from the information given to me, that stamps thus treated, of probably thousands of pounds in value, are each year finding their way back to Australia, and are being re-used legally, thus defrauding the revenue. I have referred to this matter at the earliest opportunity available to me, after the receipt of the information. Some honorable senators opposite have commented upon the healthy climate of Queensland, and upon the fact that I recently visited that State for considerations of health. I do not know, however, that there is any similarity between travelling on the coast in a comfortable steamer and labouring in a cane field. But it is perfectly futile, when speaking of the climate of Queensland and of Northern Australia, to speak only of the winter climate. While I should be glad to spend every winter of my life in that part of the world, because I know no more charming climate than it possesses, I should be very sorry to have to spend a single summer there, because in that period of the year the climate is exceedingly oppressive, and is to be gauged not merely by the degrees of temperature registered by the thermometer, but even more largely by the condition of the atmosphere.

Senator DAWSON.—Did the honorable senator ever spend a summer in Northern Queensland?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—No; and I shall take precious good care that I never do.

Senator DAWSON.—Then why give an opinion on the summer climate of the State? The honorable senator should confine his remarks to his own experience.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I have been in Northern Queensland as late as November, and as early as the end of March, and those dates were quite as near to the hot weather as I wish to be. I do not desire to anticipate too much by going to Queensland in the summer time.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Did the honorable senator take the St. George's Rifles with him?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I should not have objected to do so, if any opportunity had presented itself to rid the community of a few interjectors. Northern Queensland has a most charming climate in the winter, but is a place to be carefully avoided in the summer.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator has had no experience of a Queensland summer.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I have been in Queensland just before the approach, and just after the close of the hurricane season, and I am not anxious to extend my experience. This is the first occasion on which I have been able to attend the Senate for some time past, because on two occasions I have had to apply for leave of absence. I take this opportunity to thank honorable senators for their kindness and courtesy in granting me that leave of absence on account of ill-health. I took the unusual precaution of sending medical certificates to the Clerk, as indicating the bond fides of my applications. I take this opportunity, the first which has been afforded me, to refer to something that happened whilst I was away, with reference to a most innocent article written by me, and published in an English magazine. I find that both in this Chamber and in another place opportunity was taken most ignorantly—I cannot believe that my assailants were actuated by malevolence—to misrepresent what I stated in that article. I desire to point out that all I said, that could in any way reflect upon the Commonwealth, or anything connected with it, was that there were not a sufficient number of rifles in Australia at the time at which I wrote to equip the existing Infantry regiments, if they were extended to their war establishments.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Did not the honorable senator say something with reference to pillow cases full of cartridges?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I said that some persons believed in the doctrine that it was not necessary to put our forces through a complete course of military training, and that some people thought that if a man had a rifle and a pillow-case full of cartridges he could do wonders. In making that statement, I was merely quoting from a very prominent Commonwealth publication. However, let that pass. I take this opportunity to repudiate the statement that I made any attack upon our citizen soldiers. I do not know how such an accusation could have been invented. One gentleman—I use the term gentleman, although I do not think the person to whom I refer is worthy of being so called—went so far as to allege that I had defamed men who in contradistinction to myself, had discharged military duty in South Africa. Was it my fault that I was not in South Africa? I have here copies of my applications, together with the acknowledgements of them, for service in South Africa, and I can go further, and say that, after having failed to obtain an appointment for service in South Africa I offered, at the time when the reputed massacre of the legation at Peking was engaging every one's attention, to raise and command on service in China, a battalion of Colonial troops. I am almost carried beyond the limits of human patience when I reflect that both in this House, and in another place, advantage taken of my absence to defame me a citizen soldier, to represent me as defaming my comrades in arms who had the good fortune to perform military service in South Africa, and as defaming the men supported and sent me here by an aggregate vote unparalleled in the history of the British Empire. I almost make an apology for introducing this matter here, but I have found that if statements are made and notice is taken of them—if they are treated as they ought to be, with contempt; and I admit that that is the proper course to take—one may be asked afterwards whether he did not deny them if they were not true. It is for that reason that I have ventured to repel accusations that could have resulted only from ignorance. I do not think they could possibly have been due to malevolence. If any of those honorable members who made speeches to which I refer had taken the trouble to read my article, they would have seen that it breathed the full spirit of a citizen soldier, and advocated that the people of Australia, instead of giving much time to sport and money-making, should devote a little more energy, time and enthusiasm to the higher duty of citizenship.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia—Attorney-General).—I only desire to thank honorable senators sincerely—I am sure they will believe in my sincerity—for the very kind remarks they have made in regard to me personally. In many respects the criticisms which they have been good enough to offer are entitled to, and will receive, full consideration.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a first time.

Motion (by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON) agreed to—

That the Standing Orders be suspended to enable the Bill to be passed through its remaining stages without delay.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I move that this Bill be now read a second time. I shall follow the precedent of my honorable friend Senator McGregor, and content myself with stating that this is an ordinary Supply Bill for the month, necessarily following that which was passed on the 27th July—necessarily because of the delay which was unavoidable in regard to the preparation and submission of the estimates. Although everything was left in an advanced state by the late Prime Minister and Treasurer, it was impossible for good example set by Sir George made his Budget statement of July. We are indebted to the Minister for his courtesy in the necessary notices and pre-Bill.

DAWSON.—Would the Attorney-General maintain the largely increased vote?

SIR JOSIAH SYMON.—When the Committee stage I shall be able to afford any explanation with reference to the items in the schedule that may be resolved in the affirmative.

On a second time.

Committee:

to 4 agreed to.

PEARCE (Western Australia).—I direct attention to the fact that in the Estimates, a sum of £12,000 was provided for the fortification of Fremantle, assuming the existence of the Government, however, this money was for the purchase of rifles and ammunition. Whilst I admit that, from the point of view of urgency, the supply of small arms ammunition is more important than the fortification of Fremantle, it is the nearest port to the scene of operations in the Far East, and one possessing a valuable trade, should not be defended longer than is absolutely necessary. I trust, therefore, that the Government which I have referred to will be able to deal with this matter and without any further delay.

MATHESON (Western Australia).—I wish to direct the attention of the Government to the item, "Royal Naval Service," in Division No. 44. In the Supply Bills this sum of £15,000 was voted in connexion with each of the States, was clearly set down as a sum which was to be repaid and not as a grant.

I should like to hear an explanation as to why a sentence to that effect was omitted from this measure. We are paying money for the Royal Naval Service, but it merely makes an advance to the Government. I quite understand that the present Ministry cannot be held responsible for the preparation of this Bill, but it is framed prior to their assumption of office. The item to which I refer is under Divisions 46, 49, and 53. In this instance I think that the words "paid by the British Government" should be inserted. Another matter raised by Senator Pearce, to which I did not intend to allude. I refer to the defence of Fremantle. In the Estimates for 1903-4 provision was made for the expenditure of £8,270 on works, and £5,000 on armament. Thanks to Mr. Carpenter, we now know that £9,000 of the vote which was intended to be spent, namely, £5,000 on armament and £4,000 on emplacement for the guns, has never been expended.

Senator DAWSON.—That is not quite correct. The vote was diverted to another purpose.

Senator MATHESON.—We have also learned that the present Treasurer, whilst filling a similar office in a previous Administration, formed the opinion that from £60,000 to £80,000 would require to be expended upon these works, and that, therefore, he deliberately gave instructions that the money which Parliament had voted should not be spent. As far as I am able to judge, the Treasurer's assumption is an entirely erroneous one. So far as I am able to gather, the position is that it was originally proposed to erect a fort at Arthur's Head, Fremantle. At that time it was clearly recognised that £20,000 would require to be spent upon that work.

Senator DAWSON.—Should we not have to buy the town out, on account of the damage that would be done by the recoil of the guns?

Senator MATHESON.—I do not know anything about that matter. No doubt it is a subject upon which the late Minister of Defence is well posted. The Government of Western Australia were quite willing to transfer the necessary land to the Commonwealth, and to offer every facility for carrying out the work. It has now transpired that the Treasurer did not wish to spend this money, and, looking round for some excuse—

Senator SIR JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not think that the honorable senator ought to say that.

Senator MATHESON.—Then I withdraw the expression. The Treasurer declared that an expenditure of from £60,000 to £80,000 would be required. That estimate was arrived at by including expenditure in relation to an entirely separate fort at North Fremantle, which was never mentioned, and on which no part of the £4,000 which we voted was to be expended.

Senator DRAKE.—But is it not necessary for the defence of the harbor?

Senator MATHESON.—I really cannot tell the honorable senator. The question before us is what we knew when we voted this sum of £4,000 as forming part of a total expenditure of £20,000, which would be required to complete the work. The representatives of Western Australia knew that a fort was contemplated at Arthur's Head, and that the sum named was sufficient for the purpose, and they were content that the work should be proceeded with. Then the present Treasurer imported into the matter the question of another fort, and the vote was allowed to lapse. I do not think that that is a state of affairs which is creditable to the Deakin Government. I do not wish any confusion to arise in regard to this matter. The Deakin Government alone brought about the present position, and no blame can be attached to the late or to the present Government.

Senator GIVENS.—Did not Sir John Forrest hold office in the Deakin Government?

Senator MATHESON.—Certainly, and he was a consenting party to the determination that the £4,000 should not be expended on the work for which it was voted.

Senator GUTHRIE.—He was Minister of Defence.

Senator MATHESON.—That is so. The curious point to which, having regard to the explanation made by the present Treasurer, I wish to draw special attention is this: That Major-General Hutton, in his report, dated 1st May, 1904, which has only recently been laid on the table of the Senate—and is therefore published long after the date on which we voted the sum of £4,000 for these works—states, at page 24, that £26,200 is all that will be required for the fortification of that part of Fremantle and the construction of the battery, including the purchase of the land. I have given the reference to this official document in order that honorable senators may see how absolutely futile and useless is the explanation made quite recently by the present Treasurer. Further evidence of the futility of that explanation is to be found in the fact that the General Officer Commanding has made provision for only one 7.5 gun and mounting for the defence of Fremantle for the next four years. We are, therefore, reduced to this position: That the present Treasurer, when holding the same office in the Deakin Government, refused to allow any money to be spent on this work, on the ground that there was no provision for the expenditure of some £60,000 or £80,000 which would be necessary to complete it; Major-General Hutton never contemplated spending any more than £26,200 on it the next four years; and that Fremantle, which, as Senator Pearce has rightly pointed out, is a most important trade centre, and a considerable shipping trade, was thus left unprotected, because of the squabbling of two Government Departments, for a period of five years, dating from the time when the £9,000 was voted. This is to be the position, simply because of an agreement as to the amount of money available. The defence expert said that required only £26,200 to carry out the work, while the financial man said, "If you ask for £60,000, and until you are granted that sum by Parliament, you must not have anything for the work." Is that a perfectly fair statement of the situation? Parliament voted £4,000 for this work, but because we did not vote £60,000, the Treasurer, as a member of the Deakin Government, said that it should be spent, while on the other hand we have the statement of the General Officer Commanding that £26,200 is ample.

Senator CLEMONS.—The honorable senator does not say that we voted £26,200 on this work?

Senator MATHESON. — No; but we voted £4,000, knowing that £26,200 would be required to complete the work. We have since voted on the Supplementary Estimates a sum of £3,800. The Deakin Government, which said that the money which Parliament had voted for this work should not be spent, actually expended it the sum of £3,800 which we did not vote, and the present Treasurer stated afterwards that he would not spend the £4,000 because it would entail an expenditure of £60,000 to complete the work.

Senator DAWSON. — That is during the financial year.

Senator MATHESON.—No.

Senator DAWSON.—It must be.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator is mistaken. The Treasurer said that the total expenditure on this work would range from £60,000 to £80,000, and until Parliament authorized the expenditure of the full amount required, he declined to allow any portion of it to be spent.

Senator DRAKE.—That is not quite correct. The Treasurer said that he declined to allow the £4,000 to be expended until Parliament voted it with the knowledge that mitting itself to the total examined.

MATHESON.—I will accept the senator's statement. And in Government, of which Senator Matheson was a member, spent £3,800 on the Harbor Trust without any authority from Parliament.

GUTHRIE. — Knowing that it would cost £60,000 to complete it.

MATHESON.—Knowing that it would not mean to spend the money to make the first instalment effective in July, this year, they brought in the Supplementary Appropriation Bill, which item of £3,800, which, as I read, had hardly been noticed at first sight.

logical sequence between these questions? It is a perfect scandal. The mantle should be treated in the same way. When we deal with the defence estimates generally I shall have more to say to the scheme. I quite admit that the present Government is not to be blamed for the fact that there is no occasion for the item to protest if I speak somewhat about the character of a Government.

PEARCE.—Some of the members of the present Government are still responsible for past sins.

MATHESON.—What I desire is special attention of the present Government to the fact that £60,000 is apparently required by the General Officer commanding to carry out the work. I may say that I understand that the Estimates for the current year make no provision for expenditure on the defences.

DAWSON.—There is some provision.

MATHESON.—It is understood that the Government do not see their way to commit the Commonwealth to an expenditure of £60,000 on this work, and I am glad they have not made any provision for it on the Estimates for the current year. Meanwhile the sum of £3,800 expended on the Harbor Trust building has been entirely wasted. There is no room for space on the top of the hill.

DAWSON.—To what Government is the honorable senator now referring?

MATHESON.—There is some difference in distinguishing between the Governments which have recently been in office, but I understand that the Government control these matters, and not the Minister, so that I am referring to any Government which happens to be run by the Defence Department, so far as questions relating to that branch of the service are concerned. I understand that is the position, but I may be wrong.

Senator DAWSON.—I am very sorry for the honorable senator's misunderstanding.

Senator MATHESON.—I may misunderstand the position, but I strongly believe that the Departments are paramount in these matters, and that a Minister, however well-intentioned he may be, never gets a show.

Senator DAWSON.—They have a legacy left for them if the Ministry like to take it up.

Senator MATHESON.—I may inform the Senate that I gave Senator Drake notice of my intention to raise this question in the Senate in order that he might be prepared with some explanation as to how this apparently unexplainable discrepancy arises.

Senator GUTHRIE (South Australia).—I should like to draw attention to one or two items which I think require explanation. On comparing the Bill with the Supply Bill we passed a month ago, I find that on the present occasion there is an increase of expenditure in the Defence Department amounting to nearly £20,000. There are new votes for New South Wales Rifle Clubs of £2,000; for Victorian Rifle Clubs of £7,000; for Queensland Rifle Clubs of £500; and for South Australian Rifle Clubs of £200. These, with other items, represent a total of £11,500. Then there is an item of £5,800 for ammunition for New South Wales, and, under the same heading, an expenditure of £2,400 in Victoria, or a total of £8,200. Training schools, which are an absolutely new item, represent an expenditure of £250 in New South Wales, £150 in Queensland, £100 in South Australia, £100 in Western Australia, and £100 in Tasmania—a total of £700. There are also increases in the votes for arms and equipment, and for ordnance in Victoria, and also for instructional schools. An additional expenditure in one month of £20,000 ought to be closely watched; at any rate, I look to the Minister for some explanation why these items have been included without any explanation being offered on the introduction of the Bill.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—Senator Guthrie, in directing attention to the increases of expenditure under the Military Estimates, is no doubt opening up a very fruitful topic of discussion.

My desire is to say a few words on the matter of defences, because I feel that at the present time the Commonwealth is, in this respect, in a pitiable state. It is a disgrace that there should be the present inadequate means for the protection of the community. One of the boasts of certain members of Parliament has been that a smaller amount of money is spent on defences under Federation than was the case when there were six separate State establishments. To my mind, that is not a fact of which we should feel proud. I agree that money should not be wasted, but that we ought to receive real solid value for all we spend. We must bear in mind, however, that if ever we are placed in a position of difficulty through Great Britain becoming involved in war, the Commonwealth will, unless a change takes place in defence matters, find itself the target of a hostile attack at various points. We shall be utterly unprepared to meet the attacks which may reasonably be expected. The strength and the safety of communities nowadays lie in their being prepared for all emergencies and eventualities. Honorable members who have taken the trouble to read the reports of the General Officer Commanding from time to time, know that the burden of his song has been that the Commonwealth is not doing what it ought to do in the matter of defences. A little time ago we were told by the late Minister of Defence, Senator Dawson, that it was intended to follow the advice of the General Officer Commanding, so far as providing a certain proportion of the necessary amount to make our defences efficient. The General Officer Commanding, however, reported that in order to place ourselves in a proper position of defence we ought at once to expend the full amount of money estimated as necessary; and it was only because of pressure that the General Officer Commanding made the recommendation that the expenditure should be distributed over a period of four years.

Senator MATHESON.—Where was the pressure exerted?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—It was parliamentary pressure.

Senator MATHESON.—Never!

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I say that there has been parliamentary pressure.

Senator MATHESON.—Ministerial pressure.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—But from whom do Ministers take their cue?

Senator MATHESON.—Not from Parliament.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—If honorable senators take the trouble to read the debates that took place in the other Chamber, when the Estimates were being dealt with year after year, they will find that the cry was, "Cut down the defence expenditure." One honorable member who occupied the position of Minister of Defence, came down to the House and said, "Gentlemen, I am not only prepared to cut down the expenditure to the extent you desire, but to further reduce it by £60,000 or £70,000." That was done in opposition to the recommendation of the General Officer Commanding. Why did we bring that officer to England at a high salary? It was because we believed he was a competent man to advise the Commonwealth as to what was ought to be taken in order to carry out of the special objects of Federation—defence of the community. The idea was to have, not separate systems of defence, but one system; and although that determination and object have been kept in mind by the General Officer Commanding, reports have been ignored, and matters have gone from bad to worse year after year. I give credit to the late Minister of Defence, Senator Dawson, and the late Government for being prepared to invite Parliament to vote the amount of money required for one year; but it would be far more to our own credit if the full amount were at once provided. We know that the whole of the money could be spent in one year, but we ought to see the Government in a position to provide the necessary defences for the Commonwealth. The Government would have responsibility; but, as matters are now, the Government may, or may not, have the means at their disposal. If the Government, in consequence of the parsimonious short-sightedness of Parliament, are not given the means, we cannot blame them for any eventualities which may arise. I hope they will not, arise. Is there a single man in the community who does not realize that at the present moment we may be on the verge of trouble of the character indicated? War has been going on between Japan and Russia for months past, and there appears to be a determination to involve in it some of the other powers of the world. If those powers should become involved—armed—how readily Great Britain may —in what position shall we find ourselves? Although the Japanese are endeavouring to "bottle up" the fleet in Vladivostok and Port Arthur, a squadron has been enabled to enter the former port, and make attacks on the mercantile marine of Japan, in Japanese waters. Then on the other side, cruisers of one of the belligerents are going about picking up what they can and endeavouring, as far as possible, to involve England in the war. With this in view, we may readily imagine that, if our navy may be, it would be sufficient for two or three of the enemy's cruisers to elude the British ships, and come close to our coasts. Such cruisers would be able to take possession of our country ports; it would be sufficient for a few days if they had two or three days to threaten bombardment, when we would be compelled to pay a handsome sum to save our property.

PEARCE.—The honorable senator talked very differently when the Naval Subsidy was under discussion.

Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I did not say so. I believe that the Naval Subsidy gives us the best scheme under the circumstances; but PEARCE has never heard me say one word about providing, as far as possible, for our defence. I have always maintained that it is part of the duty of the Commonwealth to, at any rate, maintain our naval bases, so that, in the event of the British Navy being driven to seek shelter, it could come in to refit, knowing that our bases were impregnable.

DAWSON.—We are spending our money on staff rides and training officers!

Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Well, staff rides are valuable. Officers also are valuable. We cannot have an army without officers, and officers are of no use unless they are well trained. We must have well trained and well trained officers, and in the time of trouble comes, we must have soldiers to rely upon their own ability and intelligence instead of being properly led.

DAWSON.—Is it not more important, when we have the men trained, to be able to put rifles into their hands and bullets into the rifles?

Lt.-Col. GOULD.—It is useless to have a body of men unless we also have competent leaders.

Senator DAWSON.—We have the men now, but not the equipment.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—We need to have proper equipment also.

Senator DAWSON.—I say that we have the men.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—What men have we as far as our permanent forces are concerned? We have fewer soldiers in Australia to-day than we had five years ago. Our military forces are less efficient to-day than they were five years ago. The cause of this is the mistaken policy of our Parliament in not providing adequate means of defence.

Senator PEARCE.—We have more rifles now than we had five years ago.

Senator DAWSON.—And more ammunition also.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—That is one improvement certainly. But the Commonwealth is utterly unable to defend itself from a hostile attack, which might be made by a couple of cruisers from any part of the world. It is all very well to boast of our great country, and our vast resources, but we should be prepared to defend them? It will redound to the credit not only of this Parliament, but of the Commonwealth, if we make provision for all necessary expenditure, in order to bring ourselves in line with the requirements of our position.

Senator GIVENS.—What is the use of the Naval Subsidy if things are so bad?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—The Naval Subsidy is of very great value to us. It enables us to have stronger vessels on the Australian station than we should otherwise have, and to take a small amount of the share of defending our coasts upon the water. The honorable senator may reply, "Let us have a navy of our own to defend our coasts at all times." But it has been shown clearly by naval experts that it is necessary to have naval forces concentrated as much as possible, instead of their being scattered. I quite agree with the honorable senator to this extent—that we ought to have destroyers, and boats of that class, maintained upon our coasts for the defence of our ports. The possession of such vessels would add to the assistance which we should be able to render to the more important naval force which at present assists in our defence.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable and learned senator know what a Destroyer would cost?

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—I know of course that it would cost a large sum of money. But I also know that our Commonwealth is worth defending. If our country is worth holding, it is worth while to find the necessary money to defend it.

Senator DAWSON.—We spend £300,000 per annum on naval defence, and the honorable and learned senator urges that, in addition, we should have Destroyers, which would cost at least £55,000 per vessel. The Commonwealth purse is limited.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Even if the vessels cost that sum, it would be true economy on the part of the Commonwealth to put itself in the position of being able to defend itself. Suppose an attack were to be made upon any one of the great ports of Australia. Would not a far greater amount of damage be done to the whole of the Commonwealth by the immense injury that would accrue from a bombardment than would be involved in the expenditure which I have suggested? Take the case of Sydney. Sydney occupies an important position on the sea-coast, which would allow it to be bombarded from the ocean. A bombardment of Sydney would probably involve a loss of millions, as compared with hundreds of thousands, which might have to be spent in order to provide us with adequate defence.

Senator DAWSON.—An enemy's fleet could not get to Sydney until it passed through the waters of Queensland or Western Australia, which are the two entrances to the Commonwealth.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—Yes; and at Thursday Island there is a garrison of forty-three men. At Albany on the west coast, the defenders consist of about an equal number. There are plenty of other means of coming down upon our coasts than by passing Thursday Island or Albany. We should endeavour to protect every one of our great seaports against any possibility of successful attack. I do not say that we could make them absolutely impregnable; but we certainly should do all that it is reasonably possible to do in that direction. I earnestly hope that the Government will take this matter into their careful consideration, and that they will ask Parliament for such a vote as may be necessary in order to protect the Commonwealth against the damage and loss which we should suffer in the event of war being declared between Great Britain and any other great naval power.

Senator DAWSON.—We have already spent our money.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—If the Commonwealth cannot raise sufficient money to protect itself efficiently, it cannot compete with some other nation suggests taking charge of Australia on its own account. I believe, however, that the Government will give the matter their serious consideration, with a view of making our defences more efficient, and that, if necessary, they will go even to the extent of purchasing torpedo boat destroyers, although we are assured that they would cost £55,000 each.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—It does not seem to me to be very much use for the Commonwealth Government to publish ponderous documents such as that which I hold in my hand, to have here a copy of the last report of the General Officer Commanding the Maritime Forces. There is abundant information to be gathered from this document to show that what is wanted is an entirely new system of Defence administration. I quite agree with Senator Dawson that we require an entire change. We find that the present system has been in full working order for very nearly three years—for years and eight months, to be precise—that at present, in some parts of the Commonwealth, even a parade cannot be held, because the men have no uniform to wear. That is actually the case. It is not an exaggeration in the slightest degree. A big parade was to be held in Sydney in the course of next month, indeed, in about a week from now. Well, the last fortnight it has been postponed indefinitely. Why? The fact is noted that the whole of the Defence administration of the Commonwealth has not succeeded in giving to the men new uniforms for two years or more. Indeed, I suppose that it is something like five years since they had new uniforms. First of all, there was to be a fresh uniform. Then a number of people in the different States, particularly in Victoria, were set to work to design new uniforms. Certain mercantile firms—tailoring firms—who had no special knowledge of military work, were authorized to prepare them. Phenomenal sums—I am afraid to say how much—appear to have been paid for designs for jackets. I believe it will be found that the Department has paid from £10 to £25 apiece for these designs. But many have not been acted upon. They have been thrown aside. Of course the taxpayer to pay for these experiments. I finally a very unsatisfactory has been chosen, and a very unsatisfactory cloth has been accepted by ten-ning else has gone wrong, and up to the last to the present time there is no cloth in the Commonwealth to make uniforms, except for a few staff ser-vice officers. I repeat that to clothe a soldier is an impossibility, and this is the case for years and eight months of the year. When that is the state of affairs, it is time there was some change. I can report that the General Officer Commanding says—

Compared for the unexpired portion of his term of service with the Commonwealth in the routine of my duties pro-vided for an officer is temporarily attached as Deputy Assistant Quartermaster-Gen-eral. An officer of the Corps of Australian Engineers is similarly attached for the performance of the duties of Assistant Adjutant-General, Engineer Services.

I know whether these demands of the General Officer Commanding have been met with, and whether we are being asked in this Bill to vote the money required for the purchase of rifles for the officers. I have only just now received a copy of the report, and I had time to look at it carefully. On page 15, I find a statement under the signature of the General Officer Commanding, which abso-lutely confirms what I said half-an-hour ago, and as absolutely confirms what I said in the British Navy League Journal. There is a paragraph here referring to "Small Arms," which re-lates to the revolvers, about which there has been a shindy, of which Senator Dawson may be able to tell us some-thing. This is the paragraph—

Senator DAWSON.—There will, on the completion of the orders now placed in England—

In his last report the General Officer Commanding told us plainly that it would take from eighteen months to two years to get an order executed. When the rifles are to arrive we do not know, and this is in this report—

Senator DAWSON.—All, on the completion of orders now placed in England, be sufficient to complete the whole of the Military Forces.

precisely what I wrote last March. I do not deny that there were enough rifles for the peace establishment. I de-clare that there were enough for the war establishment. Six months after I wrote it I find this confirmation of the article I referred to in an official document sub-mitted by the General Officer Command-ing.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable sena-tor forgets that there were 5,000 rifles ordered.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It does not matter a button whether they were ordered or not when the General Officer Commanding tells us that it takes from eighteen months to two years to execute an order. I said they were not available. If one orders a thing, and has not got it, it is not available. If Senator Dawson were a bachelor, and were about to espouse a charming damsel, and if he neglected to take the wedding ring with him to church, the probabilities are that, the ring not being available, the marriage would not take place.

Senator DAWSON.—No; if I loved the damsel, I should have broken into a pawn-shop and stolen a ring.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—That is too deep a riddle for me to solve. I do not know what the honorable senator means, nor do I think he knows himself. I say that to order a thing does not make it available. I did not say that rifles had not been ordered. I did not know what had been ordered, but I do know that orders are sometimes countermanded. That does not matter a button; the point is that if the rifles were not in the Commonwealth they were not avail-able. Everybody knows that, and of what use is it to say that they were ordered? Of what use is it for the people in charge of a bank on which there is a run, to say, "We have ordered sovereigns from the other end of the world"? The people "run-ning" on the bank desire that sovereigns shall be there, and it is of no use to tell them that they have been ordered from the other end of the world. The sovereigns not being available, the bank bursts, and this Commonwealth would be burst, in a military sense, if we had to rely for its defence upon rifles which had been ordered. I should like to know also, whether, in addition to these rifles, the necessary leather equipments have been ordered. I should like to know whether there are slings for these rifles, belts, ammunition pouches, and bayonet frogs.

Senator PEARCE.—And pipeclay.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—That is a very silly observation to come from so wise an honorable senator. If we are going to have sensible leather equipments we should have brown leather, and no pipeclay nonsense. Senator Pearce has no stronger objection to pipeclay than have I. I say that in ordering rifles we do not necessarily get the equipment, without which the rifles are of precious little use, unless there has been some new arrangement. It may be so, and I should like to know whether the necessary leather equipment is to be supplied along with the rifles. It is unnecessary for me to quote page after page of this astounding report to show how utterly Australia is without anything that can, in a sensible way, be described as defence. I shall, however, quote one paragraph which the General Officer Commanding has put into this report—a good many people think for the first time. But it is merely a copy of what he wrote in July of last year with reference to the Western Australian railway scheme. He has repeated what he wrote in his last report, because I suppose he considered it so good as to be worth repeating. He says—

It may be as well to state at once that a force of the requisite strength, organized and capable of taking the field, does not at present exist in Australia, and that there are at present no local means of equipping such a force.

I never, in any article I wrote, or in any speech I made, said anything half as strong as that.

Senator GRAY.—Everybody knew it.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—My honorable friend says that everybody knew it. If they did, it is astonishing to me that people should be so willing to trust the insurance of their property in such a rotten insurance office. If one desires to take out a policy to protect his house against fire, he is not satisfied to go to an office which is staggering on its last legs. He prefers to select an institution which is likely to be able to pay the face value of his policy should a fire take place. This insurance policy comparison is one which I used something like twenty years ago in the New South Wales Parliament, and it has become popular of late years. The fact that it has become popular shows that there is something in it. Such a defence force as we require in Australia, such a force as the defence vote is submitted to maintain, is not needed for the purpose of aggression, of attacking any other country, or of occupying any other territory.

We desire such a force as a protection in the event of our house being on fire—in the event of some force being perpetrating an arson upon us, in order to express it. I say that we are wasting our money in paying for an insurance policy, if we do not secure a force. This document bristles from one end to the other with allegations that we have a particularly rotten and unsatisfactory state of affairs existing in the defence of our wealth.

Senator MATHESON.—On what ground is the honorable senator placing the responsibility?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not mean to say that it is a joint-stock affair. I mean that it is sufficiently in the inner running of the Government to be responsible.

Senator MATHESON.—What is the Ministerial responsibility?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It does not seem to have been any responsibility of any kind except in the direction of needless expenditure. The Minister for Defence has spoken of the staff rides. In New South Wales there was a staff ride. I do not know the cost, or who paid for it; but I know that a few gentlemen travelled and were given a piece of country to which no one had ever dreamed of going, any more than they had dreamed of trying to capture Mount Stirling on the off-chance of getting a whiff of the war. I have not sufficient patience to discuss the matter quietly. The wildest piece of investigation, in the vicinity of Sydney, was selected for a staff ride, and there was not a pretence at defence, simply an attack. There was no attempt to make a defence; there was only an attack over this wild piece of country followed by the publication, at great expense, of as many maps as would be required for the defence. We were considering half-a-dozen sites for the Federal Capital.

Senator DAWSON.—Do not forget that we have cancelled a few of the staff rides.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I am not blaming my honorable friend for merely describing things as they are. I do not pretend to know who is responsible for their existence, or to lay the blame on any one; but I hold that the time has come when, if we are to vote money for the defence Forces, we must vote sufficient to have management efficient enough to obtain value for that money.

General Officer Commanding
ay—

ion is incomplete;

ctly what I said just now. I w that I was coming to that use I had not read it. I was ne organization as being absosatisfactory, and the Major-General
, or I back him up—

ents necessary for a mobile army e created.

ments are good enough to get r staff rides; that is one thing
—

neither sufficient guns, arms, equipmunition available.

ave the General Officer Coming a great deal more than I that magazine article for which in both Houses of Parliament, iculously attacked in the press.

AWSON.—The honorable sena-
the Australian people.

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—My hond must have had the article and the reader must have read thing which was not there, beows that I did not attack the people.

AWSON.—The honorable sena-
the Australian people.

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—My honor-must know, if he read the
I did not attack anybody.
hat more attention should be e serious question of defence, less attention to the joyousness ts, and the joy which some pere in making money.

AWSON.—What about the
at, if possessed of a rifle and e full of cartridges, the Aus-ks himself a match for the soldier of any nation under hat is against the authorities.

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If my hond will give me the article to referring—

AWSON.—Yes. Here it is.

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not her this typewritten copy is

AWSON.—The copy is all he article is most contemptuous Australians.

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—As my hond says that, I must go into this

I first of all drew attention ual manner in which officers and men were selected for service in South Africa, I pointed out that it had been the practice of Imperial officers in Australia to select men who had had no service at all in many cases, as against officers and men of the Defence Forces who had had years of training, and I then went on to say—

These mischievous ideas were fostered by the action of Imperial Army officers commanding the local forces in recommending for commissions in the various contingents despatched from Australia utterly inexperienced youths and gentlemen possessing social qualifications, in preference to experienced and trained officers of the Defence Forces.

Is that against Colonial troops?

And as the officers, so the rank and file. The wholly untrained were as, or more, welcome than trained members of the Military Forces.

With these examples of selection before them, and with the successes achieved by the officers and men so chosen before them—

That is an admission that the officers and men without any training had achieved success in South Africa.

the people of Australia have now an ingrained belief—

“Ingrained” is not a word that I remember using; but I dare say I did—that an Australian, astride anything with four legs, is, if possessed of a rifle and a pillow-case full of cartridges, a match for an indefinite number of the best-trained soldiers of any nation under heaven.

There is not a word in that against the Defence Forces or their members. I only point out that there are in Australia a number of persons who have not read aright the lesson of the success of Colonial troops in South Africa, and who have a silly and mistaken idea of military matters. Not one word of that comment applies to Colonial troops. I do not take back a word of it.

Senator MATHESON.—Is it not a bit of a sneer?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It is a bit of a sneer at persons who have not paid attention to matters as they ought to have done.

Senator GUTHRIE.—And the honorable senator sent that sneer to the people of England?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If it makes my honorable friend in any way happy to put that construction on it, he is welcome to do so. The General Officer Commanding proceeds to make these observations—

It will, therefore, be seen that the construction of a Transcontinental Railway would, under existing circumstances, confer no satisfactory advantage upon Australia in its present condition of military unpreparedness.

So that the General Officer Commanding tells us that we have neither guns, rifles, equipment, nor ammunition available; no departments necessary for the constitution of a mobile army, and no local means of equipping such a field force, and that we are in a condition of military unpreparedness.

Senator MATHESON.—It is all quite true.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I believe it is, and I draw attention to these facts. so that the taxpayers may have an opportunity of using their power at the right time to correct this shocking piece of administration. The General Officer Commanding continues—

The most that could be expected from the military situation at present existing would be the concentration of a certain number of armed men, who, without adequate administrative Departments, or the required equipment, would be quite incapable of coping with even an inferior number of an invader's troops, carefully trained, organized, and equipped with the latest modern appliances, as they unquestionably would be.

That paragraph is in entire agreement with statements which were made in this Chamber by me long ago. To pit Commonwealth soldiers, a large, or even a considerable number of whom were untrained, or insufficiently trained, against the troops of an invading force which would undoubtedly be highly trained, completely equipped, and furnished with every means of destruction that warlike science could devise, would be to send them to certain annihilation. No half-trained or half-equipped troops would be sent to attack Australia. Every man sent here for warlike purposes would be a picked man.

Senator DAWSON.—To what kind of training does the honorable senator refer?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—To the kind of training which enables men to carry out the duties attaching to warlike operations. In view of the fact that we are now being asked to vote a proportion of the £500,000, or more, annually spent upon defence, it behoves us, as the guardians of the public purse, to ask for information as to what is being done, and not to vote the money blindly. It would be absurd for a man who had a policy in a rotten fire insurance company to regard himself as protected against loss by fire, and it would be equally absurd for the people of the Commonwealth to flatter themselves that they are protected against invasion by the possession of a military force which has no chance of becoming as efficient as any attacking force would be. Our men may be as brave as any set of men under God's heaven could be, but they would have no chance of success if opposed to men who are better armed, and who commanded by efficient officers. In connexion, I would draw the attention of the Minister to the fact that, according to Appendix K to the report from which I have just quoted, there are in the Militia branch no fewer than 197 officers short, and in the Volunteer branch a shortage of 144, a total shortage of 341. Now, although Tom Atkins may be trained in the elements of soldiering by three months' drill, it takes years to make a decent officer.

Senator GIVENS.—Some of them are decent, even after years of training.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—That may be so. Many men who think that they are officers take a mistaken view of their capabilities. Speaking, not from any technical knowledge, but from my general knowledge, I have no doubt that the real shortage of officers is something like 400, because a great many of those on the list do not attend to their work. Probably some honorable senators know that there are on regimental lists names of officers who do no duty, who ought to be got rid of. To re-what a shortage of between 300 and 400 officers really means, I ask the Senator to remember that the usual company strength of volunteers is three officers to 100, or ten officers to 1,000, so that the shortage is something very serious. In the militia it is about three to sixty. It is no use to have staff rides, and provide other training, unless means are taken to provide a proper complement of officers. The service should be made sufficiently attractive to induce men to undertake this work. Though I am speaking in the most general terms, from a sense of my responsibility as a public man, I nevertheless speaking as the oldest military commander in New South Wales with but one exception.

Senator MATHESON.—What attractions are lacking?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—There are many causes why men remain out of service. For one reason, the forces have in a general way been in a state of disorganization. We have had inquiries after inquiry. Only the other day it was stated in the press that there was to be an inquiry into the alleged serious leak of official secrets—from what branch of the Defence Department and in what connexion I do not know. But, strange enough, what is complained of in Melbourne now took place when certain officers, one of whom subsequently left file the other ceased to be ate in New South Wales. Those are in Melbourne to-day, and only within their cognizance all of the Military Department. I now whether there is any cone between the two incidents; but the main all the same.

DAWSON.—It is rather sugges-

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I feel that evidence.

GUTHRIE.—It is more than that.

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Several other ve been inquired into of late.
been a scandal about a cable-er about a revolver, and yet ut an after-dinner speech. There ministrative branches, the Mine, which is supreme, and the ice, and, judging by statements appeared in the press, there serious disagreements between ad something in the newspaper ich shows that that is so. These r to me to be sufficient justifica-at I said just now in regard ed for an entire change.
on of officers is of paramount

What is the use of import-if we have not the num-ers necessary for instructional nd for leading the men? For New South Wales, there were rs to every 100 men in the egiments, but now there are s to every sixty men. With y altered proportion of offi-is a shocking shortage, and that this matter should receive consideration of the Adminis-

MATHESON.—What would the enator suggest in order to make attractive?

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If my views
I shall be prepared to make in the right quarter.

MATHESON.—Is not Parliament
arter?

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If the mat-that way, I admit that I have mind at the moment any special itions. One important point would direct attention, however, hat ever since the establishment nonwealth, the Defence Depart-een in practically a chaotic con-

Senator DAWSON.—Do I understand the honorable senator to say that, in the present state of the Defence Forces, at least 400 additional officers ought to be appointed?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I am adopting the exact figures given in the report of the General Officer Commanding. He shows that three officers are required for the permanent forces, 197 for the militia, and 144 for the volunteers. I do not know whether the total given is correct.
I have found such extreme muddles in the documents issued by the Military Department that I place very little reliance upon them. However, the report shows a total of 344 officers short of the establishment, and I have no doubt that even a larger number than 344 would be required, inasmuch as there must be a certain number of officers who exist solely on paper, and who are not doing any work.

Senator MATHESON.—Would such officers be paid?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—No.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable senator contend that for the number of men now constituting the forces, an additional 400 officers would be required in order to secure efficiency?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—According to the report of the General Officer Commanding, 344 officers and 2,782 men are required to bring the forces up to their full strength.

Senator DAWSON.—That is quite a different thing.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—But three or four hundred additional officers would not be required for two or three thousand men.
For 2,700 men we should require only eighty or ninety officers. For the sake of convenience, let us say that 100 additional officers would be required for the men who are not enrolled, but who ought to be enrolled in order to bring the forces up to the strength authorized by Parliament.

Senator DAWSON.—I thought the honorable senator was arguing that the present forces were under-officered.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Allowing 100 officers for the men who are not enrolled, an additional 250 officers would be required for the men who are enrolled.

Senator DAWSON.—Would that be from the non-commissioned officers upwards?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Yes. Commissioned officers.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator is calculating on three officers for every 100 men?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Yes; roughly. Of course, a few more would be required. Taking a complete foot regiment of eight companies, twenty-four company officers and three staff officers would be needed, making in all twenty-seven officers. The proportion of officers would be greater in the case of mounted troops. Therefore, the figures which I gave just now would be nearly correct as applying to infantry, but not so accurate as applying to mounted troops.

Senator GUTHRIE.—How about the artillery?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I should not like to say off-hand. I have not every detail at my fingers' ends. I do not pretend to know everything. Roughly speaking, however, my statement would hold good. I do not tie myself down to a few officers, more or less, because in order to be exact, I should have to calculate the actual shortage in each branch of the service—in the mounted troops, the artillery, the militia, and the volunteers. I see in the report of the General Officer Commanding a statement with regard to uniforms. I do not wish to take up time by quoting further from the report, but I repeat what I said this afternoon, namely, that although the present system of command and administration has been in going order for two years and eight months, it is not possible to-day to hold a review of the troops of the Commonwealth, because the men have not suitable uniforms in which to turn out. In New South Wales the uniforms are so disgraceful that the Commanding Officer can only order night parades, at which the uniforms cannot be seen. That information is published in the newspapers. I am not giving away military secrets, but I am only stating what has been published in the General Orders, and has been stated in the press.

Senator DAWSON.—But has the honorable senator stated the reason correctly?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Yes. I recently made personal inquiries, as a member of the Federal Legislature, and found that there was no cloth in New South Wales of which uniforms could be made.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Contracts are only now being accepted in some parts of the Commonwealth.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The authorities are always accepting contracts, but little comes of it.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable senator know that the Commonwealth Government is to supply the cloth, and that contract has been accepted for the making up of the cloth into uniforms?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Unfortunately all the world knows that a contract accepted for the supply of the cloth required for the uniforms, but the material was such an unsatisfactory character that it condemned, and everything came to a standstill. Some time afterwards another contract was accepted, and I suppose that new contractors have not yet supplied cloth, because there is none in New South Wales.

Senator DAWSON.—Cloth is being supplied to New South Wales from Queensland.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I am delighted to hear it, and Queensland has most sincere congratulations.

Senator DAWSON.—The cloth is to be made in Queensland for the purpose of meeting the requirements of the New South Wales forces.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The cloth has not yet reached New South Wales, or, if it has, it has not been placed in the contractor's hands. Some reference was made this afternoon to the condition of affairs obtaining at Tidbinbanna, which has been designated as the gates of Australia. So it is. It is a gate which rests upon very old hinges at the present time. Two forts have been erected there upon two hills. I do not know the exact distance between the hills; it cannot well be under a mile by road, but may be materially more—but the army provided to fight the guns in the forts consists of about forty-three persons.

Senator MATHESON.—How many guns are there?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not know. This little weakling force used to be eked out with a partially-paid or militia company, but I learned recently whilst on my visit there that this force had practically "petered out," as they say on the Pacific Slope. From discouragement, and for one cause or another, there is now no force there worthy of consideration. It is unfortunate, because there is an enormous number of hardy active men in the locality who would be able to work the guns in excellent style.

Senator GIVENS.—Where are those men to be found?

Lt.-Col NEILD.—They spend their time on the water.

GIVENS.—Owing to the policy of the honorable senator and his cannot make a living there.

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not see that policy the honorable senator

GIVENS.—To the black labour

DOBSON.—That is another objection.

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I do not see the interruption is pertinent to the question. Some persons would say it is impertinent.

DOBSON.—It is incorrect; that is a fortunate feature of it.

GIVENS.—It is absolutely correct.

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—There is also Albany, and a few troops are there. Senator Matheson has been particularly under his ken, and he has told the Committee some startling stories about it. Then we are aware that Fremantle is an important harbor at Fremantle which is utterly unprotected at the present time. Until the present works are completed and a large paling fence is kept the wind out of the harbor port was, I understand, declared an American captain as being in the Indian Ocean sheltered by the Cape of Good Hope." That deplorable condition of affairs which existed in Western Australia, at considerable distance provided an excellent little harbor, ought to be in a position to be so. Why did that State join the Commonwealth if she was not to share in the Commonwealth which the larger States could provide for to the present time, however, it has not received a pennyworth of contribution in the nature of defence from the Commonwealth, the defence forces of Western Australia are now probably materially inferior and less efficient than they were some years ago.

DOBSON.—That is not the fault of the Government. It is owing to the unequal and judicious distribution by the Government of the Commanding.

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I have already said that I do not pretend to allocate funds for what exists. I do not urge that the Ministerial administration with the military administration. Doubtless, it rests somewhere, but I make that statement unhesitatingly as a man of a quarter of a century's standing. I do not know who is responsible for the present position of affairs, but I presume that if a row can be created about a revolver, a similar disturbance may be raised about big guns. We require an entire change in existing methods connected with our great expenditure upon Commonwealth defence, and I sincerely hope that by some means a solution of the difficulty will be arrived at, and that we shall not continue to spend £500,000 annually in the unsatisfactory manner in which it has been expended in the past.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia—Attorney-General).—I am sure that honorable members do not expect me to be familiar with all the details and ramifications of the Defence Forces—

Senator GUTHRIE.—Being a man of peace.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—For the reason suggested by my honorable friend, as well as for others. I know they will not expect me to traverse the wide field which has been covered by honorable senators who have spoken, and who have a good deal of information regarding defence matters at their fingers' ends. Such information as I have I shall give to the Committee, in answer to the specific questions which have been addressed to me. At the same time, I desire to express my indebtedness to those honorable senators who have spoken, for directing my attention to reports and details, and to the general subject of the defence of Australia. There is no doubt whatever that we are all strongly impressed with the vital necessity of providing for an efficient and complete defence of our shores and of our country. I may also add that no Ministry would be worthy of its position in the Commonwealth if it did not realize the gravity of the situation, and seek to arrive at its solution in the way that would most effectively secure the desired end.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Have we not got the Auxiliary Squadron? What more do we want?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am sure that past Governments have been animated with equal zeal in that direction. I know that during his term of office Senator Dawson made a most earnest study of the whole subject, and I believe that he has left behind him valuable information and recommendations concerning the matters which came under his notice. All those recommendations, as well as the suggestions which have been made by honorable senators upon this side of the Chamber, will receive most careful attention.

Senator DAWSON.—It is to be hoped that the Government will adopt my recommendations.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am sure that my honorable friend will not expect me to pledge myself to that course, until I have considered them. The first point which was raised by Senator Matheson, had reference to the omission of the words "to be repaid by the"—shall I say, "Imperial Government"?

Senator MATHESON.—No; "British."

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—"By the British Government" in connexion with the expenditure of £15, which appears under Division No. 44. There is no doubt whatever that that money has to be repaid. The inclusion of that amount in this Bill, without the words referred to, does not mean that it is not to be repaid. Those words were omitted—I will not say because the late Government were frightened by the honorable member's references to the use of the word "Imperial" in the last Supply Bill.

Senator MATHESON.—Is that the insinuation?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No.

Senator MATHESON.—I would not mind such an insinuation being made.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am perfectly certain that the honorable senator's observations have always very great weight. At any rate, we see the omission, and the sum of £15 in the particular instance referred to is to be repaid. The other point which was raised related to the vote passed last year in connexion with the fortification of Fremantle.

Senator DAWSON.—There is no omission.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—In reality, there is not. When the last Supply Bill was before the Senate, the fortification of Fremantle was dealt with by Senator Matheson, and explained by Senator Dawson, who said that the vote in question had been expended in purchasing ammunition.

Senator MATHESON.—But this relates to another sum of £5,000.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I think that my honorable friend will see that the whole of the unexpended balance was used in the purchase of ammunition. This is the same matter that was dealt with on the last Supply Bill. I think that Senator Matheson was a little severe—or, perhaps, I should rather say, mistaken—in his criticism of the attitude taken up by Sir George Turner. Sir George did not say that because it would involve an outlay of £60,000 to complete the defence works at Fremantle. He considered that the sum voted last year should not be expended. He is greatly impressed, as we all must be, with the importance of having an adequate defence at Fremantle, and said so over and over again, that he wished that defence to be not a sham, but a safe and secure one. It was pointed out by him that, in connexion with the amount placed on this year's Estimates, there was a footnote indicating that it was only a preliminary vote, and that it was, he stated, determined on the assumption that the expenditure would be very much less than as he afterwards discovered it would be. On conference with the authorities, he learned that an expenditure of from £60,000 to £80,000 would probably be necessary to complete the work; but it has since been ascertained that this estimate will be considerably reduced by the fact that, as mentioned by Senator Pearce, the Government of Western Australia intend to allow the land requisite for the purpose of the fort to be treated as transferred property. Finding that was so, my right honorable colleague, as Treasurer in the Defence Ministry, obtained on the Supplementary Estimates which were passed—

Senator MATHESON.—That related to £5,000, not to the £9,000.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The sanction of Parliament was obtained for the expenditure of the balance of the money voted for this work, on the purchase of ammunition, and, as Senator Dawson explained, it was spent in that way. The Treasurer, having ascertained, as he stated, that the sum required to secure an adequate defence for Fremantle, will be considerably larger than he originally contemplated, when the Estimates-in-Chief are brought down, it will be found that they make provision for a first instalment.

Senator DAWSON.—Which will include all these Estimates.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is so. All these Estimates will be brought down, and Parliament, in voting the instalment, will be fully informed as to what the carrying out of this work entails. I think that is an honest and straightforward course to adopt. It would be scarcely treating Parliament with absolute candour if, on the voting of a particular amount, the ultimate expenditure involved with regard to this item could not be better ascertained than it was in the first instance. It was, therefore, from starve the fortifications of Fremantle rather from the point of view of defence than from the point of view of efficiency. It should be made efficient, safe, and strong, and this change was made.

SENATOR MATHESON.—Then how did they spend the sum of £3,800, for which they had no authority?

SIR JOSIAH SYMON.—They intended to spend £9,000.

SENATOR MATHESON.—They brought down £3,800 as a supplementary vote, for which they had no authority whatever.

SIR JOSIAH SYMON.—The reference which has been made, in the Estimates, to the expenditure in connexion with the demolition and re-erection of buildings on the site. When the Estimates were submitted, the whole item will be explained, and my honorable friend will give full explanation and the revised Estimates before him. Senator Guthrie has the excess of expenditure under the heading of "Defence," saying that there is an excess of £20,000 in excess of the amount provided under that heading in the Supplementary Bill. I may say that the amount represents expenditure on the purchase of ammunition.

SENATOR GUTHRIE.—It consists mostly of the purchase of rifles.

SIR JOSIAH SYMON.—That is the ammunition. I am explaining to the honorable member the information which I have.

SENATOR DAWSON.—It relates to amateur rifle clubs.

SIR JOSIAH SYMON.—For the year 1904 and so forth. The Divisional Committee make up this excess of £3,800, 87, 90, 106, 109, and 124, which represent a total of over £20,000. A provision has to be made before the year is ordered, because the Treasurer has to be paid on the money being paid to the contractors before the order is sent, and they have to be, through them. Then Senator Mather also referred to two smaller divisions. He mentioned division 99, which shows an increase of £10 as compared with that in the last Supply Bill under this item for an expenditure of £520, while in this year the item is £530. The explanation is that we cannot always accurately estimate the expenditure for the year into one representing a month's supply. It is a matter of dividing the total, and in this instance the amount has been £530 instead of £520.

SENATOR DAWSON.—Not necessarily to be spent.

SENATOR SIR JOSIAH SYMON.—Exactly. It is merely a provision with a view to expenditure that may be required. I take this as an illustration, because the same thing occurs in other instances. It occurs, for example, in connexion with the item "Camps of training and schools of instruction," in respect of which a sum of £250 is set down.

SENATOR GUTHRIE.—The total is £750.

SENATOR SIR JOSIAH SYMON.—I take as an example the sum of £250 relating to New South Wales.

SENATOR GUTHRIE.—That is absolutely new.

SENATOR SIR JOSIAH SYMON.—It is; and I may say I understand that the late Prime Minister and his colleagues, after full consideration, decided to leave the amount as it now stands. The money is not necessarily to be spent, but provision is made so that it may be expended if it is found necessary to do so. That is how the matter stands at present. In regard to all these matters, and particularly the more important general questions to which attention has been so ably directed, I hope that when we have the Estimates-in-Chief before us, the whole subject will be thoroughly ventilated, and that every point to which attention has been called will be considered in the meantime, so that we may have that which we all desire, a thoroughly efficient system of defence.

SENATOR MATHESON (Western Australia).—I wish to say a few words in reply to the remarks made by the Attorney-General. He will understand of course that we absolve him and his colleagues from any responsibility in this matter. We thoroughly recognise that it is simply an inheritance, and that the explanation which he has given is that which has been furnished to him by the Department. I want to point out two facts; first, that only £5,000 of the £9,000 in question was spent on ammunition, as is clearly shown on page 6 of the Supplementary Estimates.

SENATOR DAWSON.—That was only a diversion.

SENATOR MATHESON.—It was a diversion of £5,000 from the gun at Fremantle to the ammunition.

SENATOR SIR JOSIAH SYMON.—That is quite right.

SENATOR DAWSON.—The reason was that we could not get the gun, and we did want the ammunition.

Senator MATHESON.—I am not raising any question on that point, but merely making a statement of fact. There was another sum of £4,000 for the fortification at Fremantle, and that sum Sir George Turner said he would not spend because the total involved was too great to embark on without the authorization of Parliament. In spite of that, however, Sir George Turner spent, without authority, £3,800 on another branch of the same fortification. It seemed to me then, and it still seems to me, that the explanation Sir George Turner gave as to why the £4,000 was not spent in accordance with the authority of Parliament, is the most feeble and illogical that ever proceeded from any Treasurer in Australia.

Senator GIVENS.—Such a great man, too!

Senator MATHESON. — Sir George Turner has from me the utmost respect that I could entertain for any Treasurer; but in this case I suppose he was at the mercy of the Department, or something of that sort, and did not understand what was going on. We voted £4,000 for a specific purpose, and for a specific reason, which Sir George Turner gave, that sum was not spent; but, notwithstanding that fact, Sir George Turner spent £3,800 on a cognate undertaking which was never authorized, and which, unless the whole scheme be authorized, will mean that the money is entirely thrown away.

Senator CLEMONS.—Is the honorable senator not rather blaming Sir George Turner for not having done two wrongs?

Senator MATHESON.—On the contrary, if there was any wrong, it was in not spending the money we voted for a specific purpose, and then offering an explanation which does not bear investigation.

Senator DAWSON.—Was that in regard to the total expenditure of £60,000?

Senator MATHESON.—It was in regard to the non-expenditure of the £4,000.

Senator DAWSON.—I am speaking of the intended expenditure—of an instalment of the expenditure of £60,000.

Senator MATHESON.—The £3,800 was spent without authority, and will be absolutely wasted unless we confirm the scheme which authorizes the expenditure of £60,000.

Senator DAWSON.—That is what I mean.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It will not be wasted if the work of the fortifications goes on.

Senator MATHESON.—It will not be wasted, but Sir George Turner has suspended the expenditure of the £4,000, because he waits for further authorization.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—He waits the sanction of Parliament.

Senator MATHESON.—Then why ask, did Sir George Turner spend £3,800?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Surely honorable senator does not complain that?

Senator MATHESON.—I do most certainly. Here we have the Treasurer in his place, and saying that it would be folly to spend the £4,000 which was authorized; and yet on his own account without authority, he has spent £3,800. I want to make the right honorable gentleman logical. I want to convince the Senate and the public that Sir George Turner's excuse for not spending the £4,000 is a bit—absolute rubbish.

Senator CLEMONS.—Why should Sir George Turner not stop the expenditure if he was doing wrong, from the honorable senator's point of view?

Senator MATHESON.—Sir George Turner was doing what he ought not to do from my point of view. I consider money should have been spent; but I object to is the quibble.

Senator GIVENS.—Surely the honorable senator does not think that Sir George Turner would stoop to a quibble?

Senator MATHESON.—I do not think that Sir George Turner would do so personally; he is a gentleman for whom we have the utmost respect. It is the management of the Department to which I am referring.

Senator GIVENS.—If the Treasurer is a mere figure-head, why is he in the position? We are simply wasting his salary.

Senator MATHESON.—That is a question which I cannot debate on the Definite Estimates. In regard to the omission, it is suggested by Senator Symon, of certain essential words in the Supply Bill, simply because they would have entailed the omission of the word "Imperial"—

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I did not say that.

Senator MATHESON.—That is certainly what I gathered from the honorable and learned senator's remarks.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What I said was that the honorable senator had been frightened then.

MATHESON.—Undoubtedly ; as a suggestion that the gentleman have lately formed the Government country, sooner than omit the periodical ” and insert the word omitted the whole sentence. I understood that to be the suggestion, regret it, because I should have to see the word put in.

Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My attention has just been called to the fact that I think Senator Matheson has informed that the expenditure was actually and expressly authorized by the Supplementary Estimates ending 30th June, 1904.

MATHESON.—Hear, hear ; those estimates passed in July of this

Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Then with all submission, to suggest that the honorable senator's fervour has been unnecessary.

MATHESON.—No.

Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I understand the honorable senator to complain that the late Government or some one had spent £3,800 without au-

MATHESON.—Undoubtedly ; and to come for authority on the Supplementary Estimates in July of the cur-

Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—And authorization ?

MATHESON.—Yes, but after the money has been spent.

Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—But what argument got authorization ?

MATHESON.—Undoubtedly.

Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I should be glad if the Attorney-General could answer the inquiry I made some time ago in this discussion that he says that it has slipped his mind. On page 6 of his report the Attorney-General says that the Officer Commanding lays down as a precedent to his continuing to perform his duties during the remainder of the year, that an Acting Deputy Assistant-Master-General and an Assistant-Master-General of Engineer Services have been appointed. I should like to know whether the present Estimates include any provision for the salaries of two such officers, whether we are appointing those officers, or whether the General Officer Commanding may continue to discharge his Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There is no additional provision on the Estimates with regard to two such officers. There has always been a provision for one officer, and that remains.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported without requests ; report adopted.

Bill read a third time.

Senate adjourned at 8.35 p.m.

Senate.

Wednesday, 7 September, 1904.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

ASSENT TO BILLS.

Assent to the following Bills reported :—

Seat of Government Bill.

Supply Bill (No. 3).

PAPERS.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON laid upon the table the following papers :—

Report upon the disposal of obsolete guns and carriages.

Report by Mr. Surveyor Chesterman upon proposed Federal Capital Site in the Tooma district.

PUBLIC SERVANTS AND POLITICS.

Senator PEARCE asked the Attorney-General, upon notice—

In regard to the following paragraph which appeared in the Argus of 24th August, 1904—

“ Mr. R. L. Phillips (the junior vice-president) proposed the toast of the Public Works Department.”

“ Mr. J. H. Marsden (of the Federal Public Works Department) responded. He said that he had been sent over to New South Wales to give evidence before the Commission. He had made inquiries with regard to day labour on public buildings, and had found that the work done by day labour cost 50 per cent. more than that done by contract, and was not any better.”

1. Is the Mr. J. H. Marsden referred to as “ of the Federal Public Works Department ” an employé of the Federal Government ?

2. If so, is he not bound by the regulation prohibiting public servants from “ publicly taking part in politics ” ?

3. If so, do the Government intend to ask the Public Service Commissioner to call on Mr. Marsden for an explanation in thus publicly taking sides on a party political issue ?

goes out and another Government in, the course of business disturbed in such a manner, some special reason or necessity. We shall proceed with the Trade and the Evidence Bill, which introduced by the late Government. On an understanding, I gather, that the Marks Bill would be recommitted—honorable senator desired to that direction, in order that any which had been dealt with in Committee be further considered. I inquire out the understanding entered Senator McGregor, and to give unity which he proposed to give, as I have indicated. The Evidence Bill, perhaps, not one of altogether interest, but it is of interest to me. It is a very useful little Bill, conceived with the idea of lessening the expense of proving certain more or less matters, and the principles of which may be able to explain to the Senate when it comes on in the ordinary course of the Fraudulent Marks Bill, which came down from this Chamber to the House of Representatives will be prophetic there. The Seat of Government Bill, which has just been introduced into the Senate—is now in the Senate. And I think I ought to say that the late Government are entitled to credit for having got that Bill into the statute-book. We know the Bill which have taken place in regard to the State of feeling which is set up in various directions in regard to both its principles and its details. It is a creditable circumstance that it ought not to pass over that it has been introduced on the statute-book by the late Government. I desire to inform the Senate that the Ministry have taken steps with a view to communicating the measure to the Government of New South Wales, and indicating the desire of the Commonwealth Parliament. Alterations are being prepared, the plans for which I have seen, embracing the various elements which may be considered essential in order to meet the desire of all of us with a view to the conveniences, the access, and other matters to which attention has been directed. The areas are being defined, more or less roughly, in plans in a tentative way, so that every facility may be given for harmonious negotiations between the Commonwealth Government and the Government of New South Wales, and we should be in a position, I hope, soon, to get some progress made with those negotiations, because of course everything requires the approval of the Commonwealth Parliament, and that we may be enabled to arrive at some definite conclusions as to the precise area, general area being all that is now indicated in the measure. Certainly we shall lose no time in having that matter, subject to further discussion, defined so far as regards the wishes of the Government of New South Wales, which, subject to the claims of the Constitution, we all desire to consult. There were two great measures of the first class with which this session began—the Navigation Bill and the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. The Navigation Bill is now undergoing the consideration of a Royal Commission, as I think—I do not know whether there were any differences of opinion on the question—wisely appointed by the late Government. Honorable senators did me the honour of bearing with me, I am afraid for a very long time, at the second-reading stage, when I sought to explain my own views as to many parts of that measure. I thought then, as Senator McGregor did, when pointing out to the Senate the programme of the late Government in May last, that the Bill was unsatisfactory to almost everybody, and I shall not offer any opinion further than to say that no one can doubt that a Commission, constituted as this is, will render valuable service in regard to the principles, the objects, and the methods that should be followed in any such legislation. I am particularly pleased that my honorable friend from South Australia, Senator Guthrie, who has devoted immense attention to the whole subject, is a member of the Commission. We propose to take up the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill as it stands, and to carry it through if we can.

Senator DAWSON.—That is a good proviso.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We hope to have the Bill here at an early date.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Is Senator Fraser going to vote for it?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I have not questioned my honorable friend on that subject, but if I am not transgressing the Standing Orders by making an incidental reference, I would say that this Bill is in something like the position which the Trade Marks Bill occupies in the Senate. It has reached the stage of a motion for recommitment. There are, I believe, a number perhaps a large number, of amendments to be proposed. Many of these amendments are more or less verbal or formal. There may be some which contain matters of substance, and which may involve debate. Therefore, it is impossible for me now to anticipate when the Bill will be received here; but I trust that it will be sent up soon, and when it does come, whatever difference of opinion there may be—in fact, as there must inevitably be—I feel sure we shall devote our best energies to its consideration from the lights that we individually possess. So far as the Government are concerned, we take the Bill, and shall endeavour to bring it into effective force, as far as possible, in the form in which it now stands. Last year, Mr. President, we had the Budget opened in the other Chamber, as early, I think, as about the 27th July. We are now in the month of September. Therefore, I need not say that it is of importance—perhaps I may go further, and say of vital importance, that the consideration of the Budget and the financial position of the Commonwealth—its financial arrangements and adjustments—should be proceeded with at the earliest possible date. I put that as the view of the Government, and I am sure it will commend itself to the Senate. However, looking at the position which the Senate occupies—the high and important position which it occupies—in relation to financial matters under our Constitution, it is desirable that we also should have sufficient time for the consideration of the Estimates and the Budget, and that that time should not be lessened if it can possibly be avoided. As far as I am concerned, I shall do everything that I can with a view to prevent the possibility of a sort of hurried consideration of financial matters, with the determination of which we are greatly concerned. This year, of course, owing to the exigencies of public business, it has not been possible to have the Budget laid before Parliament earlier. But as soon as the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill is out of hand in the House of Representatives the Budget will be proceeded with, and we hope that that will be before the close of the present month. These matters in themselves form a fairly heavy programme, looking at the period of the session, and it will be difficult to squeeze much more into the time at our disposal. To use a homely expression, I do not know that it is a good thing in political or parliamentary affairs, any more than in other human affairs, to try to chew off more than we can chew.

Senator Sir Josiah Symon.

Senator HIGGS.—Did not Mr. Reid say that he would not leave the Labour Party a feather to fly with?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am not aware whether that is so, or not.

Senator MILLEN.—They are in that position now!

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We intend, if possible, in the time at our disposal, to proceed with the Papua Bill, which is already before the House of Representatives. I think that it is important that we should, if possible, proceed with that Bill this session. It is not contentious. It is not a party matter; and it seems, to the Government, to be desirable that we should have our relations with our dependency in New Guinea placed upon a footing at the earliest moment.

Senator MILLEN.—Is that the New Guinea Bill?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is the New Guinea Bill, but the name of it is the Papua Bill. I have carefully gone through it. It was introduced by the Minister of External Affairs, Mr. Hughes, and, in principle at all events, it follows very much the lines of our own Constitution, so far as it is applicable to a dependency in the circumstances of New Guinea. I think that in all probability, when honorable senators come to consider the Bill, they will not find much in it that will require very grave alteration at any time; and that we may be able to see it placed upon the statute-book this year. There is one part of the Bill—or rather, there is a question arising under it—about which there may be some difference, and that is in connexion with the liquor traffic. There is a suggestion on the one hand for an absolute prohibition of the liquor traffic in New Guinea, and there is, on the other hand, the suggestion that the existing system, which involves prohibition so far as the natives are concerned shall be continued, but that entire prohibition shall not be enforced. There is great diversity of opinion on that aspect of the matter, and that diversity will be given effect to by the Government by leaving that particular point an open question.

Senator DAWSON.—Do the Government propose to alter the principles of the Bill?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We adhere to the principle of any of the Bills which we take up. We take up the Papua Bill as it stands. But we shall endeavour ray to make it effective, and if any portions of it which we think selves to improvement, we shall end it. We also intend to propose the Western Australian Survey STYLES.—Never!

Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I know the friend's view of that measure.

PEARCE.—It is weakening.

Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Is he? Senator Styles now occupies a place to my honorable friend Senator Higgs and that lays him open to the imputation of one of the most effective persons in this Chamber.

STYLES.—I have succeeded to the position which Senator Symon formerly held, and, perhaps, later on, I may find myself on the other side of the

Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No rejoicing more than I should do should happen, but I hope that it will happen for a considerable time. At present, we are going to proceed with HIGGS.—Will the Government raise this vital question?

Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Australian representatives regard this as a vital question.

I do not say that the Government, myself, come from a State where I am free to say that there is not unanimity in favour of that great measure. But I am also aware of the fact that there is no sentiment against the delay of having the information which they possess enlarged and completed, before obtaining that, without which I cannot speak for myself, and I know there are many others like me—to give full consideration to the subject of the intimate construction of the railway which we shall be called upon to express our opinion sooner or later. From that point of view, we feel that the measure which I have mentioned, if it is to receive the sanction of Parliament, ought to be put forward for consideration at the earliest possible moment. If Parliament does not sanction the survey, that is another matter, but my belief is that Parliament will sanction it, and I am quite sure that it will be a good thing to do. I will do our utmost, in the time at our disposal, consistent with dealing with the many and graver matters which I have intended to pass those two Bills. But there is a bill which has been put forward a good deal, and with which we do not intend to proceed this session. That is the High Commissioner Bill. There are two reasons which actuate us in coming to that conclusion. One is the period of the session, and the regard we must pay to what we can ask Parliament to undertake in reference to the transaction of business. The other is that it is desirable, as I think honorable senators will see, that we should before actually going on with a measure of that kind, come to some kind of understanding with the States, with a view to accommodate their interests, as far as possible, and to lessen expense. If there is one thing more than another which was predicted of the Commonwealth—of the union—originally, it was that it would be the instrument of reducing State expenditure in certain directions.

Senator DOBSON.—Quite right.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—As a member of the Convention, I took that view, and I take part of the responsibility for having put that as a very strong argument in favour of the union. We had before us, amongst other things, the consideration as to the lessening of the expenditure in connexion with the Governors of the States, the expenditure in connexion with the Agents-General of the different States, and so on. It seems to me that we shall be doing good service—that is the Commonwealth Parliament, and the Commonwealth Government will be doing good service—if they make use of the proposed legislation, in concert with the States Governments, in order to give them a reason for reducing their expenditure in connexion with the States representatives in England, and, if possible “fixing them up”—if I may use that expression—in connexion with the Commonwealth representation. I believe myself that that will be—in fact, I feel sure that it will be—recognised as a course which ought to be taken, and that we should not, independently of the States, simply pass our own legislation, with a view of setting up a High Commissioner in London. At any rate, we do not propose to proceed with that Bill this session; and we hope in the interim, by opening up negotiations, to carry out the idea which I have laid before the Senate. We have also in operation, a Select Committee in regard to a very important matter—I allude to certain electoral adjustments, having relation to a more effective method of working our electoral legislation. But it is doubtful if we can have the benefit of the report of the Committee in time, and if we had it before the session closed, it is doubtful whether we should be in a position to bring before Parliament legislation in accordance with the necessities of the case. The Government are not in a position to hold out any hopes that a Bill to amend the Electoral Act will be brought before Parliament at this stage. The Inter-State Commission Bill, which has also been under discussion in various ways directly and indirectly, stands in the position which it occupied when the late Government took office. It is in abeyance, pending the results of the conference of railway authorities and heads of the railway services of the different States. Until the information, which it is expected to obtain from that quarter, is available, the Bill will stand over. There is also a Bill which has been a good deal noticed. I refer to the Bonus for Manufactures Bill, upon which there is a diversity of opinion. We do not propose to proceed with any measure of that kind this session, and if the question is proceeded with, or brought forward, by a private member, either in the Senate or the other House, that also will be an open question, so far as the Government are concerned. The basis of the Government in regard to such matters is that we are in a position of fiscal peace.

Senator STYLES.—We are not quite sure of that.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Well, we, as a Government, shall do our utmost to maintain that position. Whatever else may be said or whatever criticism may be offered, I should say that the composition of the Government is an assurance—I go further, and say that it is, perhaps, an effective guarantee—that our policy will be one of fiscal peace.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The Government are a peaceful crowd!

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am always a man of peace myself. My honorable friend, Senator Pearce, referred with good-natured banter to my having pulverized—I think that was the phrase he used—the representatives of the Government during our exceedingly interesting Tariff debates. I had no more valuable ally on the free-trade side than Senator Pearce himself, for whose assistance I always was, and am now, most grateful. He put it very kindly in saying that I had pulverized the representatives of the Government who then represented the protectionist view. But since that struggle ended, I have always thought, I still hold the view, that there ought to be fiscal peace. Whatever views others have entertained, I expressed that view, and I had the honour of being quoted by my friend, Sir William Lyne, during most interesting tour in Tasmania, as being unlike other free-traders—and I am as strong a free-trader as ever I was—because I had stated that there ought to be peace for a time, in order that the effect of the Tariff could be fully ascertained, that the commerce of the country should not be thrown into confusion again, and kept in confusion for months and months, and that we should abstain, as far as possible, for a time, at least, from Tariff agitation which always results in business uncertainty. I hope honorable senators will do me the justice of believing that. I merely mention it with the view of explaining that that was my own view, and that I have never departed from it. For my own part, I believe that there are differences in every community, the great mass of the commercial interest of this country is in favour of the Tariff which we passed with so much labour, and making it as perfect as we could, having a fair trial; and that we should not seek to disturb it until that fair trial has been accomplished, and until we have an opportunity of really seeing not its influence upon one incident here and one incident there, one grievance here and one grievance there, but its general effect upon the whole progress and prosperity of the Commonwealth. That is my view.

Senator HIGGS.—Will the honorable learned senator name a period for the operation of this fiscal peace? How many years is it to last?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not think that the Government have gone into matters of prophecy of that description. Sufficient for the day is the proportion thereof. At any rate, I have made it as plain as my capacity would allow me to make it, that our policy in regard to this matter is that of fiscal peace, and that we intend to do our level best to carry that out. Associated with that matter is a question which has been the occasion of very many public forms and other references—that is the question of what is called preferential trade. We are not second to any citizens of Australia in our desire for the closest possible trade relations with the mother country. If we trade with one country another we, of course, naturally to trade, so to speak, with our own house. At the same time, one of those who think that the classes of Australia—nor do the people of Australia—at their interests should be tied to any principle of trading with any country more than with another. It is more or less selfish, but at this question strikes me—and is led by the Ministry—as being less one for academical discussion.

STYLES.—Is it the honorable senator's opinion that we deal with all countries alike?

Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I did think that we ought to deal with all alike. What I said was that if there is to be any preference it should be in favor of the mother country. I think that the age I used was to the effect that we have to trade with one people more than another we should trade with our own kin. But at the same time I did not believe in pushing the principle too far—that I did not think that the trading community of Australia should consent to being altogether regulated in their trade operations by a convention of that kind.

STYLES.—The honorable senator would treat all countries

Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—When a question comes to be submitted to us—we had no offer from England yet—that the people of Australia will in all probability be disposed to determine those questions by considerations of what will benefit themselves; in all probability it will be so. And when we have proposed to England on the question we are prepared to give them the most careful and favorable consideration, in our own interests and of matters of common concern. But when I read in that very journal—that historical conservative journal—the Quarterly Review, a statement like this—that Mr. Chamberlain's admirers must admit that no parliamentary leader, since 1886, has been so much derided as he.

It only comes to the conclusion that we should anticipate at a very early date the submission of proposals with regard to preferential trade coming from England, for consideration of the Commonwealth Parliament.

Senator PULSFORD.—Not this century.
Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—At any rate, the present Government in England is not at one with that great statesman, Mr. Chamberlain, on this subject; and, in all probability, we need not reckon the question as within the region of practical or practicable politics, for consideration this session, or for some time to come.

Senator HIGGS.—Are the Government taking up the proposal, suggested by Senator Dobson, to invite Mr. Chamberlain to Australia?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Government have not considered that matter yet, and, therefore, I am unable to definitely answer my honorable friend's question. There are various other matters which remain to be dealt with. The Government have been considering these matters, and we hope during recess to arrive at the best way to bring under Commonwealth control, and uniform legislation, the important subjects of quarantine, banking, and so forth, as laid down in the Constitution. We also propose to take into consideration that most important question of the population of Australia, and the cognate matter of immigration.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Are the Government going to offer a bonus on marriage?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator's question leads me to say that my own State is in rather a deplorable position in this connexion. South Australia shows the third lowest birth and marriage rates as compared with other countries. The population of South Australia proper was less by 2,089 than it should have been with the natural increase during last year.

Senator GIVENS.—Is that at the present time?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Yes; those are the latest statistics. I mention, for the information of the honorable senator—and this has been a subject of platform discussion before—that the number of births of infants registered in South Australia in 1903 was 8,475, which was fewer by 452 than the births recorded in the previous year, and that the birth rate per 1,000 of the mean population was only 23.33, which was below the rate of any other of the last fifty-two years.

Senator PEARCE.—The South Australian people cannot get land in their own State, and they are going to Western Australia.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Commonwealth Government have not the power to deal with the matter of the land.

Senator GIVENS.—Yes, they have.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am a strong advocate of that system of closer settlement, which, I am glad to say, is not merely receiving attention, but is making great progress, certainly, in some of the States. An honorable senator has referred to the countenance and assistance that may be given in this connexion; and the Government propose to consider the whole question of aiding rural industries and formulating some plan within the limits of the Constitution, so as not to trespass on the powers of the States, but to assist the latter as far as possible.

Senator DAWSON.—By way of bonus?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We have not considered the shape that the assistance shall take, or the methods that may be pursued, and at present I ask the honorable senator not to press the question.

Senator HIGGS.—The Government will bring the matter before the States Conference?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That will present an opportunity; but in this connexion there is also the other question on which great doubt exists as to the relative powers of the States and the Commonwealth; I mean the matter of water conservation, particularly in connexion with the River Murray. Whilst the Government, with the assistance of Parliament, intend to ascertain and exercise, as far as they can, the powers which they may have under the Constitution, there is associated with this another question which greatly affects my own State—that is the question of maintaining navigation. I have always held the view, and I expressed it in the Convention, that as between the two interests, that of navigation, in a country like this, may probably be regarded as subordinate to the interests of irrigation.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—We can make roads, but we cannot make rivers.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I am sure that every one desires to do the fullest possible justice to the claims of navigation—to the claims of South Australia in this regard—but I should not be dealing fairly with this great question if I did not say that I have seen no reason to change the view which I formed during the Federal Convention, and which I have expressed just now. We must keep to our views as far as we can, until they are shown to be incorrect—we must do the very best we can, straightforwardly and honestly, to aid the advancement of the country; the assertion of the views in which I believe.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable and learned senator is against irrigation?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Indeed I am not.

Senator DAWSON.—Then the honorable and learned senator is against navigation?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Indeed I am not. I want to try as far as I can harmonize the two interests. There is also the great subject which must be considered in connexion with the States, suggested by Senator Higgs, namely, age pensions. That must necessarily be the subject of conference and some kind of basis for common action, even to a greater extent than that which I venture to indicate desirable in so comparatively small a matter as the appointment of High Commissioner. What I mean is that the States should be consulted, and the plan adopted should be one which is harmonious. The Government will take every opportunity, both at the conference to which Senator Higgs has referred, and in other ways, to arrive at a decision, and to formulate views to be submitted to Parliament.

Senator GIVENS.—And in the meantime the poor old people can starve.

Senator DOBSON.—Rubbish! They are not starving.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I have given as clearly as I have been able, with regard to that brevity which I said I should endeavour to observe, the views of the Government. I recognise one conspicuous obligation in respect of which, though from this side, I regard myself as in the service of the Senate as a whole—the Senate as representing the States, and guardian of the States' interests. That duty is to do my utmost to uphold the dignity and maintain the rights of the Senate, and see, as far as one can, that in the sphere allotted to it by the Constitution, the Senate is not restricted in the effective and patriotic use of its constitutional powers. I believe that in this regard, at any rate, I shall not appeal in vain for the assistance of honorable senators on whichever side the Chamber they may sit. On other questions there may be, and there certainly will be, strong differences of opinion. There will be that keen controversy which is essential to the right solution of problems of public moment; but I shall endeavour, so far as I am able, to do my part en debate is over—when the fight is lost, and when the heat of contested away—no sting of bitterness remain.

(by Senator MCGREGOR) put—debate be now adjourned.

ate divided.

...	23
...	6
...	—
Majority	17

AYES.

R. C.	McGregor, G.
S.	O'Keefe, D. J.
	Pearce, G. F.
H.	Pulsford, E.
	Smith, M. S. C.
	Styles, J.
	Symon, Sir J. H.
S.	Trenwith, W. A.
G.	Turley, H.
G.
H.	Teller:
A. P.	Dobson, H.

NOES.

J.	Walker, J. T.
D.	Teller:
	Macfarlane, J.

n so resolved in the affirmative.
agreed to; debate adjourned.

TRADE MARKS BILL.

(by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON)

Bill be recommitted for the reconsideration of clauses 15, 72, and 93.
Committee.—(Recommittal.)

15—

essential particulars of a registrable mark shall be one or more of the following:

—
1. The name of a person printed, impressed, or written in some particular and distinctive manner; or
2. A written signature or copy of a written signature of the person applying for registration thereof or his predecessor in business as a trade mark; or
3. A distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label, or ticket; or
4. An invented word or invented words; or
5. A word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods and not being a geographical name used likely to be understood in a geographical sense.

However, that any word or words, letters, or combination of letters or figures, used as a trade mark before the first day of One thousand nine hundred and one, registered as a trade mark under this

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia—Attorney-General).—I moved for the recommittal of this clause with a view to delete the proviso, and substitute provisions which I think will be more effective, and more in consonance with the law as it stands. The proviso was inserted at the instance of Senator Best, who, I am sorry to see, is not in the Chamber at this moment. Honorable senators will see that it is couched in very wide, large terms. Of course, they are now familiar with what a trade mark means. A trade mark is essentially a mark which indicates that any particular goods are the manufacture of a particular person, or, it may be, that they have been selected or imported by a particular person. But a trade mark, in its accepted, and its legal meaning, gravitates, so to speak, between those two points. Before there was effective legislation on the subject, almost anything could become a trade mark as legally, as well as generally, understood. Then came the Trade Marks Act of 1875, which enabled the registration of marks of a particular kind to be made. All marks which were previously used as trade marks were not susceptible of registration. A limited number were taken from them and registered; but in order that no injustice might be done to persons who had been using trade marks before 1875, and had acquired a kind of property in them, those trade marks were allowed to be registered, although not answering the definition in the Act, if they had been used previous to its coming into operation. That provision was adopted in all State legislation, and the proviso to this clause is intended, I apprehend, to meet the same state of things in regard to the Commonwealth registration of trade marks as to any word or words, and so on, used before the coming into operation of the measure. But if it were put in this way, instead of meeting the case, and doing justice to those concerned, it would have the effect of enabling any word or words, letter, figure, or combination of letters or figures, whether susceptible of registration under the State law or not, to be registered if used prior to the passing of this Bill, which, I think, Senator Best does not desire to effect, and which would be wrong. If the desire be to protect unregistered trade marks which were in use before the passing of the State law, it ought to be limited to that. It should not allow any mark which is being used now to be registered as a Commonwealth mark, but it should allow a mark to be registered as a Commonwealth mark, if it was in use, and susceptible of registration, although not registered under the State law. That would protect everybody. I am not proposing this alteration from any antagonism to the principle of the proviso, but merely with a view to making the measure as perfect as possible. I have drafted an amendment which I think will meet the purpose, and which reads as follows:—

(1) The proprietor of a trade mark in use in any State at the commencement of this Act may make application for the registration of his trade mark under this Act.

(2) The application shall, subject to paragraphs (3), (4), and (5) of this section, be dealt with in the same manner as other applications for registration of trade marks.

(3) The trade mark may be registered, if it could have been lawfully registered under the State Trade Marks Act in force, at the commencement of this Act, in the State in which the trade mark was then used had an application for its registration been made before the commencement of this Act.

(4) If the trade mark does not contain the essential particulars required by this Act, it may, nevertheless, be registered subject to such conditions and limitations as to mode or place, or period of user, as the Registrar, Law Officer, or Court thinks fit to impose.

(5) Where the trade mark, or a nearly identical trade mark, was, at the commencement of this Act, common to the trade in another State, the registration under this Act shall confer no exclusive rights in that State on the registered proprietor, and that State may be excepted from the registration under this Act.

That will, I think, exactly meet the case contemplated by Senator Best.

The CHAIRMAN.—Does the honorable and learned senator wish to add those words to clause 15?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I did propose to insert those words in lieu of the proviso, but it will be more clear if I ask the Committee to strike out the proviso with a view to insert a new clause at a later stage. I move—

That all the words after the word "sense," line 18, be left out.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 72—

In this part of this Act—

"Trade Union" means any trade union registered as such under the law of any State or any organization or association of workmen or employes registered under any law of the Commonwealth or of a State, relating to conciliation or arbitration for the prevention or settlement of industrial disputes; and

"Trade Union Mark" means a distinct mark or device adopted by a trade union for the purpose of designating the products of the labour of the members thereof.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia)—I move—

That after the word "State," line 4, the following words be inserted, "or association such unions."

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—In the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill I think the word "association" is used. Would that word do here?

Senator PEARCE.—No. The clause allows separate unions to register a trade mark, and I desire the whole of the union as an associated body, to possess that right. Instead of, for instance, the Bootmakers' Union of each State registering a label, I wish this clause to be altered so as to allow any Association of Bootmakers' Union in Australia to register one trade union label for the whole of that trade throughout Australia.

Senator DRAKE.—Will that be an amendment under the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill?

Senator PEARCE.—It may not.

Senator DRAKE.—Then a definition of "association" is required.

Senator PEARCE.—I think that word explains itself.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not think that the word explains itself. I wish to direct the attention of Senator Pearce to the wording of this definition.

"Trade union" means any trade union registered as such under the law of any State—that is, a registered union—or any organization or association of workmen or employes registered under any law of the Commonwealth—

That is, a registered association. If we insert the words "or association of unions" between "State" and "or," shall leave it ambiguous as to whether it means a registered association. I see what Senator Pearce means. Would it answer the purpose to use these words?—

Any trade union registered as such under the law of any State or any number of such unions acting together.

Senator PEARCE.—Yes.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—My honorable friend will forgive me for taking advantage of this opportunity to say that it is a mistake to insert these provisions in this Bill. I thoroughly understand his object in desiring to legislate in this way.

saying one word adversely or with regard to the principle he y, but I think that from his point, it is worth consideration e should ask us to insert sions in a Bill relating to entirely distinct matter—trade whether it would not be better separate piece of legislation deal- his particular subject. I know erica—and that is the pattern onorable friend has followed— nents for this purpose have been t it is noticeable that these are enactments. Our Constitution to deal with “trade marks,” and question as to what is meant by I am aware that the question and debated here, and has been determination of the High Court. from that constitutional aspect, k my honorable friend whether orth while to deal with the ques- e union marks in a separate mea- clause 3 of clause 73 provides

o far as otherwise prescribed only this Act shall apply to trade union s made an exception of the whole e marks. I have given a great sideration to this subject lately connexion; and I throw out the to Senator Pearce, whether his ay not lead to confusion and to questions of law, and as to their the other provisions of the mea- n have to do with trade marks, and legally understood. What earce proposes, is not a trade is a mark, not to indicate that are the goods of A, or are im- selected by B, but that they are le under conditions which my friend pointed out in proposing ment originally, having relation and so on. I merely throw that ggestion, but if he desires to re- causes, the words which I have will meet his view, instead of the ociation.”

PEARCE (Western Australia). the amendment suggested by the general, and will substitute it emendment I have already pro- move—r the word “State” the words “or of such unions acting together,” be

I do not feel inclined to accept the advice so kindly offered, that I should propose to omit the clauses from the Bill under consideration, and embody them in a separate Bill. I am afraid that the Attorney-General would use just as much eloquence—if not quite so much persuasion—against such a proposal as he now uses against the one now put forward. It is just as well to retain the clauses to which the Committee has agreed, considering that we believe them to be in accordance with the law of trade marks. It may be said that we are extending the meaning of the term “trade mark” in an unwarrantable direction, and to an unwarrantable extent. We are prepared to take the responsibility of that, knowing that if we transgress the Constitution, the High Court will practically nullify what we do.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 93—

Subject to the regulations, the Registrar may permit any agent to do, on behalf of any other person, any act in connexion with the registration of trade marks, or any procedure relating thereto.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I have been asked by Senator Best to move an amendment in this clause, and in accordance with his desire, I move—

That the word “agent,” line 2, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words “patent attorney or solicitor.”

Senator TURLEY (Queensland).—Will Senator Clemons give the Committee some reason for leaving out the word “agent”? It appears to me that the word enables any competent person to be appointed.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—The word “agent” is, as Senator Turley says, very wide and all embracing, and I admit that it would cover a patent attorney, and also that there can be no doubt as to whether it would cover a solicitor. If the Committee thinks that it is desirable that the Registrar should grant, on the application of any person interested, permission for a solicitor to attend to his case, I urge that the amendment should be accepted. The object is to insure that the person interested shall have the services of some person competent to appear by reason of his profession. Senator Turley will agree that it is obvious that a patent attorney is a man who would be competent to appear. It has also been urged that if an applicant chose to be represented by a solicitor it should be competent for him to appoint his solicitor to appear for him. It has to be remembered that an applicant may always appear personally if he chooses.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia).—When this Bill was previously being dealt with in Committee every one recognised the valuable services rendered by Senator Best. He expressed to me a desire that this amendment should be made. His reason was that if an applicant employed any person to appear for him, he should be a responsible person. We have all heard of the confidence trick. Many persons might impose upon innocent applicants in respect to the registration of patents. I could give instances where that has been done. It was Senator Best's wish that the word "agent" should be altered to "patent attorney," as that term is already used in the Patents Act. As this measure is practically a corollary to the Patents Act, a patent attorney would be the proper person to appear. Senator Best also wished to provide that if any applicant wished to employ a solicitor to appear for him he should have the privilege of doing so. I entirely agree with that view. It would not hamper the applicant in any way. He could either apply himself or employ a competent person to apply for him.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL (Victoria).—It seems to me that the wording of the clause as it stands is wider in its application than would be the case if the amendment were agreed to. Why should an applicant be confined to choosing a patent agent to represent him? Would not the word "agent" embrace a solicitor or patent attorney whom an applicant might authorize to appear on his behalf? It would give rise to a large amount of trouble and expense if the designation used in the clause were altered. The word "agent" is a wider term than "patent attorney" or "solicitor." It would embrace both those classes; whereas, if we put in the words "solicitor or patent attorney," they would not embrace an ordinary patent agent. If we limit these functions to a particular class, it seems to me, that we shall defeat the object that we have in view.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There is, as Senator Zeal has said, very great force in leaving the language of the clause as wide as possible. At present, it is permissive, and it is subject to the regulations. No doubt Senator Best's idea has been to bring the measure into line with the Patents Act in this respect. The term "patent attorney" is used in the Patents Act. But the whole point will be covered if we insert the words "patent attorney, or solicitor or agent."

Senator O'KEEFE.—That would defeat Senator Best's object; he wishes to confine it to the other two classes.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There is strong reason for that; because when a person employs an agent, he should have the assurance that he is employing somebody who knows something of the business. But it is worth consideration, whether the power to give permission to appear is left to the registrar, is not sufficient to protect persons in that respect. So far as I am concerned, I should prefer to have the word "agent" retained, because that leaves it to the registrar to say whom he will allow to appear before him. He may insist on having persons who are acquainted with practice in these matters. Is it not sufficient to leave the clause as it stands, to the discretion of the registrar as to who shall appear before him?

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I want to explain that I have merely brought forward the amendment at the request of Senator Best, but practically, I intend to vote for the clause as it stands. I see a particular reason why we should limit the class of persons who may make these applications to the Registrar, and from that point of view the term "agent" is sufficient. The Attorney-General has suggested we might make the clause read "patent attorney, solicitor, or agent." If we did that we might add the words "or otherwise" because "agent" would cover both patent attorneys and solicitors. If Senator Best's amendment is not to be adopted we had better leave the clause as it stands.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I think that the choice should be left to the Registrar, if no particular class is particularly concerned. We are not justified in limiting his choice to one or two particular classes. A solicitor is not shut out by the language used in the clause, and it will be better left as it stands.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Bill read with further amendments.

EVIDENCE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia—Attorney-General).—I move

That the Bill be now read a second time.

second reading of this Bill, in it may be advanced a stage, but propose to take it into Committee desire that some of the provisions have additional consideration from an in regard to one or two ver—that require, I will not say but alteration. The object of simply to facilitate the proof in of the Commonwealth of ments, and to bring the law with an Act which we passed with regard to the proof of cer—proceedings. It will certainly useful measure. It provides, for at certain signatures shall be noticed. No one can doubt that be so, and that as far as pos—practice should be extended, so you have to prove the signature, of the Registrar of the High a Judge, or of the President of al Court, or of any tribunal, Arbitration Court, it should not y to call evidence for that pur—signature should be judicially he Bill also provides that evi—regard to—ation, commission, order, or regu— or made by the Governor-General, er the authority of a Minister, oved by the production of the Gazette, and that that shall s sufficient. Then again, in re—production of public books and they may be proved at present ng the books themselves. But

f importance as public records, ving to be produced in courts y are perhaps liable to be lost

It is provided by this Bill of such books and documents ide by means of examined copies purporting to be signed and true copies by a proper officer.

Commonwealth Gazette itself, provides that its production shall Courts evidence that it is the alth Gazette; and where it is hat the printing by the Govern—er should be established, the Bill at if it purports to be so issued be taken to be sufficient. These matters of form, but they some—ve expense, as we who are en—legal practice happen to know, by reason of the technical which are raised, and ght to be dispensed with.

Provision is also made for the proof of acts done by the Governor-General, or Ministers, and, in this connexion, the production of the Government Gazette is sufficient. This is a short Bill, but it is a measure the convenience of which is understood by lawyers, and from which suitors will obtain a benefit in diminished expenses.

Senator DAWSON.—Is there no provision for the proof of service of the Gazette?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is not necessary; the mere production of the Gazette is sufficient proof.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD (New South Wales).—After the explanation which has been made by the representative of the Government in connexion with this Bill, it may facilitate matters if, instead of having any extended debate just now, the second reading is allowed to pass, and questions of detail left for Committee. If honorable senators desire an adjournment after the second reading, no doubt that is a matter which can be arranged. I have gone through the Bill, which commends itself to me as one likely to be of very great service in the administration of justice. It will tend materially to save expense now incurred in proving many acts which might well be taken as formal.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read a second time.

In Committee:

Clause 1 agreed to.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion (by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON) proposed—

That the Senate do now adjourn.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I suggest, as the Government business has been postponed, that it would meet general convenience if private members' business were now taken, so as to leave to-morrow free for the Government. Private business might very well be cleared off to-day, and the whole of to-morrow devoted to Government business. I suggest that the Attorney-General withdraw his motion.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Senate adjourned at 4.15 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 7 September, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

SUPPLY BILL (No. 3).

Assent reported.

PAPER.

Mr. REID laid upon the table the following paper:—

Report upon opium smoking in Queensland.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—I wish to present, by command of His Excellency the Governor-General, a Copy of a despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies with regard to the question of the adoption of the metric system of weights and measures within the Empire.

I move—

That the document be printed.

I shall take the opportunity afforded by this motion to make a Ministerial statement. In my opinion, the late Prime Minister set an excellent example to his successors by making his Ministerial statement in such a way as would enable, not only the leader of the Opposition, but the House generally, to discuss the programme which he put forward, and the whole state of public affairs. I felt that that course was a perfectly fair and wise one, and I am therefore imitating it. But before I outline the policy which the present Administration proposes to pursue with reference to matters of public business, I should like to say a few words in regard to the circumstances which led up to its formation.

Mr. SPENCE.—Hear hear! It is time that we heard something about that.

Mr. REID.—It will be remembered that the Administration headed by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat which appealed to the electors of the Commonwealth at the last general elections raised for their consideration a question which was embodied in the phrase "fiscal peace," and asked them to pronounce the opinion in reference to the existing Tariff that it should not be interfered with during the life of the approaching Parliament. That appeal to the people was successful. The electors of Australia, in response to the Ministerial proposal, did, so far as electors can, decide in accordance with the policy of the Government, that Tariff revision should occupy the attention of the new Parliament. The fact that that decision was pronounced by the people was recognised by the leader of the three parties in this House when the new Parliament met. The then Prime Minister, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, said that the fiscal issue was dead and buried—he, of course, meant the electors—during this Parliament and its events. I have a weakness for interfering in which I hope will not characterize official action, and when the statement which I have just quoted was made I objected—

I recognise that that is the verdict of the electors.

So that at the opening of this Parliament the head of the then Government said that the decision of the electors was what I described it to be, and I immediately recognised in a most public way that that was so.

Mr. CARPENTER.—But the right honorable member's followers differed from

Mr. REID.—The then leader of the Labour Party—the present leader of the Opposition—speaking on the same occasion said—

I share the feeling of gratification which was expressed by the Prime Minister that the last election the issue as between free trade and protection has disappeared for some time to come . . . at any rate so far as the Tariff is concerned.

In another part of the same speech the honorable gentleman referred to the "time at any rate" as the life time of the present Parliament. I have to say that if that state of things had not existed when the recent crisis occurred, it would have been impossible for the honorable members who form the present Administration to have come together, just as I propose it would have been impossible, if the question of Tariff revision had been a matter for this House to deal with, for the honorable friends who formed the Administration to come together. I recognise, as we all did at the time, that the late Prime Minister, in selecting four free traders and four protectionists to form the Government, gave, and desired to give, effect to the decision of the electors. It is obvious that it would have been impossible for men of such strong and oppo-on the Tariff question, such as the honorable member for West Sydney and the member for Coolgardie, and such protectionists as the honorable member for South Australia and Senator McGregor, to enter on any other understanding. This matter now because I cannot say that if that state of things, as it is now, is not recognised by the leaders of all parties, it would not have existed—

MR. REID.—It was never even considered when selecting a Ministry.

MR. REID.—I do not know the motives of the honorable member's mind which led him to select particular Ministers, but it may be a peculiar coincidence that it was as I have stated it to be. Speaking upon the subject, the position is that if the Tariff had had to be decided at this session, it would have been decided. I believe, for the late Administration was constituted or for the Ministry to be formed to carry out the policy. We stand here as the trustees of the people of Australia, to see that the policy which they arrived at, and which was acknowledged by the leaders of the parties in this House, and which was sanctioned by any honorable member of the House—

MR. REID.—Things have changed.

MR. REID.—Things have become quite different. The question is a possible tortious—

MR. REID.—It is an ironclad.

MR. REID.—Be that as it may, I wish to put our position perfectly clear. So far as the Government benches are concerned, we see that the decision of the House is honorably respected. Passing that matter, I wish to come to the question which occurred over one of the measures still before this House, the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. The Government of the day chose to take a position with reference to a certain clause of the Bill, and had perfect liberty to do so. An Administration must always stand by itself as to the points it will retract, and the points which it will stand by as vital. On the particular point which I allude to, the then Prime Minister, in a most public way, a consideration before the matter was brought before the House, to be finally dealt with, stated his intention to accept the refusal of the House to reconsider a certain amendment in clause 48 of the Bill—

MR. LYNE.—No.

MR. REID.—I have not concluded what I am going to say, so that a denial is premature.—

MR. POYNTON.—The late Prime Minister did not say that.

MR. REID.—I cannot accept the honorable member as the official interpreter of what the late Prime Minister said. I am going by announcements which I have seen in the public prints of more than one State.

MR. POYNTON.—The right honorable member cannot produce them.

MR. REID.—The honorable member need not make that remark. I hope that at the present rather important stage of a business statement, I shall not be met with interjections and contradictions which can be better dealt with at a later period. I saw reports of an interview with the late Prime Minister in the Sydney newspapers, and I also saw reports of the same interview in the Melbourne newspapers. The reports of that interview appeared on the same day as the reports of an interview with me appeared in the Sydney newspapers. The late Prime Minister, answering what I had said, made the statement—and I am quoting almost his exact words—that if the House would not reconsider its decision, which had been arrived at some time before in Committee, when the Government obtained an adjournment to consider its position, he would take it as an intimation that his services were not required any longer. Those words appeared in both the Melbourne and the Sydney newspapers.

MR. WATSON.—Hear, hear. That is substantially correct.

MR. REID.—My honorable friend, who is a better authority than the honorable member for Grey, admits that those words were used in the interview.

MR. WATSON.—Substantially.

MR. REID.—That being so, I hope that the honorable member for Grey will withdraw the imputation which he levelled against me just now. I can be only substantially correct when quoting what appeared in the newspapers some months back, and I am fortunate in managing to be that. I draw attention to the circumstances for this reason. The crisis was made at the deliberate choice of the Government of the day. It was not a crisis manufactured by the Opposition.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Oh!

MR. REID.—Not at that time. Surely the Opposition did not dictate an official utterance by the Prime Minister. Surely honorable members do not wish to be quite so erratic as to suggest that when the Prime Minister made his statement to the press he was under the inspiration of any member of the Opposition. My honorable friend the late Prime Minister weighs his words, and acknowledges now that they were uttered. I am speaking at present only of the late Prime Minister's own statement. In the most public way he stated that the issue before the House was a vital one; that if the Bill were not altered—I do not say in any particular way at present in respect of that amendment—the Government would take a certain course. Therefore the House did not make the subject of the crisis; but the Government made it, and when the matter came on the House had made up its mind so clearly that it would not recede from the position it had taken up on a particular amendment that it found it unnecessary to take up any time further than that occupied in expressing its refusal to reconsider the clause. That was the shortest possible way for those who had made up their minds not to alter the clause to express their opinion. It is not to be supposed that the Prime Minister, when he attached such significance to the position, was really so sure of winning that it did not matter what he said. I am sure that my honorable friend did not take up any such position at the time that he made the amendment vital. He knew that the result might be what it has actually been. Therefore, the fact must stand that the crisis arose through the deliberate choice of Ministers themselves. There was no snatch division. Every member of the House except the Speaker in the chair expressed his opinion upon a vital issue, the significance of which was fully understood. Thirty-six honorable members voted, or paired, with the Government, and 38 voted, or paired, against the Government, so that the full number of 74 members out of 75 deliberately recorded their opinions. Well, the Government acted consistently with the position taken up by the Prime Minister. After the vote, my honorable friend the Prime Minister considered his position, and tendered certain advice to His Excellency the Governor-General. The decision of His Excellency upon that advice is a matter with which we have nothing to do. In exercising the Royal Prerogative His Excellency is not responsible to us, but to the Sovereign. Having been sent for by His Excellency I was placed in this position:

Mr. Reid.

The Prime Minister having advised dissolution of the House, if I consider the dissolution of the House at that the proper course, and that all opportunities of further usefulness in this House been destroyed, it would have been my duty to refuse to undertake the task of forming an Administration, on the ground that it concurred with the advice conveyed by the Prime Minister, and believed that the House was incapable of further useful work. Rightly or wrongly, however, I took a different view. I remembered that the House had been in existence for eight or nine months. I remembered that the subject upon which this difficulty had arisen was not a great question of national politics, but merely involved a difference in the working of a principle which the House had adopted. It was a matter of principle at all, but a question as to the degree to which a principle which the House had adopted should be carried. Clearly it seemed to me that a useful object would be served by dissolving the House, unless I was satisfied that opportunities for further usefulness had been exhausted. In assuming the task of forming an Administration I took the view that the time had not arrived for a dissolution of this House, and I take the responsibility for the course which I adopted. I was not, of course, ignorant of the fact that the majority which had voted, as it had the right to vote, in accordance with its own convictions, was a small one. I am just as conscious of that fact now as I was then. I admit at once that if the thirty-six honorable members who voted with the Government on that occasion are determined to reduce this House into such a condition that there is no further prospect of useful legislation, they are in a position to do so. I admit that in a Chamber of this kind, a difference between thirty-eight and thirty-six members is such that it would be impossible for any Government to carry out its legislation if a minority so closely proaching equality with the majority made up their minds that the House was unfit to proceed any further with the transaction of public business. I meet this position at once, and I am prepared to stand by it, and I shall be prepared to admit that I was wrong in my expectation if—

Mr. THOMAS.—The right honorable member will have to admit it.

REID.—I am not denying anything simply stating my own individual opinion. I am prepared to admit that a large minority almost approach-ingly with the majority are determining about the termination of the this House they can effect their

LIAM LYNE.—The right honorable cannot dictate to the Government when he is to dissolve the

REID.—I hope that honorable members excuse me if I have not made my point clear. What I mean is that the Minister having stated that the Government is to be dissolved, and having a party strong enough to republican business to such a state House will become impotent, surely whether on this side of the Chamber of Opposition, the House being so that state, would consider should continue to exist.
 A little time we were in a at least equality to the late Government in point of numbers, but we choose to take up the position of great strength in order to obtain business of the country.

OMAS.—That was no fault of the honorable gentleman's.

REID.—I should like my honorable friend to mention one occasion during the existence of the late Government when they occupied the Treasury for so short a time that members were perfect upon the point—upon the Opposition obstructed public business. A singular complaint, and the complaint against us, was of an operative character—that we arrived at our conclusions by too summary methods, that we went out that we would not recommend it, because we did not intend that we had done.

OUCH.—The right honorable gentleman admits that he gave the Government unreliable advice.

REID.—What I am saying is that in asking to form an Administration the responsibility of endeavouring to carry out the public business of this House falls on all.

OUCH.—Now the right honorable gentleman is whining for mercy.

REID.—The language of my honorable friend would almost compare with the victorious Japanese General. I think the honorable and learned member that, so far from whining for mercy, if I may say it with any propriety, my honorable friends opposite will find others quite as ready as they are to endeavour to, at any rate, face the people of this country.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—They do not like that.

Mr. REID.—I do not mind it. This is just the preliminary fusillade of a most enjoyable campaign. I may say that I hope I shall be able to imitate the courteous attitude of my honorable friend, the late Prime Minister, on all occasions. I candidly admit that it is highly unlikely that I shall succeed, but I shall do my best, at any rate—although he is a much younger leader than I am—to follow the good example which he has set to all leaders in public life. I hope that my honorable friend will understand that I feel it my duty at present to state fully and frankly my view of the circumstances which led up to the present change in the administration of public affairs. I desire to say that this, in my opinion, represents something more than a mere change between the occupants of one set of benches and the occupants of another set of benches.
 It represents something more than the mere shuffling of the Ministerial cards.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is a double shuffle.

Mr. REID.—My honorable friend did not take much part in the game. I think that it was only at the last moment of the dying Government's existence that my honorable and learned friend became galvanized into even attendance in the House. I do not complain of that, because an opponent of his great ability is perhaps better away than here.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The right honorable gentleman was frequently away himself.

Mr. REID.—Yes, and the honorable member ought to thank me for it. When I settled down to my task something happened. The people of Australia are entitled to a full explanation at the present time from both sides of the House, and I am anxious, therefore, to deal with one or two questions which cannot be decided here, but can only be fought out before the electors. I wish to point out in an unmistakable way the difference between the two parties in this House. I claim that in some respects there are points of resemblance. I claim that the coalition which sits on this side of the House is just as democratic and as liberal as are those honorable members who claim the patent.
 I think we can point to honorable members on this side of the House—I need not select them—whose services in the cause of progressive politics may compare in some respects not unfavorably even with those of my honorable friends opposite. Just as my honorable friends of the Opposition, in forming their political tie, have to some extent to sink individual opinions—and I suppose that no member of the Labour Party will deny that that is one of the obligations of the alliance which has been formed—so in this Coalition Government, and in our Coalition Party, it has been necessary to some extent to sink individual views. In that respect I do not think that this side of the House compares unfavorably with the Opposition. But there are points on which we claim a vital difference between honorable members opposite and those on this side of the House. I speak, I think, in this respect for every member sitting on this side. In the first place, we offer the strongest possible objection to, and shall resist in the strongest possible way, the invasion of parliamentary government by means of a caucus.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Have the Government abolished their caucus?

Mr. REID.—The gentlemen who sit here have not yet had even one meeting.

Mr. FISHER.—Then the supporters of the Government have no voice at all in their policy?

Mr. REID.—I am happy to say that my honorable friends on this side of the House have not asked the Ministry to meet them in the vaults, and to outline the policy we intend to pursue before we have an opportunity to express it in this Chamber, and to present it to the people of Australia.

Mr. WATSON.—What Government had to do anything of the kind?

Mr. REID.—My honorable friend knows.

Mr. WATSON.—If the insinuation is that that was the position of the late Government it is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. REID.—If my honorable friend means to tell us that the labour caucus meets only to indulge in convivial relaxation, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. WATSON. — The late Government were never asked by their supporters to make any such statement of policy to them as the right honorable member suggests.

Mr. REID. — I accept the honorable member's statement.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Then the right honorable gentleman should withdraw his assertion.

Mr. REID.—I accept the statement the leader of the Opposition; but my impression is that we have been led to believe that the labour caucus meets at stated intervals to discuss public affairs, and to examine every Bill that is submitted to the House.

Mr. WATSON.—That is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. REID.—I am very glad to hear that. Then I may accept the assurance of my honorable friend that there is no political significance associated with the meetings of the caucus.

Mr. WATSON.—Oh yes, there is.

Mr. REID.—I wish, so far as I can, to restore what has been for many centuries the system of parliamentary government. In parliamentary government every Ministry has a number of supporters, and, so far as I am aware, there is no Government in the British Empire which has lived under such a condition of affairs as existed when my honorable friends opposite were in office.

Mr. WATSON.—But the right honorable gentleman evidently does not know what did exist at that time.

Mr. REID.—I certainly think that there must have been dense secrecy associated with the meetings of the Labour caucus, if one outside it is able to say what has transpired. I can only congratulate my honorable friends of the Opposition upon the successful secrecy with which they conduct their weekly or fortnightly meetings. I have never been connected with a political party which has held meetings at intervals of, perhaps, one or two years, without discovering that substantially everything which transpired at those meetings appeared next day in the press. But now we have to deal with a body of honorable members, thirty or forty strong, with very vigorous powers of expression, who meet a multitude of times, and conduct their political discussions with such absolute secrecy that no one outside their circle really knows what they do at those meetings.

Mr. WATSON.—That shows that nothing important can take place at those meetings.

Mr. REID.—That sort of successful secrecy in the discussion of the public affairs of the Commonwealth is foreign to the spirit of parliamentary institutions.

Mr. WATSON.—It has never occurred.

Mr. REID.—When in the history—

Mr. WATSON.—I rise to a point of order. I have stated on several occasions that which the right honorable as just made is absolutely in- I think it only right that he t my assurance.

AKER.—There is nothing in g Orders which requires that urance shall be received; but emen a statement of that kind epted, and I am sure that the ble gentleman will follow that

D.—Hear, hear; I desire to ourtesy of my honorable friend. y accepted the statement which nd also the further statement n that the meetings of the La- were devoted not to convivial t to the consideration of poli-

SON.—No question of policy before a caucus of the Labour it had been agreed to by the ven then it was merely men- e meeting.

D.—I am accepting my hon- d's assurance, and I suppose ot do any more. I am accept- f all, the assurance that the s is not a convivial gathering, e assurance that it is a political d thirdly the statement that the s often. I say that a rty or forty members of Par- o often meet to discuss poli- h secrecy that even the city re- ot obtain any information with o their proceedings, is about o body as is known to-day to e people.

D THOMSON. — Is the Prime ving us a declaration of the policy?

D.—My honorable friend with ountenance must remember been led a little astray by the of the Opposition. There is y which we take, and in regard y may also be said that we are ough that is a matter for the decide. We take the view, I there is a despotic power ex- representatives of the people labour leagues such as is wielded e body known to the political alia. We may be wrong—

CHELOR.—The Government are

D. — I know of the pledge r members have to sign. It ened that that pledge is given.

It cannot be denied that no avenue between my honorable friends opposite and the electors is open to them as candidates for the suffrages of the people, unless their application to appear in that capacity be stamped by a Labour League. I know of no such position which is occupied to-day by any other representative of the people in this House.

Mr. WATSON.—The position is the same with the free-trade league.

Mr. REID.—Certainly not.

Mr. WATSON.—What about the honorable member for Lang?

Mr. REID.—Might I refer to a case which happened only the other day in connexion with the State elections in New South Wales? In that instance the local league chose a certain candidate for one of the suburban electorates, and put aside the sitting member, who was an old friend and supporter of my own. But the sitting member was not in such a position that, when the league cast him aside, he was banished from public life, and dare not appear before the electors whom he had represented up to that time. He appeared before them, in spite of the vote given against him by the local league, and throughout the whole of that campaign no word was ever uttered that implied that in taking that line of action he had incurred the indelible disgrace which would attend a representative of the Labour Party who broke his pledges to a political Labour League.

Mr. WATSON.—But the machine beat him.

Mr. REID.—I think that my honorable friend ought to respect the verdict of any body of electors.

Mr. WATSON.—But the machine beat him, although, as the right honorable gentleman knows, he was a loyal man to his party.

Mr. REID.—I suppose that no one will deny that the electors are entitled to select whom they please. I have a further imputation to make, which my honorable friends opposite will doubtless deny. After all, it is something to obtain these denials from them, because by the time that we have had the last of them, we shall find that the Labour Party is not half so solid as has been popularly supposed. I believe that the Government and their supporters are just as honestly in favour, as are honorable members opposite, of using the whole national power to pass measures that will promote the national welfare to the highest possible point. On that point there is no difference of principle between the Op- position and honorable members on this side of the House. There is another principle, which, I believe, is supported by the Opposition which with us is equally an ideal, but an ideal which the views that prevail among honorable members opposite are calculated to destroy. I place side by side with the ideal of using to the furthest extent the national power to promote the national good, the ideal of leaving every human being in a free country as free in the exercise of his individual rights and in the carrying on of his individual enterprise as is consistent with the legitimate use of the national power for national ends.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We all agree to that.

Mr. REID.—My honorable friends opposite now say, "We all agree to that." Of course, I attach some significance to the representative character of the newspapers of the labour unions. Will my honorable friends repudiate the organs of their party as being altogether foreign to their sympathies and policy?

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—Yes.

Mr. REID.—Then they would throw over anything. Will those who represent the State Labour Party of Victoria, and who employ a gentleman at a salary of several hundred pounds a year to preach socialistic doctrines, now repudiate him? When a Labour League spends £500 a year to secure the services of a man for preaching purposes only, they must believe in the religion he expounds. The chosen missionary of the Labour Party is paid, and honorably paid, for his services. There is no stigma in the fact that he receives payment for his services; I mention it only as fixing official responsibility on those who employ him. This gentleman is sent all over Australia to preach the doctrines of an extreme Socialism, and the newspapers of the Labour Party preach those doctrines every day.

Mr. TUDOR.—The gentleman in question has been doing good work.

Mr. REID.—My honorable friend knows of the method that was suggested in connexion with the recent May Day celebrations. There is a very distinguished and worthy member of the party opposite who made a speech on that occasion. He said that the time was not ripe to at once carry out to their fullest extent the socialistic ideas which they preached, but he added that there were some plums ripe for picking, and said, "We are going to begin on the tobacco monopoly." There are two cures for monopolies. One is to put them down, and in the application of that remedy there is no member on this side of the House who will not work as hard as will any honorable member opposite. But there is another method which affords an opportunity to sneak in Socialism, and that is to take up what may seem to be a monopoly, and to make a State industry of it. That was the policy propounded by the late Prime Minister even in his moderate programme. He was going to begin by taking £8,000,000 from the banks, and the manufacture and sale of tobacco-manufacture certainly.

Mr. WATSON.—Where is the right honorable gentleman's Treasurer? I think that right honorable gentleman has said that he is in favour of taking the money from the banks.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—The honorable gentleman never heard me say it.

Mr. REID.—No such thing. I think I am in a position to correct the honorable member for Bland.

Mr. WATSON.—I have it from Hansard. If the right honorable gentleman did say it in so many words, he said so effect.

Mr. REID.—I think I am in a position to correct the honorable gentleman. My honorable friends opposite must remember that they are merely the political puppets of men outside this House—in this country only, that if one of them performs most brilliant service for Australia in this House, when the House is dissolved, he goes to the Political Labour League and asks for their nomination, if the members of the league are dissatisfied with him. If he has not given effect to their views, they can efface him from politics in Australia. They can say to him, "You stand down. You shall not even go before your electors to ask them whether they differ from us. You shall stand out of public life, because we do not like you, and do not believe in you."

Mr. HUGHES.—No. "You shall stand under our auspices," that is all. It is just what was done to Mr. Hawtrey as the right honorable gentleman knows.

Mr. REID.—This is beautiful. We are now invited to believe that if a gentleman, who has entered into an obligation to stand down if he is not selected by the Political Labour League, is not selected, refuses to stand down, and goes before his electors, he will not be called a politi-

We know that the man would be by every labour union in Aus-

HES.—I did not mean that.

D.—We know that such a man with a badge of social infamy put to disobey that stern discipline made the Labour Party the thing it is to-day.

HES.—What about Hawthorne and Wales?

D.—I have already mentioned

HUGHES.—What about E. M. D. who was wiped out after prostrating himself under the honorable gentle-

D.—I hope the honorable gentleman will reserve his remarks for another occasion. I am happy that I shall have an opportunity to reply to him this time. I have any further observations on the subject until that more convenient season to emphasize the points upon which honorable members on this side differ from honorable members opposite. I admit that these are not matters which we can fight at the moment. We all have our views, and many of them are pledged to observe, and these are the things which can only be fought out at the polls of the electors of Australia.

CHELOR.—We make no complaint of the right honorable gentleman's

D.—I am sure the honorable gentleman makes no complaint; he has now stated his philosophy. What I desire to say is that these are matters which have been fought out here, and which must be fought out before the electors of Australia. I mentioned them only as points in connection with which honorable members on the right of the Speaker differ from what they believe, from honorable members sitting opposite.

HUME COOK.—Is the right honorable gentleman coming to his policy now?

D.—I desire to deal now with a very inflammable subject. I propose to leave the present state of public business to what the Government propose to do, and refer to it.

HUME COOK.—At last!

D.—I hope the honorable member has not suffered too much from what I

HUME COOK.—I thought the right honorable gentleman was never coming to his policy. It is all.

Mr. REID.—When I have had the experience of the honorable member, I shall endeavour to form a correct model of Ministerial statement. I am now coming to the practical question with reference to the business of the present session. In the first place, I am afraid that we are all too painfully aware that this session has already lasted more than six months. That is a cold fact which no human being can possibly dispute.

Mr. PAGE.—That is the right honorable gentleman's fault.

Mr. REID.—Of course. We met on the 2nd March, and as this is the 7th of September; the House has consequently been in session for six months. I do not mention that as a reason for not doing a great deal of useful work; but only to remind honorable members, and the country, that we begin the practical administration of public affairs in a session that has already lasted six months.

Mr. HUME COOK.—That is because of what the "wreckers" in the right honorable gentleman's party helped to bring about.

Mr. REID.—Every trace of wreckage has now disappeared from the serene face of a smiling ocean.

Mr. McDONALD.—Does not the right honorable gentleman wish it had?

Mr. REID.—Even the cries of anguish have ceased.

Mr. HUME COOK.—And the whining has begun.

Mr. REID.—As I have now to deal with less controversial subjects, I hope I shall be allowed to make a very simple statement as to the course the Government intend to pursue in order to take as full advantage as they can of the remaining opportunities of this session. Before I address myself to those subjects, there is one question upon which I wish to say a word or two. The position which was taken up by the first Government that met this Parliament, and also by the late Government, with reference to the very great and important question of preferential trade is one which the present Government propose to take up. I see from honorable members' smiles that we are now getting into good humour. It is only taken up by the present Government because it happens to have been a sensible policy, and it happens to have been the policy which was submitted by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, as Prime Minister, to the electors of Australia, and approved by them.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—And opposed as strongly as it could be by the right honorable gentleman.

Mr. REID.—Exactly.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—“Yes-No.”

Mr. REID.—When will this soreness cease? I wish to say that the honorable member for Ballarat, as Prime Minister, announced the policy of waiting until a definite proposal was made by the Imperial Government to the Government of Australia. The late Government announced, very strongly, the policy of waiting until a definite proposal from the Imperial Government was made. I hope that the cause of the bitterest quarrel of my opponents will not be that I have imitated the wisdom of some of their proposals. I adopt that attitude; and my colleagues adopt the same attitude. I wish further to show what a sensible attitude it is. The British Government at the present time, and more than once, has officially declared to both Houses of Parliament that the Imperial Government is absolutely opposed on grounds having reference to the interests of the British people to the establishment of a system of preference within the Empire or to the taxation of the food of the British people. That is not an announcement made by me. That is an announcement made by the Imperial Government.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That has taken all the laugh out of honorable members opposite.

Mr. REID.—The announcement is one made by the Imperial Government, and whilst a great subject like this may occasionally be snatched at to serve the little purposes of strategy—

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, Hear!

Mr. REID.—There can be no sort of doubt that until the Government of Great Britain are prepared to consider the question of opening up negotiations; until the British Government have changed their attitude of absolute refusal to do so, no sensible person outside of this House would alter the attitude adopted by the two preceding Governments. I wish to say that personally I have never concealed my opinion that from the British point of view—and I speak entirely from the British point of view—the Imperial Government are pursuing a course which may turn out, from that point of view, to be an absolutely just and statesmanlike policy. That is a matter they have to decide. But so far as this Government is concerned, whenever the British Government are prepared to approach us with any proposal asking us to consider this matter in any shape or form they will not be met with a refusal. I shall be prepared to take this matter up, the British Government wish us to do so, and to take it up in a perfectly fair and honest spirit. That is all that could be expected at the present time from any Government of the Commonwealth, whatever Government it might be.

Mr. MAUGER.—The New Zealand Government did not wait for the British Government to take action.

Mr. REID.—I wish now to say a word or two on another subject, and the more pleased my honorable friends opposite are of themselves to be, the better satisfied am I. I have my barometer, and it is always the other side. I wish now to deal with the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, which has been so long before this Chamber.

Mr. ISAACS.—Before the right honorable gentleman passes from the question of preferential trade, I should like to know whether he means to say that he will take up the question unless he receives a request from the British Government?

Mr. REID.—I mean to say that on this matter I take up precisely the same position as that taken up by the two previous Governments, that is all.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Does that mean that the right honorable gentleman will interfere in certain duties to foreigners?

Mr. REID.—Since the honorable learned member for Indi so loyally supported both the previous Governments, I am sure that the honorable and learned gentleman's high sense of political rectitude will incline him to take the same attitude on a national question, even though it should be submitted by a Government constituted as is the present Administration. May I ask my honorable and learned friend—has the arrangement come off?

Mr. MAUGER.—It has; on a sound protectionist basis, too.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is a very important question for the right honorable gentleman.

Mr. REID.—Has my friend the honorable and learned member for West Sydney come round to a sound protectionist line? Have we forgotten that startling transition from the calm, philosophic repose of my distinguished friend, the late Postmaster General, to the mad enthusiasm which prompted him to rush after the honorable members for Parramatta and Dalley immediate free-trade crusade? I will take the honorable member for Melbourne Ports with them as a matter of good faith. To return to the statement of public business, which I am endeavouring to make, as honorable members know, there is a motion before the House to recommit the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, for the purpose of introducing a number of amendments. That was moved by the late Prime Minister, one of the clauses to which it was struck out on a vote of the House. The question as it now stands, the Government propose to invite the House to Committee to consider the amendments which have been suggested. I do not at present know, of the twenty amendments suggested by the late Prime Minister, at least seventeen or eighteen will be considered, and adopted by the present Government. Many of those amendments, I believe, are merely formal or consequential. I do not wish it to be thought that there are a large number of vital amendments, because there are not. The majority of the amendments are matters about which there will be no controversy; but when we come to deal with the measure, I shall indicate the position which the Government will take up in regard to them.

MR. PENNELL.—The Government will support the railway men then?

MR. REID.—Which way would the honorable member for Bourke vote on that?

MR. HUMPHREY.—For them, as I did.

MR. REID.—We propose to endeavour to amend the Bill as it stands, with most of the amendments suggested by the late Administration.

MR. REID.—Including clause 48?

MR. REID.—I hope that honorable member will not ask me at this stage to deal with details.

MR. MITCHELL.—Clause 48 is a big amendment. The late Government went out on it.

MR. REID.—We are anxious to send the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill to the House as soon as possible, in order to give it some useful and important work to do with, and we must all regret that we have hitherto been unable to send important measures to that body, so that they have happily not had very much to do. I am glad that that Bill is despatched to the Senate, we shall deal with a matter of very great importance, which has been delayed, not through any fault of Ministers, but because of the reclassification of the Public Service. As the late Treasurer knows, that work has caused an immense amount of difficulty to the Treasury in the preparation of the Estimates; but the moment that the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill has been sent to the other Chamber, we shall be in a position to introduce the Budget and the Estimates. In the ordinary course of events, the Financial Statement should have been made somewhere towards the end of July, which is the first month of the financial year; but, unfortunately, it cannot be made until probably somewhere near the end of this month. I hope that it will not be made so late as that, but, at any rate, we shall be able to make provision for the annual services of the Commonwealth directly the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill has been despatched to the Senate. A Bill for the creation of the position of High Commissioner is on the notice-paper, and I believe that the late Government proposed to deal with it during the present session. In our view, however, it is utterly impossible to establish the position of High Commissioner until the various States have been consulted, in order that an opportunity may be given to make these changes as productive of economy and co-operation as is possible. We, therefore, do not propose to proceed with that Bill until we have had an opportunity in the recess, with the assistance and co-operation of the Governments of the States, to work out some harmonious system which will be mutually beneficial, and economical. Then there is the question which is so dear to the heart, not only of my right honorable and distinguished friend, the member for Swan, but of some honorable members opposite—the survey of the proposed Transcontinental Railway. We intend to pass a Bill providing for that survey this session.

MR. CROUCH.—What about the honorable member for Gippsland?

MR. REID.—I am happy to say that the honorable member for Gippsland is perfectly agreeable to the survey being made.

MR. HUMPHREY.—The right honorable member will have a harder job with the honorable member for Moira.

MR. REID.—As I have been associated with the work of Federation from the moment it took any practical shape, I wish to say most earnestly that, although there is no written contract in the Constitution in reference to the Transcontinental Railway, there was a state of feeling, an understanding amongst the Premiers of Australia, which would make the refusal to conduct a survey to ascertain whether the project is reasonably practical, something like a shameless breach of an undertaking. That is my deliberate opinion. I feel very strongly about this matter, because I have been a member of all the conferences of Premiers which have been held from first to last, and I have heard every word that has been spoken between the Ministers. If the House were to refuse the reasonable request for a proper survey, so as to have the proposal thoroughly tested in a practical way, it would be treating the great State of Western Australia in a manner which, I should think, was to be greatly regretted.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Was this a secret caucus of Premiers?

Mr. REID.—No, but we did not admit the honorable member to the Premiers' Conferences. That time will come by-and-by.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The right honorable member takes great objection to caucuses being secret.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But evidently no greater objection than the honorable and learned member takes.

Mr. REID.—All our deliberations in the Conferences of Premiers were reduced to black and white, and published for the information of the people of Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Where does the understanding of which the right honorable member has spoken appear?

Mr. REID.—If my honorable friends opposite would only issue a weekly gazette containing a report of their conferences in the vaults, we should all be greatly edified and instructed thereby. The late Attorney-General, I am sure, had a more painful struggle in his mind over the question of these labour caucuses than any other public man in Australia has had.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The right honorable gentleman is quite wrong.

Mr. REID.—The honorable and learned member was like a fish which was half in and half out of the water. I hope that, now that he considers our friends opposite as engaged in a holy mission, he will avail himself of the opportunity to go with them.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Who used the words "holy mission"?

Mr. REID.—I am, of course, in the hands of the newspapers. I dared not appear at a meeting which was being addressed by my honorable and learned friend. I am speaking from the newspaper reports.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Then the right honorable member is wrong.

Mr. REID.—I accept the honorable learned member's withdrawal.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I do not withdraw statement, because I never made it; the right honorable member knows that it is so.

Mr. REID.—How could I know it? I had received the honorable and learned member's assurance? There is no matter which I think honorable member must feel to be in a most unsatisfactory state, and that is the electoral business of the Commonwealth. There is not a man in the Chamber who will say that the work of our Electoral Department is satisfactory. The Minister of Home Affairs, however using his utmost energy to bring about an improved state of affairs, but that probably need some slight amendment of the existing law.

Mr. PAGE.—They have all been trying to bring about an improved state of affairs but the result has been a worse chaos than ever before.

Mr. REID.—Well, we must try the best. I am sure that my honorable friend will give the Minister credit for being a good business man. He will do his utmost to rescue that most important department from the chaos in which it exists. Then there is the Navigation Bill. Long ago I expressed the opinion that the Bill should be referred to a Royal Commission. At the time the proposal was to refer it to a Committee; but the Government very wisely appointed a Commission instead, and we are thorough in favour of that Commission proceeding with its labours. The Minister of Home Affairs, who is a member of the Commission, will remain on it, and will give the best services to it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And the Minister of Trade and Customs as well?

Mr. REID.—I am afraid that it will be impossible for two Ministers to devote attention to the work of the Commission because it is a very big piece of business. The Government propose to proceed with the Papua Bill, which is now before the House, and, if possible, to deal with two measures concerning Trade and Customs one of which has been sent by the Government to us, while the other is now being considered by that body. With regard important measure which was before the change of Government—I refer to the measure for the Seat of Government—the Government of New South Wales have lost no time in communicating the matter, and we intend to do so. I have it finally dealt with. I believe no objection will be raised to which has been made by this Government. Some people in New South Wales have spoken very strongly about the measure, as well as about other matters. I think I may say that the Government of New South Wales will fairly support the choice which has been made by the Government.

ANTER.—Are they going to ask the Parliament to consider the mat-

REID.—It is, of course, a matter on which only the State Parliament can decide. The Government of the State cannot do it without legislation. I am, however, from what I see, and what I know, that there may be a strong objection to the ceding of the land which it is proposed to take; but the Government of Home Affairs, in whose Department the matter more immediately is, will do our very best to carry out the wishes of this Parliament, both as to the land and as to the very important matter of the hon. member's learned friend for India, as to access to the sea. I am very sanguine that some satisfactory arrangement will be arrived at. I wish to speak with reference to the Bill for the Encouragement Bill which is a business-paper. That is a measure, upon which members of the Government hold different opinions. Some are in favour of the Bill, whilst others are opposed to it, and we have made it an open question in the ABLE MEMBERS.—Oh, oh!

REID.—I am rather amused at the remarks of my honorable friends. If the question was open one in the late Cabinet, why did the Government take up the Bill without it? My honorable friends are tyros in regard to the application of the rules for the conduct of Govern-

WATSON.—We must be tyros in comparison with the right honorable gentle-

REID.—My honorable friends have been tyros if they handed over a measure of that kind to a private individual, whilst as members of a Government they were united in their determination to support it.

Mr. WATSON.—We have not been making professions about responsible Government such as have emanated from the right honorable gentleman.

Mr. REID.—I would ask my honorable friend whether his Government decided to vote for the Bill? I have read a certain solemn statement, under the hand of a Royal Commission, signed by the late Prime Minister. There were two reports, one signed by the right honorable member for Adelaide, whose illness we all so deeply regret, and the other by the honorable member for Bland. The members of the Royal Commission upon the Manufactures Encouragement Bill were equally divided. The same number of members were on opposite sides upon the important matter which I propose to mention. The Chairman, the right honorable member for Adelaide, by his casting vote, converted his supporters into a majority. He voted in order to make the number on one side six, and his casting vote converted that six into the majority who signed the majority report, whilst the other six members of the Commission, led by the late Prime Minister, brought up a minority report.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The minority report was unanimous, whilst the majority report was not.

Mr. REID.—The late Prime Minister deliberately reported, as a Royal Commissioner, after hearing evidence on oath, that no duty and no bonus was required.

Mr. McCAY.—But for his action, the Bill would have been law now.

Mr. REID.—If the honorable member had voted with the other six, his action as the leader of the Labour Party, would have had very great significance. However, he and that other smiling genius, the honorable and learned member for West Sydney, joined other members of the Commission in presenting a minority report to the effect that no bonus was required. Now, would those honorable members, when they got into office, swallow their principles, and pass through a Bill involving a charge of £250,000 upon the people of Australia which they, as Royal Commissioners, stated should not be imposed? That would be a wonderful position for them, as Royal Commissioners, to place themselves in, and I am sure they would not be guilty of any such thing. What was the result? The question was left an open one for the Cabinet.

Mr. HUGHES.—Has the right honorable gentleman taken office with the object of restoring responsible Government—that is the question.

Mr. REID.—Certainly. But I never knew of any rule without an occasional exception. What amuses me is that when I take a practical common-sense view of matters, honorable gentlemen want to put me upon a pedestal, even higher than that which they occupy. My weight would not stand the elevation. Since the members of the Cabinet differed honestly in opinion upon the principle of the Bill, there was one of two courses for them to take. Either some of the members of the Cabinet would have to forego their principles in order to allow the Government to adopt a Bill to which some of their number were conscientiously opposed, or Ministers could deal with the matter in the manner we are doing, which happens also to be the method followed by the most pure-minded, fearless, and independent Government that ever lived for three or four months.

Mr. ISAACS.—Will the Manufactures Encouragement Bill be made a Government measure?

Mr. REID.—No. What I wish to say on behalf of the Government is that time is too valuable to waste over any subject that is not a practical issue. If there is any prospect of a practical issue in connexion with the Bill, the Government will give honorable members every reasonable opportunity for dealing with it this session.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Will the Government afford honorable members an opportunity to vote upon my motion this session?

Mr. REID.—Certainly. It is only fair to the honorable member for Eden-Monaro to say that his motion has been on the notice-paper for some time, and that, if the views of honorable members can be ascertained in some such short way, as by a discussion upon his motion, an opportunity for its consideration might be afforded.

Mr. MAUGER.—Why should we waste time in dealing with a motion, instead of discussing the Bill straight out?

Mr. REID.—All I can say is that, if there is any reasonable prospect of the Bill being dealt with practically and effectually, we shall afford honorable members an opportunity to dispose of it this session. I have referred to the only matters which the Government can reasonably expect the House to deal during the short time that is left this session. Personally, I wish honorable members to understand that the Government are perfectly willing to give any amount of time, no matter how long the session be, to any matter of urgency that we have a reasonable chance of passing. This is a matter for the convenience of honorable members. There is a use to which I intend to put the recess, which I think will commend itself to the views of honorable members generally. In the first place I propose, and the Government join cordially with me, to make every possible effort to establish cordial and friendly relations between the different Governments of the Australian States and the central Government.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Is that the reason the right honorable gentleman proposes to dump Chinese into Queensland?

Mr. REID.—Surely my honorable friend will permit me without interruption to make a statement with regard to a matter of importance. If my honorable friends have any questions to ask, I assure them they shall be regularly in attendance here to deal with the daily business of the House. What I wish to do, if they will allow me, is to make this statement as briefly and concisely as I can. I regard it as a matter of the first importance—I do not for a moment suggest that other Governments should be taken up any other position, but I am speaking for the only Government which I have a right to speak for—the Commonwealth Government to establish relations of the most cordial and friendly nature with the States Governments.

Mr. PAGE.—Have the relations otherwise?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Is there any action now?

Mr. REID.—I have nothing to do with what has passed. I do not wish to refer to the statements that have been made with reference to these matters in the past. I have no business with them in that respect. If other Governments have done their best—and I do not say we have not—all I say is that I am going to imitate their good example, and to do the best with the same end in view. There are a number of Departments which have yet been taken over; but which ought to d by the Commonwealth. It is possible to properly assume certain Departments without the fulfilment with the different States, in order that the change may be made gradually, and in a spirit of compromise. Honorable members know the number of questions are still between the States Governments of the Commonwealth. Take, for instance, the question of the transferred property matter of the utmost importance, not yet settled.

LIAM LYNE.—No; but a strong effort has been made to settle it.

D.—I am not questioning that, simply stating that the question has not yet been settled. The basis upon which the change is to be made has not yet been determined. That matter may have to be subject to legal determination. There is a question of the public debts, and the number of subjects in which the States, and of the Commonwealth, are identical, and upon which we are in agreement with the States Governments. I am in recess, in order to bring about a better understanding. Then there are a number of subjects upon which we should have uniform legislation, such as banking, copyright, and quarantine. I mention these and other matters because they do not belong to the business of the present session; but there is a number of highly-important subjects of Commonwealth legislation, which must be dealt with at the first convenient opportunity. I think I have made a perfectly candid statement of the course the Ministers intend to take with reference to public business.

LIAM LYNE.—Before the right honorable gentleman sits down, I wish to ask a question.

BAKER.—The honorable member knows that he cannot ask questions in the evening. He will have an opportunity to-morrow.

WATSON (Bland).—After the speech of the right honorable gentleman about the length of which, I am sure that we of us can complain, because the right honorable gentleman came in so brief, he was commendably brief, I think the Government might very well allow honorable members a little more consideration.

McDONALD.—What, when the leader of the Opposition has a majority of five?

Mr. WATSON.—There is nothing like being magnanimous in these matters.

Mr. McDONALD.—After the insults which the Prime Minister has cast upon members of the Opposition, he is not entitled to any consideration.

Mr. WATSON.—I would ask for an adjournment until to-morrow, in order that some consideration may be given to the statement of the Prime Minister, and I, therefore, move—

That the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I am rather amused at the leniency which is being shown by the leader of the Opposition. Under ordinary circumstances, no doubt, it would have been quite right for the leader of the Opposition to allow the Government another day's grace—I might, if I chose to follow the example of the Prime Minister, also add the words, "and allow them to draw another day's pay." I shall not, however, be mean enough to make any reference to such a matter. When the Prime Minister talks about our being mere puppets, I think it is time for us to proceed to extremes. I do not wish to act contrary to the wishes of the leader of the Opposition, but I feel very strongly upon this matter. I think that we, at least, have the right to expect courtesy at the hands of the right honorable gentleman. I feel very much inclined to call for a division, and to defeat the Government on the very first day that they have met this House.

Mr. STORRER (Bass).—I am rather surprised that the leader of the Opposition should move the adjournment of the debate, because the Prime Minister has said nothing new. He has told us that we have been in session for six months, and that we have done little or no business, and yet it is now proposed to waste still further time. The delay which has taken place in carrying out the work of the House has been due to the protracted speeches which have been made when short ones would have sufficed. I have endeavoured to express my views on any subject as concisely as possible. The Prime Minister, in putting the policy of the Government before the House, has not told us of anything that is new, and those who desire to discuss his declaration should at once do so, so that the stigma cast on honorable members that with us "it is all talk and no business" may be removed.

Motion agreed to; debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion (by Mr. REID) put—
That the House do now adjourn.

The House divided—

Ayes	32
Noes	7
				—
Majority	25

AYES.

Brown, T.
Chapman, A.
Conroy, A. H. B.
Cook, J.
Deakin, A.
Edwards, G. B.
Edwards, R.
Forrest, Sir J.
Fuller, G. W.
Gibb, J.
Harper, R.
Hutchison, J.
Kelly, W. H.
Knox, W.
Lee, H. W.
Liddell, F.
Lonsdale, E.

McCay, J. W.
McLean, A.
Phillips, P.
Quick, Sir J.
Reid, G. H.
Robinson, A.
Salmon, C. C.
Skene, T.
Smith, S.
Thomson, D.
Turner, Sir G.
Willis, H.
Wilson, J. G.

Tellers:

Johnson, W. E.
Wilks, W. H.

NOES.

Bamford, F. W.
Crouch, R. A.
Page, J.
Storrer, D.

Thomson, D. A.
Tellers:
McDonald, C.
Spence, W. G.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 4.10 p.m.

Senate.

Thursday, 8 September, 1904.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PAPERS.

MINISTERS laid upon the table the following papers:—

Additions to financial and allowance regulations for the Military Forces.

Rules of the High Court, Nos. 49 and 50, of 1904.

ARTILLERY AND WARLIKE STORES.

Senator MATHESON asked the Attorney-General, upon notice—

1. Has any valuation been made of the Artillery and Warlike Stores taken over by the Commonwealth from the States in 1901.

2. If so, what valuation has been made?
- (1) On the obsolete material in the forts at Sydney.
- (2) On the obsolete material being converted into other uses.

Senator Sir JOSIAH... valuation has yet been made.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT.—
out that a debate on the Government is as a rule not business is called on. Ministers will now rearrange they have on the notice-table the first order of the head of Government business that will meet the case. acting, I think, in accordance.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON MONOPOLIES.

Motion (by Senator P...
That the Select Committee on Monopoly have leave to bring up the report to this House.

PARLIAMENTARY BILL.

Senator Lt.-Col. NE... Wales).—Do I understand marks, sir, that private bills be taken to-day, in accordance with Standing Orders?

The PRESIDENT.—
was that I believed it was the unanimous wish of the Senate to have the debate on the policy of the Government, and that therefore the members who have charge of the bill and are strictly entitled to bring it up under Standing Orders to meet the position by proposed amendments.

Senator Lt.-Col. NE... I should never dream of business standing in my way. I should not interfere with the pleasure of the majority of members. At the same time, sir, should I make a remark on the subject? The PRESIDENT.—not be strictly in order, honorable senator likes to make a statement he can proceed.

Senator Lt.-Col. NE... leader of the Senate has business with private business, so free for public business. The question met with no response.

that I cannot go on with the ing of the Parliamentary Evi-which I deem to be of the highest importance.

PRESIDENT.—The honorable not to discuss the Bill now, to move the postponement of the day, or allow it to stand on paper.

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If it is not for me to proceed with the ing of the Bill to-day, I move—of the Day No. 2, private business, to the next day on which Orders,
ess, have precedence.

resolved in the affirmative.

COMMITTEE: CASE OF SENATOR NEILD.

by Senator HIGGS) proposed—Select Committee on the case of
I have leave to extend the time for the report to this day four weeks.

Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South submit, sir, that the motion can-ved at this stage, when we are y with the postponement of busiordnance with your suggestion.

PRESIDENT.—The order of the en called on, and the report of Committee can be brought up.
t is not ready, a member of the nittee can move for further time bring it up.

HIGGS.—It ought to have been to-day, but it is not ready.

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I suppose, s open to me to move an amend-

PRESIDENT.—I see no objec-

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The amend-re to move is—proceedings of the Select Committee until it is in a position to take oath.

of the amendment, I desire to while one Select Committee of has been taking evidence on oath, ect Committee has been taking atements without any oath, or ments without any oath.

PEARCE.—I rise to order. I the honorable senator is reflect-Select Committee of the Senate that it has been taking rambling without any oath.

Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I corrected was only a lapsus linguae.

Senator PEARCE.—I also desire to ask whether, under cover of this amendment, the honorable senator is in order in discussing the credibility of evidence given before the Select Committee.

The PRESIDENT.—Standing order 70 says that—

After the formal motions and orders have been disposed of, and before the business of the day is proceeded with, any senator may move, without notice, that any notice of motion standing in his name, or order of the day of which he is in charge on the paper for that day, shall be a notice of motion, or order of the day, for some subsequent day. No amendment or debate shall be allowed on any such motion, but the Senate may proceed to division thereon as in other cases.

In this case, the order of the day has been called on, and a member of the Select Committee has moved that it have one month's further time in which to bring up the report.
I do not think that any amendment to that motion can be moved.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—May I be permitted to point out to you, sir, that the motion is not simply that the order of the day be postponed to a particular day, but that the Select Committee have leave to bring up its report at a later date? I submit that the motion does not come within the standing order, and that if the motion is in order, the amendment must also be in order.

The PRESIDENT.—I think that the honorable and learned senator is right.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I propose to put myself in order, by moving—

That Order of the Day, No. 4, private business, be an Order of the Day for this day four weeks.

The PRESIDENT.—But the honorable senator has already moved a motion, which I have put to the Senate.

Senator HIGGS.—I ask leave to withdraw that motion.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—May I, sir, move the postponement of the order of the day for one week?

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator knows that his further evidence will take at least seven days.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—If it is in order
I shall move—

That Order of the Day, No. 4, private business, be an Order of the Day for this day week.

Senator PEARCE.—I submit, sir, that you cannot accept that amendment from the honorable senator, as he is a witness before, and not a member of the Select Committee

The PRESIDENT.—A motion has been moved, and the mover now asks leave to withdraw it. The question is that Senator Higgs have leave to withdraw his motion.

HONORABLE SENATORS.—Hear, hear.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland). — I move—

That Order of the Day, No. 4, private business, be an Order of the Day for the first Thursday on which Orders, private business, have precedence.

We can bring up the report in a week if it is ready.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I would suggest to Senator Higgs that it would be more in keeping with the course that has been pursued this afternoon if he were to move the postponement of this order of the day until the next sitting day, on which such business will take precedence. That would prevent debatable questions from being raised now, and would enable the Senate to get on with other business.

The PRESIDENT.—I shall put the motion as moved by Senator Higgs.

Question put. The Senate divided.

Ayes	20
Noes	6

Majority	14
--------------	-----	-----	-----	----

AYES.

Baker, Sir R. C.
Dawson, A.
de Largie, H.
Dobson, H.
Drake, J. G.
Findley, E.
Guthrie, R. S.
Henderson, G.
Higgs, W. G.
Keating, J. H.
Macfarlane, J.

Matheson, A. P.
McGregor, G.
O'Keefe, D. J.
Pearce, G. F.
Smith, M. S. C.
Styles, J.
Symon, Sir J. H.
Turley, H.

Teller:

Givens, T.

NOES.

Gray, J. P.
Millen, E. D.
Neild, J. C.
Pulsford, E.

Walker, J. T.

Teller:

Gould, A. J.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

Debate resumed from 7th September (vide page 4335) on motion by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON—

That the despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with regard to the adoption of the metric system of weights and measures, within the Empire, be printed.

Senator MCGREGOR (South Australia). —Yesterday afternoon, when I asked for an adjournment of the debate inaugurated by Senator Symon, I had no intention of putting any member of the Senate to inconvenience. But I recognised that if there was any proceeding that would call the attention of the Australian people to the nouncement of the Government, it was the adjournment of the debate. The motion was foreshadowed by the Attorney-General, who possessed no feature to make it different from the policy of the preceding Government. When we consider it from another point of view, I ask honorable senators what necessity there was for all the trouble and delay that have been caused by the transition from one Government to another? I cannot imagine a reason for it, but the present Government have adopted the very policy which the leader of the late Government characterized at Warragul. He was leader of the Opposition, as a "leading policy." I want to know whether the Attorney-General concurs in that state of his present, half-leader? I call him so because we must all recognise that the gentleman who now occupies the position of—well, I cannot find a term for it. When we speak of sacred things, we are familiar with the term "Trinity." But what does it represent the present condition of the Government in Australia? Should it be described as a "duality"? I am not certain. We may take it to be a sort of Government, just as we speak of screws. We must regard the leaders of the present Government as a pair. One of the pair declared at Warragul that the policy of the late Government was a leading policy. But as soon as he had an opportunity to make a Ministerial statement to the people of Australia, he came forward with the very same policy. Yet it is not exactly the same. The Government have knocked off two or three legs, so that the policy cannot "crawl" any longer. We are also to witness a disturbance of the conditions which have existed in the Senate since its very commencement. Everybody in Australia knows, or imagines that he knows, that when the position of the President of the Executive Council was created, there was a particular intention in view. That was to give a position to a member of the first Federal Ministry, who would be in harmony with the ability and the earnestness of that gentleman. What do we find to-day, in relation to the Vice-Presidency of the Executive Council? If, formerly, I got up to ask a question without notice, I put it to the Vice-President of the Executive Council, and of instances, he would probably give notice. But to-day and every honorable senator who got to hesitate. They did not know. They did not know whether to address the Vice-President of the Executive Council or the Attorney-General. They could not address the leader of the Government, because we do not know who

Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I think

McGREGOR.—Why did they

Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—They did. They are doing very well.

McGREGOR.—Then, I must say my perception seems to be getting better. Because I am of opinion that honorable senators did hesitate when they got to the position in the Senate acknowledged as being the ability and the perseverance of the present Attorney-General, when he was asked to conduct. Some of us have been at cross purposes with him. But I could hardly keep from saying yesterday on account of the very manner in which he referred to me. No doubt my temper may have been when I went to the chamber, with respect to the fact that he had turned out of office the Government of which I was a member, in a number of moments I felt myself to be all right.

The manner of the Attorney-General is so unlike—I cannot say what I am accustomed to from him, being an honorable and learned senator was while I was in office. Of course, I know how he would have talked if he had been present, as he was in connexion with the discussions of the day. We know how he could fire his eyes would flash, and how the words would rattle as he railed against some of almost every one but himself. The days. But, it appears, we are a family now! I hope it may be due to be so. But I am a little in the position which I occupied yesterday. I do not like to see the office of the Vice-President of the Executive Council, or the leadership of a legislative body like that in the mud, as it were. Consequently, I may be excused if I feel a little

PULSFORD.—It is very sad!

McGREGOR.—It is very sad. I hope that Senator Pulsford would not have been tonight's illness if his mind were agitated in the same manner as mine has been in respect to that position, and the way in which it has been treated. But then we could not expect—at least I could not—that such a high and mighty gentleman as the present Attorney-General would subordinate himself to any individual in this Senate, who might be appointed Vice-President of the Executive Council. I could not imagine it. Then the difficulty arose—how could the leader of the Government get some one who would occupy the position of Vice-President, when, as the Right Honorable George Reid would say, it was divested of every feather? Where was he to find a senator who would sit meekly in his place, holding a title without any of the attributes that ought to belong to it? I could hardly believe that there was a single member of the Senate who would take the position under such conditions. But what do we find? I hope there is no honorable senator who will think that I would speak of any individual present with feelings of—I was going to say anger, but why should I be angry? But when we speak from a political point of view there are many things that we may say that ought not to disturb our personal friendships. I intend to say those things to-day, and I hope to be excused for saying them.

Senator DAWSON.—Why ask to be excused?

Senator McGREGOR.—Well, I am not particular whether I am or am not excused.

Senator DOBSON.—Why not leave personalities, and come to policy?

Senator McGREGOR.—I shall come to the policy of the Government, when I can find it. I have been fishing round for the policy of the Government, but I have not found it yet. Senator Dobson, when he is addressing ladies' meetings, has to fish round a long time to find out what public opinion is. The honorable senator introduced a Divorce Bill, but found that public opinion was against him, and changed his tune; and he ought to excuse me if I fish round for a little while in an endeavour to find the policy of the Government.

Senator DOBSON.—Come to the question.

Senator McGREGOR.—I hope the honorable and learned member will not hurry me. I am in an extremely good humour this afternoon, and I hope the honorable and learned senator will not destroy my peace of mind by making any of those silly interjections for which he is famous.

I was referring to the position which members of the present Ministry, as contrasted with members of other Ministries, occupy in this chamber. Is there a single individual senator who would stand up to-day, and say that, under present circumstances, he would fill the position of Vice-President of the Executive Council? But the dear, docile Drake ducks so that the Symon swan may swim serenely and supreme on the sea of office. That is something like the way in which John Norton would put the position; indeed, I do not know that John Norton could put it better, and, at any rate, that is how I feel. Are we to imagine that the present Attorney-General could do any other than he has done? The honorable and learned senator is a patriot who is prepared to sacrifice himself on the altar of his country's good. When there was nothing to be done—when there was only a paltry allowance attached—the honorable and learned senator did not trouble much about his country's good. We must always bear the facts in mind, and I want the people and honorable senators to know those facts, so that they may never allow themselves to be put in the same awkward position. A month's leave of absence was asked for on the ground of urgent private business, and a telegram was sent, stating that a position required to be filled. Then this great patriot jumped at the position, as they say in Scotland, like a cock at a grosset. But can honorable senators see where the patriotism comes in? The position of Vice-President of the Executive Council—the position of leader of the Senate—could only be an honorary position, and, of course, that means a great deal to a gentleman who is so patriotic that he would only attend about eight or nine days out of thirty, until such time as the position was open for him in the Government. That is the real position of affairs. The Attorney-Generalship was offered and accepted, and then the position of Vice-President of the Executive Council had to be filled; and here arose the difficulty. The latter is an honorary position, and Senator Drake was the only man who could be got to fill it—the only man who was prepared to sink his own individuality and duck under so that he could be superseded in a double sense by the Attorney-General of the present day. Look at the difference between the leader of the Senate and the leader in another place. The Right Honorable George Reid has figured in the politics of Australia as prominently as any man in this country could have done, but he is prepared to sink his individuality and become half free-trader and half protectionist, and occupy a position which declares he shares as equal in all this with a friend of his. I am only endeavouring to point out the true position of the Government occupy in the Senate at the present time. What position of Senator Drake occupy? What does he do? No one ever asks him a question, and he ought to be ashamed of his existence here. I am sure that when he goes back to the people of Queensland, they ask him why he dragged the reputation of his State in the mire, he will have no answer to give, except—"Well, I was afraid you would not elect me at that time, and I thought I would do the best I could for myself at the present time. Nothing of that kind could ever be done by a single individual belonging to the Labour Party, which is so contemptuously spoken of. Not a single word of that description could be uttered with respect to a member of any of the preceding Governments. I ask honorable senators whether they can have the same faith in the administration of the business of the country when it is in the hands of those who, in one instance, are prepared to sacrifice their individuality, and, in another instance, are compelled by their over-weening vanity to grab both positions in the Senate, leaving a poor fellow-member in the mean and degraded position which the Vice-President of the Executive Council occupies to-day.

Senator McGregor.

Senator PULSFORD.—What humbug!

Senator MCGREGOR.—I dare say Senator Pulsford might have filled the position, but he is a free-trader, and, of course, could not be offered to him. Besides, the honorable senator represents New South Wales, and there were too many representatives of New South Wales in the Ministry already. The result was that he did not get a chance.

Senator HIGGS.—Senator Pulsford might be very unhappy, in view of fiscal peace.

Senator MCGREGOR.—That may be, but I shall deal with that matter by-and-by. This is a "sinking" Government, that is all I do not know when it is going to sink.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—It is a sinking Government.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The Government have sunk the fiscal question, and also the electoral boundaries question, in connection with which the half-leader made a fool elf by going to the country, though to not hear a word of that matter to-

The present Government will sink ing—they launch their catamaran, and their sails flying in the breeze will anything.

nator HIGGS.—They will sink themselves some day.

nator MCGREGOR.—That is a con- cency which will arise, and so far as the perity of Australia is concerned, the er the better. At present, however, we discussing the policy which the Govern- have put forward, though we have a ect right to discuss the position in which find ourselves. We have to ask why present position has arisen. I am go- this afternoon to say distinctly that the object which the members of the pre- Government could have had in bringing it a change was to displace the Labour y—this socialistic party—or it was for purpose merely of getting into office. heir object was to displace the Labour ty—the socialistic party—they have been king a long while to do it; but they t bear in mind that they are a long way, t the present, from shifting the social- : party.

enator MILLEN.—Then the honorable ator admits that his party is the social- : party?

enator MCGREGOR.—Did I ever deny

I am going to tell the honorable sena- how much of a Socialist I am; and I not think that he will follow the ex- ple of his leader in another place, and liberately make a statement over and r again when he has been repeatedly ormed as to its falsity.

Senator HIGGS.—Senator Millen was ce a delegate to a Labour Party's con- ss.

Senator MCGREGOR.—It is for that son that I say the honorable senator will t repeat a statement when he is informed t it is false. I want to compare the licy of this socialistic party with the licy of that heterogeneous conglomeration : find in another place.

Senator MILLEN.—The Isaacs-Watson- m-Lyne conglomeration.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The free-trade liberals, the free-trade Conservatives, and otectonist Conservatives are all jumbled gether; and a fine lot they will be by- d-by when they begin to quarrel over the nes.

Senator WALKER.—What about the so- alistic Tory party we see there.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator would not hurt any party very much by his presence, and consequently we can be merciful with him. I desire to enlighten members, because some seem to require a great deal of enlightenment as to the so- cialistic proclivities of the Labour Party. We have it continually thrown in our face:—"You have your labour journals all over Australia launching forth anarchy and Socialism; you have your paid leaders and advocates going all over the country telling people what you believe in, and you are bound to take the statements they make as statements of your views." We are, and always have been, prepared to take those statements when they correctly describe our views, but we are not going to take the biased versions of those state- ments which very often appear in a pre- judiced press. I want to-day to show the policy of the Labour Party and contrast it—

Senator DAWSON.—Do not do that or the other side will steal it.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Well, they are welcome to the policy, because it will be good for them.

Senator PULSFORD.—The honorable senator has said that the other side has al- ready stolen the Labour Party's policy.

Senator MCGREGOR.—And if the other side party sit on that policy long enough, they may hatch something good. The other side have never had a policy of their own. I defy any one to find out any policy on their part, except that of being against any- thing of a progressive character.

Senator MILLEN.—What particular plat- form are you giving us?

Senator MCGREGOR.—I am giving you the Labour Party's platform. The plat- form and the policy of this new alliance have been published in the newspapers.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator told us not to accept newspaper reports.

Senator MCGREGOR.—But when the newspapers publish an official statement you may take it as correct, but if it is inter- mingled with the opinions of a prejudiced newspaper you do not know what you are getting. It may be Epsom salts with vinegar.

Senator CLEMONS.—Have you an official paper whose statements we can accept?

Senator DAWSON.—Read the Queensland Worker.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I am giving you the labour platform now. My statements are correct, but if I make a mistake an-honorable senator is at liberty to contradict me. I am not so high and mighty that I would not brook reproof. The first plank of our platform is the maintenance of a White Australia. Is there one honorable senator who objects to it? Only a few months ago certain of the members of the present Government were travelling about Australia howling over the Petriana myth, the Stelling case, the six hatters incident, and other matters of that kind, but not a word is now uttered as to the repeal of the provisions on the statute-book.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Senator Pulsford has a motion on the notice-paper.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Yes; but he is not the Government, and he will be gagged, as will also many members of the House of Representatives.

Senator PULSFORD.—No, he will not.

Senator MCGREGOR.—It would be better for Senator Pulsford if he did not say much now, for he does not know what will happen. The honorable senator may be hobbled or gagged by those with whom he is now associated. They have done that sort of thing before, and they will do it again. The Government have accepted the White Australia policy, in spite of all the opposition they offered to it in the past. At any rate, in their statement of policy, there is not a word about the repeal of any of the White Australia provisions. They are going to sit down and touch nothing. The probability is that they will carry out the policy in the way indicated by the Prime Minister when he declared that it did not matter what legislation was passed in regard to immigration restriction, or anything else of that kind, so long as he had the administration of it. They may work in underground tunnels, out of sight, and nothing may be made public. They may sit down, and, by their inaction, try to defeat the White Australia policy. If that is their intention the sooner we know it the better.

Senator DE LARGIE.—That is in accord with the "crawling" policy.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Yes; the White Australia policy will be crawled over, if they ever get a chance. That is the first item in the labour platform. Is there anything so socialistic in it that any one can object to? Is it objected to by any honorable senator, with the exception of Senators Pulsford and Gray, who, in this connexion, are not to be considered.

Senator GRAY.—Give us a trial.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator has been tried. All he wants is convicting. The next item in the Labour platform is compulsory conciliation and arbitration, and we have the Government declaring that they are going to take up Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, even preference to unionists in it. What Senator Fraser say to that?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Is the honorable senator content with the Bill as it stands?

Senator MCGREGOR.—No. The honorable senator will find that out when the Bill comes here. We are not going to be frightened by the statements of the Government that if we try to remodel the Bill we find ourselves in a difficult position—we may get no Bill at all. We would rather have no Bill at all than have a mangled out of shape by those that are opposed to it. What is the use of the Government or any honorable senator talking to me this way? We have had to face many difficulties in our time, and have won in the long run. We may have to wait six months or two years—it will be all the same to members of the "socialistic" party, as they are called—but in the end we will get a better Bill than the present Government prepared to give us. But what I was going to say was that they have accepted the Bill as it stands. They have accepted it in the provision relating to the railway servants and other provisions in it that they have declared themselves opposed to.

Senator PULSFORD.—But with a deal knocked out of it.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator was opposed to it in every shape and form, as were also other honorable senators on the opposite side.

Senator WALKER.—I shall vote against making it compulsory.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The very thing that these gentlemen are now prepared to accept it as it stands, is the clearest proof that any intelligent man or woman, that it is not less, so far as the objects it is intended to effect are concerned. They know that, and that is why they are prepared to accept it, even with the clause providing for preference to unionists. These are the items of so-called socialistic legislation that the Government have agreed to. They will swallow more; and they are capable of more than they will be able to swallow. However, I am being led off the track. The next item in the labour platform is old pensions. Is that socialistic?

Wales has an Old-age Pensions Act, and so has Victoria. I know of instances in which the administration of the Pensions Act has been a disgrace. Respectable men and women, who have lived industrious, honest, and decent lives, have been deprived of the benefits of the Act because they have had, perhaps, a worthless son or daughter roaming over some portion of Western Australia, or South Australia. Respectable men and women who have established a claim to pensions by what they have done in the past in the development of the resources of this country—who are aged and unable to work—have had them withheld, whilst persons who have been prepared to crawl and creep and to resort to the practices referred to by Mr. G. H. Reid at Warragul, have been able to get pensions. I say the old-age pension instituted by the Commonwealth should be one that every man and woman who has earned it should be able to claim as a right, and not as a dole or a bone thrown to a dog. The only qualification should be old age and residence in Australia. There is nothing socialistic in that, and I hope honorable senators will be prepared to assist in carrying the measure when it comes before the House. How many are against it I would not know. Very few; but these few are going to do all they possibly can to defeat it. The object of this "socialistic" programme is the nationalization of monopolies. We have carried resolutions in this Senate affirming the principle.

Senator DE LARCIE.—Two in one afternoon.

Senator MCGREGOR.—We have no intention of interfering with the industries that are being carried on by individuals. We have no intention of laying violent hands on the farmers. Even that has been suggested by the other side. They find fault with the Labour Party, and would bind them down to everything said by Mr. Tom Mann. On the same principle, we should have to judge them by the statements of Walpole, Bewickright, and Hogarth.

Senator MILLEN.—Do you repudiate Tom Mann's doctrines?

Senator MCGREGOR.—Certainly not. He is right in a good many things, but he has had very little fair play. Our friends opposite are all afraid of Tom Mann. It is due to the work of Tom Mann that the Labour Party have an increased representation in the Victorian Parliament to-day. A few men like him are needed, and we have them. We are seeing the results of their efforts, not only in Victoria, but also in South Australia, Queensland, and Western Australia. They do their work in daylight, and tell the people the truth. There is no "crawling policy" about their methods. Now, with respect to the nationalization of monopolies, if any business has become a monopoly to the detriment of the rest of the people of the Commonwealth, then it should be crushed, and the only way to crush it is to nationalize it. That is a statement which every patriot will, I think, accept. What we contend for has been done in other countries, and it will be done again.

Senator MILLEN.—Where is the iron industry nationalized?

Senator MCGREGOR.—The iron industry, like the Reid-McLean-Turner-Thomson-Symon-Drake Government policy, is not in existence yet.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Why has the honorable senator omitted the Minister of Defence? He has named all the rest. Why does he omit him?

Senator MCGREGOR.—I do not like to include every one at all times; but so far as the iron industry is concerned, every one knows its possibilities. It is not yet a monopoly, because the manufacture of iron from the ore is not an established industry. But we know what has happened elsewhere, and we should take precautions to prevent the same thing occurring here. I want to refer now to the statements made by the Prime Minister and others who go about the city declaiming against Socialism. They take their big dogs and tigers with them at all times. The Labour Party has never had an idea of dragging things down to that uniform level. Its members recognise that in the carrying on of a monopoly of that description the Deputy Postmaster-General is just as necessary as the boy who delivers the telegrams. We all know that the Deputy Postmaster-General receives higher remuneration than a telegraph boy or a postmaster. And we all recognise that the Deputy Postmaster-General is entitled to higher remuneration, not only by reason of the position which he occupies, but also by reason of the ability which he displays. What the Labour Party desire is not to drag the position of the Deputy Postmaster-General down to that of the postmaster, but to make it possible that a telegraph boy shall have an equal opportunity with every other telegraph boy of rising to the position of Deputy Postmaster-General. And as it is in that Department, so we wish it to be in the case of every other monopoly which may be taken over by the State. I have heard Senator Walker say in his place that our policy is to bring everything down to one dead level, and I have heard others express the same idea.

Senator GUTHRIE.—He knows different.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The honorable senator has been told different, and he ought to believe the statements of those who are advocating the policy of the Labour Party, and who, of course, know more about it than he does. We are also told by the Prime Minister that we are the puppets of somebody outside, that we have no independence, that we are bound by the decision of a caucus which sits in a cellar, or some place of that description. I wish to disabuse the mind of any man or woman in Australia of any such idea as that. The members of the Labour Party are the most independent persons in the Commonwealth. It is really those who are under the domination of the individualists who are not independent. Does any honorable senator think that there is a labour man who would sit at the table and occupy the position which Senator Drake fills?

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator did.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Yes, but I occupied the position honorably.

Senator CLEMONS.—Honorably?

Senator MCGREGOR.—I occupied the position as leader of the Senate.

Senator CLEMONS.—Why, the honorable senator is the man who was offering his party for sale in this chamber.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I intend to deal with that fiction.

Senator CLEMONS.—I heard the honorable senator say that he was for sale.

Senator MCGREGOR.—No.

Senator WALKER.—The honorable and learned senator heard Senator McGregor say that the Labour Party were for sale.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I shall tell Senator Clemons what I said, and he has only to look in Hansard to find my statement. I did not correct the report of my speech, like some honorable senators who cut out what they did say.

Senator CLEMONS.—Then the honorable senator is not for sale?

Senator MCGREGOR.—I shall repeat exactly what I did say. But with respect to this caucus-bound party and this machine which is going to ruin the country, the only grievance which honorable senators have is that they cannot get a machine of ours.

Senator MILLEN.—The Labour Party is a machine then?

Senator MCGREGOR.—Honorable senators on the other side cannot get a party. What are they doing at the present time? Poor unfortunate Mr. Deakin is like a rag, he is so miserable on account of contemptible action which he took quite recently.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable act

Senator MCGREGOR.—Why. Deakin is the most miserable individual in Australia.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator did not say that at the last elections.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I did not say that.

Senator DRAKE.—No; because many of the honorable senator's friends came to Parliament on his back.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I am sure I never got into Parliament on the back of Mr. Deakin, or anybody else.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator did not get into Parliament on his back at the last elections, but a great many of his friends did.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Not a single one of them did.

Senator O'KEEFE.—What about the friends of Mr. Deakin and Senator Drake? They got into Parliament through not being opposed by labour men.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I do not think that in the future many candidates will get into Parliament on his back.

Senator DRAKE.—The labour candidates will not get a chance.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I do not think they will. Mr. Deakin never did anything for the Labour Party, but they did a great deal for him. They kept him in a deal along with the honorable and learned senator.

Senator DRAKE.—We did too much for them.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The Labour Party kept Mr. Deakin in office along with Senator Drake for nearly three years. There was no talk at that time about Chinese politics, or caucus rule, or anything of that kind. No; we were fine fellows so long as they followed their lead. We thought in Mr. Deakin we were following a man who was going for the principles we were advocating. But when we find that he has notized, or deluded, or turned in some from the correct path, we can only advise him. And I despise the man who another House said that Mr. Higgins the only member of the late Government for whom he could express any respect.

Deakin made that remark, and then apologized to some of the other members. He has a right to apologize to me, because I never asked him for anything; I never asked him for anything, nor do I intend to do so. It was he who put up to Ballarat, and like Senator Clemons, declared that I said that the Labour Party was for sale, although he had been repeatedly told how that remark was to be made. How was it made? From my place here, I characterized the leader of the Government, the leader of the Opposition, who, at that time was, I think, Senator Gould—Senator Ewing, Senator Neild, and others, were present, and they were all leaders—persons round whom no planets revolved. I distinctly remember using those words. It was in that sense that I declared that the Labour Party was up for sale to the highest bidder. I spoke in a jocular sense, as those honorable senators knew. They have known all along that the Labour Party was never up for sale on any dishonorable sense.

Senator CLEMONS.—What, that you had never been sold dishonorably?

Senator MCGREGOR.—I cannot be sold dishonorably. I wish to give honorable senators a correct idea of this machine to see if they can copy it, as they are trying to get all the farmers' associations, property-owners' associations, and ladies' national associations to unite, and present a solid front to the socialistic party. Is it not that what they are trying to do? They are trying to create a machine which will knock out our machine, and their only regret is that they cannot do it. That is exactly the position.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator admits that the machine of the Labour Party is different from ours.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I am going to tell the honorable senator what our machine is.

Senator HENDERSON.—It is better than his.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Yes, it is a more perfect machine. It possesses the latest improvements.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is more rigid.

Senator HENDERSON.—It is the one on which Senator Millen tried to get into public life.

Senator MILLEN.—That is absolutely false.

The PRESIDENT.—Order. I must ask honorable senators not to hold conversations across the chamber.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I rise to order. Senator Millen has just stated that an observation made from this side of the Senate is absolutely false.

Senator MILLEN.—And I repeat it.

The PRESIDENT.—That observation ought not to have been made. No observation ought to be made except by the speaker.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It was made in reply to a statement by Senator Henderson.

The PRESIDENT.—Senator Henderson had no right to make the statement.

Senator HENDERSON.—I made no statement.

The PRESIDENT.—Senator McGregor is in possession of the Chair, and no one else has a right to say anything.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Do I understand you, sir, to say that an interjection of that kind—that a statement is utterly false—is in order?

The PRESIDENT.—No. What I say is that if honorable senators make interjections when somebody else is speaking they must take the consequences of their action. They are out of order in making such interjections. Senator Henderson had no right to interject, nor had Senator Millen any right to answer the interjection. I must ask honorable senators to allow the speaker to address the Chair, not to interject, and especially not to hold conversations as they are doing across the chamber.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I propose to indicate to honorable senators who are envious of the Labour Party's machine how they can avail themselves of it, and make use of it, if they only care to turn from their evil ways in a political sense, and get into the straight path, and abide by the principles by which every honest politician ought to abide. Any honorable senator can become a member of a trade union if he works at any calling, and then no one will call him a non-unionist, or a black-leg, or any name of that kind. He can then join a democratic association affiliated with the Labour Party, or any district committee connected with the Labour Party, by paying a shilling per week and get his ticket. That will give him the privilege of having a say in the formulation of the platform. The policy is not formulated by a Mr. Reid or a Mr. Deakin, and then presented to be swallowed by the people, but the people through their representatives agree to their policy. Every member of the Labour Party has, therefore, a say in the formulation of the labour platform. He has also as a member of the Labour Party, a right to be nominated as a candidate. If he accepts the nomination, and goes to the plebiscite, he has to sign a pledge. I am going to tell honorable senators what that pledge means, and ask if none of them has signed a similar pledge. Every candidate is asked to sign a pledge that he will abide by the platform of the Labour Party which he assisted to formulate, and to which he agreed, and if he is not chosen by his fellow labourites to run as a candidate at the election, he is not to contest a district which is contested by an accredited labour man. Is there anything dishonorable in signing that pledge? Has no honorable senator on the other side ever been asked to sign a pledge of that description? Has Senator Pulsford never received a circular from a blue ribbon association, and signed it, and returned it? Is there anything dishonorable in doing that? If the Free-trade Association ever sent a circular to any honorable senators, and asked them to sign it, and they did, was there anything dishonorable in that? No; but the dishonour would lie in their departing from the pledge afterwards. That is exactly the position which every member of the Labour Party occupies. Again, it is said, "Oh, but you have this obnoxious caucus. You are ruled by the caucus. You cannot do anything which the caucus does not indicate to you. If a majority of the caucus say that you are to go into the House and vote in a certain direction, you are bound to do it, whether you like it or not."

Senator GRAY.—Hear, hear.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I wish to tell the honorable senator that that is not correct.

Senator GRAY.—I am very glad to hear it.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I have already enumerated four of the planks of the Labour Party's platform, and there are only three others left for me to deal with.

Outside of those seven planks, no labour man is bound to anything in the caucus.

Senator GIVENS.—There is no caucus that can bind him.

Senator MCGREGOR.—No. Is it not right that the members of the Labour Party should be bound by the seven planks which they circulated by the thousand among the people at the elections, and for which they made themselves responsible? And that is all that the caucus can bind them to. Senator Pearce, Senator Henderson, or any other member of our party, can tell the Senate that when any question outside the party's programme is brought up for discussion in caucus, if any member objects to that discussion, he can stop it. If, for purposes of enlightening each other, the discussion is carried on, and if it is thought necessary to go to a vote, no such vote will bind any member of the party in the caucus on that question. Is it surprising to honorable senators opposite to hear that statement? Yet, it is the absolute truth. No member of the party is bound with respect to any question outside the platform of the party, and no member is asked to bind himself on any such question. I believe, however, that in New South Wales it has been the custom in the past, where the fate of a Government was involved, for a caucus decision to be binding on the whole of the party.

Senator GRAY.—And with respect to other questions.

Senator MCGREGOR.—No; only with respect to their platform. Outside the platform, I repeat, the only question on which a decision of the majority was binding, was a question affecting the fate of a Government.

Senator MILLEN.—Is not the honorable senator slightly incorrect? Was it not within the power of a parliamentary leader of the Labour Party to call a caucus at any time he chose, in order to consider the attitude of the party?

Senator MCGREGOR.—No.

Senator MILLEN.—I think the honorable senator is incorrect.

Senator MCGREGOR.—That may have been the case in the New South Wales Labour Party, but, such a rule does not exist in connexion with the Federal Labour Party. I am stating things as they really are. Those members of Parliament who go into the country—whether they be Senator Dobson, or Mr. George Reid, or Mr. Alfred Deakin—and say anything to the contrary, are misrepresenting the Labour Party; and when they are told what I have told them, and continue to make those statements, they are knowingly misrepresenting the Labour Party. My testimony can be borne out by every member of our party who is present. I have shown that none of the calamities predicted by Senator Walker or Senator Dobson, with respect to bringing down society to a dead-level of mediocrity, are well-founded. That term is often used with respect to the policy of the Labour Party. If one looks at both sides in either House of the Federal Parliament, or any other Australian Parliament, and considers where the mediocrity is to be found, he will be satisfied that the policy of the Labour Party has not a tendency in that direction. The next plank in the platform of the Labour Party that is condemned as being so socialistic that no body can follow it, and with respect to which some persons are trying to frighten the country, is that of a Citizen Defence Force. But to that policy we in the Senate have all agreed. I am not going to argue it. The present Government agreed to it, and consequently they are in just the same boat as we are. The next plank is the prevention of borrowing. Is there any one who is prepared to encourage the policy of borrowing? Senator Drake, who was a member of the first Federal Government, and Mr. Deakin, went up to Ballarat, and tried to make the people there believe that the Deakin and Barton Governments were opposed to borrowing. They made that statement deliberately. But is it not a well-known fact that a Bill was introduced by the Barton Government for the purpose of borrowing £500,000, and was it not in consequence of the action of the Labour Party and other Liberal members that that was prevented? The prevention of borrowing, therefore, is also a plank of the platform of the Labour Party that is approved by both Houses of Parliament, and which is recognised as right by nearly every man and woman in Australia. The next plank is navigation and shipping. The present Government have accepted the Royal Commission that was appointed by the late Government to inquire into that subject. That is the policy of the Labour Party from beginning to end.

Senator Lt.-Col. GOULD.—In New South Wales they were the party which ran the country into debt.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Good gracious! I am explaining the policy of the Federal Labour Party. That is my whole intention. I ask the Senate and the country whether there is anything unduly socialistic in that policy? Is there anything in it that would not be agreed to by a majority of honorable senators, and by a majority of representatives in another place? If that be so, what is all the noise about? Why is it necessary to bring in another Government? I have now explained the whole policy of the Labour Party, and have offered several criticisms of my own, which have arisen out of interjections. I will now proceed to deal with some of the anomalies in the policy of the present Government, which has adopted, or pillaged, or acquired—whichever term may be used—the policy of the late Government.

Senator DAWSON.—“Commandeered” is the term.

Senator MCGREGOR.—That, no doubt, is what Senator Walker would call it. I shall deal with one or two items to show the anomalous position which some of the members of the Government occupy. In the Senate yesterday the Attorney-General referred, in that sinking manner which he adopted—because he was sinking everything yesterday; I hope he will rouse himself; he does more credit to himself when he is fighting than when he is whining—to the question of preferential trade. Much has been said lately with regard to preferential trade. We have heard Senator Symon express patriotic sentiments with respect to the old country. But, in the name of heaven, what preference can he or Mr. George Reid give to the old country if they remain consistent to the programme and platform which they have advocated for years past? For twenty years or more Senator Symon has declared that every country should be placed on the same footing with respect to our trade, and that the productions of every country should be admitted free.

Senator WALKER.—Hear, hear.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Then what right have honorable senators opposite to talk of preferential trade?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Is that the fiscal policy of the honorable senator's party?

Senator MCGREGOR.—What is the fiscal policy of the present Government?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—What is fiscal policy of the alliance?

Senator GIVENS.—Their policy is to “chuck” the Reid Government out.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The fiscal policy of the alliance—

Senator CLEMONS.—Is fiscal humbug.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Will be made public as soon as there is any necessity for it.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is public.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Oh, no.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does the honorable senator repudiate this agreement?

Senator MCGREGOR.—I am not discussing the agreement.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—He is rather ashamed of it now.

Senator MCGREGOR.—No; we have no reason to be ashamed of it. But honorable senators opposite are afraid of it. The supporters of the Government looked rather sheepish yesterday when they learnt that the agreement had been arrived at. Some of them, I hear, nearly had convulsions.

Senator WALKER.—Of laughter!

Senator MCGREGOR.—The question of preferential trade, in the mouth of Senator Symon or Senator Pulsford, or the Right Honorable George Reid, is mockery. They cannot give any preference to anybody, unless they are going to be submerged or merged, or swallowed by McLean-Turner, and Co., or unless they are going to swallow their own principles and adopt some differential or preferential system of dealing with imports from the old country, and other countries. Mr. Reid, Senator Symon, and their free-trade supporters, can offer to Great Britain nothing but their loyalty, and that is not worth very much. It has never been worth much to Great Britain. But when the time comes, and there is a necessity for it, I have no doubt that the Labour Party will prove, as it has always proved in the past, and always will prove, that it can give expression not only to loyal sentiments, but to loyal performances as far as the old country is concerned.

Senator WALKER.—Who were the pro-Boer party?

Senator GIVENS.—Who were the pro-Chow party?

Senator MCGREGOR.—We do not intend to be misled as honorable senators opposite were when they agreed to help the Jews in South Africa, and sacrificed the blood and the wealth of the people of Australia to put money into the pockets of the Rand Lords at the expense of this country.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Do not go back to that subject.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Perhaps the honorable and learned senator does not like to hear it?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator should talk about Manchuria or something recent.

Senator MCGREGOR.—If the leader of the Senate would endeavour to induce his "submerged tenth" to control themselves, and not to make interjections which take me off the track, I should not refer to such questions as the South African scandals. But we as a party are prepared, as I have already said, when the proper time comes, to give due and earnest consideration to anything respecting our trade relationships with the old country. But it is a mockery for Senator Symon or any of the free-traders opposite to talk of preferential trade.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Why? Let the honorable senator give us a reason.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Is Senator Symon prepared to denounce his fiscal faith? Has this coalition had such an effect already upon him that he is to denounce the belief which he has held for so many years?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Why cannot we give a preference to Great Britain?

Senator GIVENS.—Because the honorable and learned senator does not believe in duties on any goods.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We have duties now; why cannot we reduce, or remit some of them?

Senator MCGREGOR.—It is of no use to talk to some of these gentlemen. One could not nail them down with flooring brads! Now I am coming to another little anomaly. I do not know why this matter of policy was taken over by the Government when we consider the attitude of honorable senators opposite towards the preceding Government in relation to it. I refer to the survey of the Western Australian railway.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Was that part of the honorable senator's policy?

Senator MCGREGOR.—They called it the "desert" railway, and many other hard names.

Senator CLEMONS.—Was the honorable Senator's Government going to support it?

Senator MCGREGOR.—Certainly. I always declared that I was in favour of it. During my election campaign I was not afraid to refer to the subject, and I did so in every portion of my State. But the gentlemen who went against it, and who were so cowardly in relation to it, went down.

Senator PULSFORD.—What about Senator Styles?

Senator MCGREGOR. — Senator Styles was in Victoria. I am referring to South Australia. I shall have a word or two more to say about South Australia before I finish. I want to ask the leader of the Senate whether he meant me yesterday to understand that Mr. McLean, as a member of the present Government, has a free hand on this question.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—No, the honorable senator is not to understand that.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I am very sorry, because I thought that that was what the honorable and learned senator said.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator must take my words as they were uttered.

Senator MCGREGOR.—What the honorable and learned senator said was in reply to an interjection by Senator Styles respecting Mr. McLean, who has always been a bitter opponent of this Western Australia railway scheme. And the Attorney-General himself has always been opposed to this railway.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is not the case.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I hope we are not going to have a "Yes-No" policy in both Houses, because Australia would hardly be able to bear such a load. The honorable and learned senator said yesterday that although the Government were prepared to spend £20,000 on a survey, they were not going to be pledged to afterwards carry out the work.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I did not say that.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Oh dear! I am afraid I shall have to be examined by a medical man in order to ascertain whether I am not a fit subject for a lunatic asylum, or some other institution where worn-out politicians can find rest when their memories are beginning to go. I distinctly understood the honorable and learned senator to say—

Senator PULSFORD.—Ah!

Senator MCGREGOR.—Well, will the honorable and learned senator give me a reply now? Is the leader of the Senate prepared to commit the Commonwealth to an expense of £20,000 for a survey, and then to refuse to afterwards support the construction of the railway.

Senator MILLEN.—Let us hear what the result of the survey is.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Why should not a Royal Commission be appointed?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Royal Commission is intended for the Tariff.

Senator MCGREGOR.—It seems impossible to pin the Government down to anything. "Yes-No" has been so ingrafted in the political constitution of every one of the Ministry that they cannot get rid of its influence. Am I to understand that the present Government are willing to spend £20,000 on a survey, while having perfectly open minds as to the necessity of the construction of the line afterwards? What would Sir John Forrest say to a position of that character?

Senator CLEMONS.—Surely the honorable senator would not build a railway without having a survey?

Senator MCGREGOR.—Certainly not.

Senator CLEMONS.—Then why object to a survey?

Senator MCGREGOR.—I do not object to a survey. We know that a survey is quite a different matter from an inquiry. Senator Styles, who knows something about railways, will agree with me that a survey is one of the processes of construction. In such matters the first process is a preliminary or flying survey, and then a survey is made with the intention of constructing the line, the cost of the survey being generally considered as part of the cost of construction.

Senator STYLES.—Hear, hear!

Senator MCGREGOR.—I know that Senator Styles will agree with me in that, whether he favours or does not favour the construction of the line. Senator Styles does not agree that there ought to be a survey made, but that is because he does not agree with the construction of the line, whereas I do favour the survey, because I have always advocated this transcontinental railway. Will the Attorney-General be honest enough to say that the Government will spend £20,000 on a survey, and then advocate the construction of the line? We know that the Attorney-General will say "Yes" as to a survey, but he desires to have a loophole in the near future, so as to be able to say "No" as to the construction, thus carrying the "Yes-No" policy to its legitimate issue. There are a great many other points which might be considered in connexion with the alleged policy of the Government, but, as I have already pointed out, the present Administration are willing to sink everything—the fiscal question, the electoral boundaries question, and the transcontinental railway question. They take up the latter question tentatively only to gain support from a few Western Australian members. I urge the Western Australian members, not only in the Senate, but in another place, to beware of men who are prepared to say "Yes-No" in the way which has been manifested to us during the past few days. The Attorney-General will not give me a decided answer; but I contend that if we spend £20,000 on a survey we should be prepared to go on with the construction of the line. If we are not prepared to construct the line, let us save this £20,000 to the people of Australia, though I know that the line must ultimately be provided, and will be for the benefit of the Commonwealth. The policy of the present Government is exactly that advocated by the Ministry to which I belonged; the only difference is that the policy is not now advocated with the same earnestness or honesty. In my opinion Senator Symon yesterday showed to greater disadvantage than he has on any other occasion. Honorable senators, I have no doubt, could bear testimony that the Attorney-General, I was going to say, conducted himself in a manner that hardly did credit to his ability, and the position he occupies in the legal profession. However that may be, we have had the policy of the Government delivered, and that policy will be carried into effect if the Government can possibly do it. Up to the present, however, the only object which the Government have made manifest to the people of Australia is either that they want to "knock out" the Labour Party, or merely want to get into office themselves. They may contend that the Labour Party have been conducting themselves in a manner injurious to the country; but I contend that the party to which I belong have proved their ability to carry on the government of the country just as effectively as has any other section of Parliament. Indeed, the great danger to the other side was that if the Labour Party were allowed to remain in office for long the people of Australia would begin to realize that they were a proper people to govern. To-day the official organ of the Government, the Argus, threatens the Labour Party with a dissolution. We are told that if the Opposition do not allow the business of the country to be carried on in an expeditious manner the result will be a dissolution. But how, in the name of heaven, can the fear of a dissolution be charged against any member of the Labour Party, either here or in another place? The Labour Party have already desired a dissolution, so that it is difficult to see how they can be afraid of such a contingency.

Senator McGregor.

Senator DAWSON.—We have to remember the Queensland elections.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The Queensland elections have put the fear of death into a great many people, but I am afraid there will have to be many similar exhibitions of the power of the Labour Party before those who differ from us cease annoying a section of the community, whose only aspiration and object is the welfare of the country. The Labour Party have no selfish motive to serve. They have no other business to occupy them—there is nothing to induce them to stay away from the work of Parliament. They come here and do their duty, with nothing to distract their attention; and the same cannot be said of every other section of Parliament. It is surely time the people of Australia realized the fact that if they want the country governed well, the government must be carried on by men whose best interests are bound up in the welfare of the country. We have a member of another place by name of Grat-tan Wilson, who, speaking in the southern portion of Victoria, expressed the opinion that those we want in Parliament are men who have given evidence of their ability to carry on their own business—men who have made names for themselves in the commercial world. It almost makes me shiver when my memory turns over the history of Victoria. The late Robert Reid was a commercial magnate, and other business men in the public life of Victoria are Mr. McKenzie, Mr. Taverner, Sir Alexander Peacock, and Mr. Webb, the last-mentioned of whom gave evidence before the Butter Commission the other day. These were commercial men of high standing. Do we want a few more Webbs, Taverners, McKenzies, Woods, Dunns, Bartarms, and Hopes in our public life? The people of Australia are sick of such men, and are getting more disgusted every day, and the result is that the Labour Party will have more successes in Queensland, Western Australia, and other portions of the Commonwealth. The people are filled with disgust at the dishonesty practised by the commercialists we hear so much about.

When they send their Walpoles, Sievwrights and Hogarths, round the country—

Senator PEARCE.—Do not forget Senator Dobson.

Senator MCGREGOR. — I do not put Senator Dobson in the same category ; those men are listened to, while Senator Dobson is laughed at. In a very short time, however, the eyes of the people of Australia will be opened, and these men will be no longer listened to. It will be the Tom Manns and gentlemen of that description who go out with the gospel of truth, who will gain the ear of the people. And when people's minds are enlightend, and they come to realize the position they occupy with regard to the governing classes, they will send to Parliament men in whom they have confidence ; and I am sure the result will be beneficial to the whole community.

Senator WALKER (New South Wales). —I am sure that we have all listened to Senator McGregor with a great deal of pleasure and amusement. I must thank him for his courteous references to myself. I have already said that I am an independent supporter of the present Government. I have heard Senator McGregor say that none of us are prepared to oppose the compulsory provisions of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. It is my intention to oppose them.

Senator GIVENS.—Will you support the Government ?

Senator WALKER.—I will support them as far as I agree with them. I am pleased that the Government intend to work as far as possible in harmony with the States. I have already said in this chamber that if we have an Old Age Pensions scheme it should be a scheme for the whole Commonwealth. Under the New South Wales Act, deserving persons who have been over twenty years in Australia, but yet have not been continuously resident in New South Wales, have been refused pensions. That was an injustice, but such cases could only be met by a Commonwealth measure. Therefore, an Old-age Pensions scheme to be satisfactory must cover the whole of the Commonwealth, and not be applicable only to particular States.

Senator GIVENS.—Do you believe there ought to be old-age pensions ?

Senator WALKER.—I am inclined to think there should be.

Senator HIGGS.—But are you aware that the scheme will reduce the bank dividends ?

Senator WALKER. — The honorable senator seems to know a great deal more about some things than the rest of us.

Senator DAWSON.—Is the honorable senator aware that that is one of the planks in the platform of the new union ?

Senator WALKER.—I am aware that those of us who are not unionists have greater freedom than our friends who are.

Senator GIVENS.—Are not the free-traders in union with the protectionists ?

Senator WALKER.—No ; we have sunk the fiscal issue. Some reference has been made to immigration. We have no control over land legislation ; but there is a vast area available for settlement in the Northern Territory of South Australia, and I hope that some system of assisted immigration will be adopted. That Northern Territory has never had justice done to it, and I am told by Senator Playford that it is capable of supporting a very large number of agriculturists. But they will require to have inducements to settle in the country. With regard to fiscal matters, we must try to remember that it has been said on very high authority, "Blessed are the peacemakers." We wish to see peace prevail, that the country may progress and prosper. I cannot understand my free-trade friends opposite entering into coalition with the so-called Liberal-Protectionists.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Can you understand the other coalition ?

Senator WALKER.—Our party sink the fiscal issue. With respect to the High Commissioner the proposal of the Government is highly commendable. They intend to confer with the States, and to consult their interests. In that way it is hoped that a large expense will be saved. And in this connexion I am glad to notice that the Premier of New South Wales is agreeable that the High Commissioner shall take up as many as possible of the duties which now devolve upon the Agents-General.

Senator DAWSON.—Do you mean that the Agent-General for each State should be abolished ?

Senator WALKER.—I think that all communications might go through the High Commissioner. He would practically be a joint Agent-General. The States might have their own commercial representatives.

Senator PEARCE.—What do you think of Mr. Taverner's idea of raising money by means of half-guinea tickets, admitting invited guests to an entertainment.

Senator WALKER.—I certainly think that my friend Senator Pearce would be much better here supporting the Coalition Government than where he is. Senator McGregor has referred to Mr. McLean and to Mr. Reid as the "twin" Premiers.

Senator DAWSON.—It is very seldom that twins live.

Senator WALKER.—I happen to have twin sons of twenty-three years of age, who are both alive. I think Senator McGregor was too severe on the Vice-President of the Executive Council. The first duty of the Minister is to act as Vice-President of the Executive Council, and I am certainly very pleased to see Senator Drake in so honorable a position. He is a man of modest habits. He is one of those who believe that "Blessed are the meek," and he has exhibited that quality.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Do not hurt his feelings more.

Senator WALKER.—I think it is a virtue. I wish we had more of it. I look on my honorable friends opposite as the Australian Tory Party. They are a socialistic party, and their Socialism is of the very essence of Toryism. We have had it abundantly exemplified by Mr. Tom Mann.

Senator FINDLEY.—He is doing immense good.

Senator WALKER.—He is a demagogue; and if there is a dissolution the Labour Party will come back very much weakened. I have heard that the Labour Party supported both the Barton and the Deakin Governments, not from any admiration of them as individuals, but for what they could get out of them. That was sheer selfishness. Now, with regard to the Western Australian railway, I have always been an advocate of it. I spoke of it in days gone by. I thought then that we should have a railway running from one end of the continent to the other, and I even took the view that it might be paid for by land grants.

Senator FINDLEY.—Or land taxes.

Senator WALKER.—I recently read in a Sydney paper that some wiseacre in Victoria had discovered a remarkable resemblance between Mr. Reid and Svengali, and had represented Mr. Deakin as Trilby. There may be truth in that; but I have a copy of a letter in my hand from a gentleman who has discovered that we have here a modern adaptation of the play of Othello.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Who is Desdemona?

Senator WALKER.—This gentleman finds that Mr. Deakin is Othello, that Sir William Lyne is Iago, and that Mr. Reid is the gentle Desdemona. So that on one side we have Mr. Reid compared to Svengali, while on the other side he is likened to the gentle Desdemona. That is a "Yes-No" position, if you like. I shall not further occupy the time of the Senate. I have not departed from my free-trade principles, and have no intention of doing so. I shall oppose compulsory arbitration, and I think honorable senators will find me consistent in the votes I give.

Senator MILLEN (New South Wales).—I do not propose to take up much of the time of the Senate, but I should like to make a few observations on the remarks of the leader of the Opposition. In doing so I shall endeavour to avoid the extremely regrettable tone he adopted. With the previous speaker, I deplore his references to the Vice-President of the Executive Council. There is no rule, either in the Federal or the States Parliaments, which would necessarily make the Vice-President of the Executive Council the leader of the Upper House. There is no honorable gentleman who would not be proud to serve under the leadership of Senator Symon, and there was no other position which Senator Drake could take.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Could he not have been Attorney-General, as he was before?

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator forces me to institute a personal comparison, which I did not desire to do. He has admitted that the natural leader was Senator Symon, under whom any honorable senator would be proud to serve. I wish to pass on to the observation of Senator McGregor dealing with the policy of the Government. I was struck in listening to his wholesale denunciations, by the strange mixture of questionable sincerity and extravagant modesty which marked them. If this is the programme of the two last Governments, the charge must reflect on his own party. He says that the Government have stolen their policy.

Senator MCGREGOR.—They are not sincere.

Senator MILLEN.—I resent the arrogance of the members of the Labour Party, who, on the public platform, and in every public discussion, claim that they alone possess the virtues of truth and rectitude. I am going to test them. But I must go back. I was referring to the contradiction in the attitude of honorable senators opposite to the programme of the Government. His criticisms on the coalition came rather strangely from a gentleman who is a member of a party which has entered into an alliance of another kind. I hardly know what name to give it. I can only describe it as the Isaacs-Watson-Lyne-Mauger combination. But there it is, and it points to the fact that two other sections in politics have found it necessary, in order to serve purposes they have in common, to agree to joint action.

Senator GIVENS.—We have not been diametrically opposed to each other.

Senator MILLEN.—Has not Senator Pearce been diametrically opposed to Mr. Mauger.

Senator PEARCE.—Only on one question. Are Senator Drake and the honorable senator in agreement on the kanaka question, now?

Senator MILLEN.—Is the honorable senator in agreement with Sir William Lyne on every question now?

Senator PEARCE.—I am in agreement with him on that question, at any rate.

Senator MILLEN.—I understand that the honorable senator is in agreement with Sir William Lyne on certain questions, and I submit that every honorable senator who supports the Government is equally in agreement with the principles which they are prepared to support. I am not swallowing the whole of the programme of this Government. I do not suppose that the Government would insult me by telling me that they expect me to accept the whole programme, but I hold that every man in public life—either here or in the other House—is called upon to take the programmes of the two parties, and the two different lines of administration, not in detail, but in the whole, and say which of them represents most clearly that line of public conduct which he thinks he ought to support.

Senator PEARCE.—I do not object to the coalition; I am rather pleased that it has been brought about.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator takes a strange way to show his pleasure. I am also glad that these scattered remnants have come together, because I think that the sooner we get to a straight-out fight, not only in the Parliament, but before the constituencies, between the Socialistic Party and the party which stands for a measure of individual liberty, the better it will be for the purification of public life.

Senator GIVENS.—The liberty which the honorable senator is in favour of is the liberty to starve.

Senator MILLEN.—I have no time to answer an interjection of that character. It is utterly absurd to say that any one here wishes any person to starve. But may I ask how the honorable senator proposes to feed the people? Is it by a fiscal law? And, if it is, will Senator Pearce agree with that view? However, I do not wish to be drawn off in that way. I desire to ask the Labour Party if Senator McGregor has stated the whole of their programme?

Senator MCGREGOR.—Yes, every bit of it.

Senator MILLEN.—Is the final goal of the Labour Party—its ideals and aspirations—summed up in that milk-and-water programme which the honorable senator has outlined this afternoon?

Senator MCGREGOR. — No; that is our programme for this Parliament.

Senator MILLEN.—I take that reply to mean that once the Labour Party is placed in a position of power, and has carried out the legislation which is now offered to us, it has in reserve a larger instalment of what its leader here is pleased to call progressive measures? I am not quarrelling with the members of the Labour Party for entertaining these views, but I wish to see clearly before me exactly what road I am asked to travel. I think that honorable senators who come here with this modest innocently phrased programme ought in all fairness to tell, not only me but every elector in the Commonwealth, exactly where they intend to go, what their ultimate goal is. Have they done so to-day?

Senator MCGREGOR.—That is right. We know no more at present.

Senator MILLEN.—From his public utterances and those of his colleagues, I can tell the honorable senator where he is going. There is one member of the Labour Party here who has never refrained, by interjection and otherwise, from stating with the utmost candour what his aspirations are, and that is Senator FINDLEY.

Senator FINDLEY.—Hear, hear. We are on the road to Beulah!

Senator MILLEN.—So far as I am aware, the honorable senator has never minced his words in stating what his aspirations are. What I understand as really the aspiration of the Labour Party is the control of collective industry by the State. Is there a line in this modest programme to suggest that if power be placed in their hands they ultimately intend to lead us into a state in which not a few monopolies, but all the industries are to be controlled by the Government? So far as the programme outlined by the late Government is concerned, it contained very little to which I think any honorable senator would object. But when I know, as honorable senators cannot deny, that their intention, if they once acquire permanent power, is to hurry us not merely from this little instalment of legislation, but to a condition in which all industry is to be controlled by the State, then I submit that it is time for me, as far as I can, by my individual vote, to prevent them from getting into a position which would enable them to give effect to that policy.

Senator HIGGS.—But the honorable senator knows that they would have to ask the people first, and that they would appeal to them.

Senator MILLEN.—Of course they would appeal to the people, but does the honorable senator think that I am so innocent of political ways as not to know that the longer they were in power the more they would strengthen their position? For that very reason I am not going to place those who hold views, which I regard as injurious to the country, in a position to give greater effect to them. What battle, political, or otherwise, could be fought in that way?

Senator PEARCE.—None.

Senator MILLEN.—That reply is a complete answer to the interjection.

Senator PEARCE.—We could only do it with the good will of the people.

Senator MILLEN.—From the interjections which have been made during my speech, I think I am justified in affirming that the programme now put forward by the Labour Party is a two-faced one—the face presented to us is this modest programme, but the other face held up to members of labour leagues and to unions, to the great mass of those who support the Labour Party is a long line of socialistic measures, which are promised if only they can obtain power.

Senator PEARCE.—No; we were elected on those seven planks.

Senator MILLEN.—Yes; but the honorable senator admits that that is not the final goal of the Labour Party. Does not every issue of their journal, does not every utterance of their public men, point to the fact that their aspiration is Socialism? And if that is so, why do they deny it?

Senator PEARCE.—We do not deny it.

Senator MILLEN.—That is a candid and honest statement. The honorable senator does not deny that the ultimate aspiration of the Labour Party is Socialism. I should regard a socialistic State, in which enterprise, industry, and production are to be under the control of the Government, as not only a disaster in itself, but as bound to end in national ruin.

Senator FINDLEY.—It does not do that in New South Wales, where the Government run clothing factories, railways, and other things.

Senator MILLEN.—That being so, I cannot understand why the Labour Party should get angry when it is suggested that they are a socialistic party.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Not at all.

Senator MILLEN.—When I make this affirmation they fall back on the seven planks. I ask them again whether those seven planks represent the cause of the being of the Labour Party, or whether, as has been admitted by one of them, their ultimate object is Socialism.

Senator PEARCE.—For this Parliament the seven planks.

Senator MILLEN.—And when the time is opportune, Socialism.

Senator DAWSON.—Cannot the honorable senator understand that there are two programmes?

Senator MILLEN.—I have just said that there are two programmes—one for the Senate, and one for the people.

Senator DAWSON.—No. One is immediate, and the other is ultimate. We have taken the public into our confidence about the ultimate goal of the party.

Senator MILLEN.—I think that the honorable senator is not doing himself full justice. I believe that the Labour Party took the people further into their confidence than that, and that they obtained a very large number of votes on a promise that when they secured power they would bring in a larger instalment of socialistic legislation than is contained in this programme.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator has no warrant for that statement.

Senator GIVENS.—The people approved of our policy.

Senator MILLEN.—If the people approved of it, there is nothing more to be said, but it is not contained in this programme. It is my duty to oppose a policy which I consider would be disastrous.

Senator PEARCE.—We are not misleading the people.

Senator MILLEN.—No, but the Labour Party are trying to mislead us.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator said that we are keeping one face away from the people.

Senator MILLEN.—I wish to point out one or two differences between the programme of the present Government and that of the last Ministry. Senator McGregor spoke about the Immigration Restriction Act, and said that, notwithstanding all the denunciations with reference to the Stelling case, there was no word of repealing that legislation. That is quite true, but, so far as I am concerned, the denunciations with reference to that case had nothing to do with the Act, but with the administration of its provisions. If, under this or any other Government, a similar public scandal happened, I should take up an exactly similar attitude. The man was set at liberty, and nothing more was done with him. No stronger proof that a wrong had been done could be had than the fact that the prison doors were thrown open before the sentence was served, and the man was allowed to go free. That is the only remark I desire to make on that point.

Senator PEARCE.—How about the six hatters? Has the honorable senator parted with them?

Senator MILLEN.—No. Surely the honorable senator does not want me to deal with all these public scandals. I do not wish to discuss now the case of the six hatters, or the way in which labour members got hold of their papers.

Senator DAWSON.—I rise to order. The honorable senator has made a suggestion about the way in which members of the Labour Party got hold of certain papers, and I wish to know if the insinuation is in order.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not understand what the insinuation is.

Senator MILLEN.—I may set the matter at rest by saying that I did not refer to members of the Labour Party, but to members of labour organizations.

Senator DAWSON.—Will the honorable senator give the names?

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator knows perfectly well the names of the men who got possession of the papers and communicated with the public office.

Senator DAWSON.—I do not, and the honorable senator has no right to make an insinuation of that sort.

Senator MILLEN.—It is not an insinuation, but an affirmation.

Senator DAWSON.—Will the honorable senator name the persons whom he accuses of doing this thing?

Senator MILLEN.—Not even to oblige the honorable senator, who knows perfectly well that the papers were obtained and held by some officials of the union.

Senator DAWSON.—I do not know anything of the kind.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator is less informed than I thought he was. Senator McGregor would have us believe that, inasmuch as the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill of the late Government has been adopted by the present Government, there is no difference of programme in that regard. But the fact that the late Government went out on an amendment which was moved to that Bill shows at once that there is a vital difference in programme between the two parties. The late Government made that difference between the two parties vital; they accepted it as their battle ground.

Senator PEARCE.—They did not accept the question of recommitment as their battle ground.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator knows that that was done in order to have only one fight instead of two. Having made the question of preference to unionists vital, the members of the late Government cannot turn round now, and say that there is no difference between their measure and that of the present Government. The nationalization of monopolies is another plank in the platform of the Labour Party. I should like to know what it means. I should have been better pleased if Senator McGregor, instead of affirming that no honorable senator would object to the nationalization of a monopoly had stated in detail what it is that his party wants. Honorable senators are well aware that the Senate has been invited and has carried resolutions affirming the desirability of having a national tobacco monopoly. I am utterly opposed to the proposal, for I can conceive of no monopoly in an industry of that kind. Then we have had the nationalization of the iron industry advocated.

Senator PEARCE.—Does not the honorable senator think that there is a monopoly in the tobacco industry?

Senator MILLEN.—If there is, I do not think that the Labour Party will improve matters by handing over the industry to the Government.

Senator FINDLEY.—It has been done in France.

Senator MILLEN.—If the honorable senator were there he would give up smoking for the rest of his life.

Senator FINDLEY.—The French people do not give up smoking.

Senator MILLEN.—This innocent-looking phrase—nationalization of monopolies—covers the chief objection which I have to the policy of my honorable friends opposite. They stand for collective effort—for Socialism, for State control—while I stand for individual liberty. That marks a broad line of cleavage between us.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator stands for the butter agents, whereas we stand for Government action.

Senator MILLEN.—The honorable senator does not believe that for a moment; but if he does believe it, let me give an instance of absolute waste and corruption under Government management. Take the state of things existing in Russia. There we have something near to Socialism in the sense that in Russia the State does nearly everything.

Senator FINDLEY.—I thought that was despotism.

Senator MILLEN.—But you may have a despotic state of Socialism as well as a democratic state of Socialism. Honorable senators opposite surely do not mean to say that it is impossible to have a condition of corruption under Socialism. Corruption does not depend upon whether a State is individualistic or socialistic, but upon whether the administration of the Government is pure. I was about to draw attention to a remarkable omission from the programme of the Labour Party, as laid down by Senator McGregor, and which marks another point of difference between myself and his party. It is strange that in explaining that programme the honorable senator made no allusion to the plank which has reference to the Banking Bill. That is another point upon which I fall out with honorable senators opposite. I decline to support any legislation that is in the nature of an enforced loan from private individuals. I expected that the late Vice-President of the Executive Council would explain the attitude of his party towards that portion of their policy, but he dropped it out of sight, probably finding it most convenient to do so. The honorable senator glanced away from another point in the programme of his party when he spoke of the Navigation Bill. He tried to make it appear that because the present Government have approved of the Royal Commission that has been appointed, therefore the policy of the late Government and that of the present Government were in common in that respect. I do not know that the present Government has made a declaration of policy regarding the Navigation Bill; but the fact that they have not adopted the policy which I know to have been espoused by members of the Labour Party furnishes me with another reason why, until the present Government have declared their policy on that subject, I am bound to take my place on this side of the chamber.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable senator mean to say that the present Government has no policy on the Navigation Bill?

Senator MILLEN.—So far as I am aware, the only declaration of policy which has been made by the Government is that they will await the result of the Royal Commission before dealing with the subject. But that statement cannot be interpreted as meaning an acceptance by the Government of the policy of its predecessors.

Senator DAWSON.—Surely that is an adoption of the method of the last Government?

Senator MILLEN.—The present Government is pursuing the inquiry that the late Government inaugurated, but has not announced its policy. The late Government announced its policy with regard to certain clauses of the Bill, but the present Government has not done so.

Senator DAWSON.—Because they have no policy.

Senator MILLEN.—Probably the report of the Royal Commission may help them to frame one. I now come to the question of the caucus. Senator McGregor has affirmed that really there is no difference between the caucus—the name by which the meetings of the Labour Party are known—and the ordinary meetings of any other political party in this country. I admit at once that he made out a very good case from his point of view. But he spoilt it by another remark. While affirming that there was no difference between the caucus of the Labour Party and the ordinary meetings of any other political party, he also said, “The only thing that is troubling other parties is that they cannot imitate it.” If we have the same system as his party has, we need not be troubled because we cannot imitate it. If it be true that we are troubled because we cannot imitate the caucus of the Labour Party, Senator McGregor showed at once that there is a marked difference between our methods and the methods which we cannot imitate. There is another point. There is a difference—let honorable members opposite deny it as much as they will—between the methods of the Labour Party and the methods of other parties at their ordinary meetings.

Senator MCGREGOR.—The other parties are trying to imitate our methods, and cannot.

Senator MILLEN.—I sincerely hope that the party to which I belong, if it does make an effort to introduce into this country machine politics, will absolutely fail. From what we know of the machine, as it exists in America, I trust that no other party will succeed in introducing it.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Is not the machine in America controlled by a one-man boss?

Senator MILLEN.—Yes; and the honorable member's party is rapidly leading to that position. I do not blame the man who controls the machine, when, having a fibrous intellect, he comes along and makes himself master of his party. It is the system that I find fault with. That is what has always happened in political affairs when the machine has been established. I have spoken longer than I intended to do, led on by a fire of interjections. I desire to say only a word or two in conclusion. Senator McGregor has contended that there is virtually no difference between the policy of his party and that of the present Government. I have risen to show as far as I can what to my mind makes the broad difference between honorable members on the one side and on the other. That difference is that on the one side there is a distinct desire to advance steadily in a direction the goal of which must be Socialism; whereas, on the side upon which I take my stand there is a belief that only by means of reasonable measures can we expect to obtain improvements and to promote a state of prosperity that will become permanent.

Senator PEARCE (Western Australia).

—I think we can say that whilst Senator Millen in his usual vigorous style has attacked the party to which I belong he has refrained from personalities; and I hope that in any remarks which I may have to make in following him I may also achieve that end. I think that we can differ with respect to the policies of the various parties that are represented in this Parliament without indulging in personalities towards those who represent opposing parties. I wish to say in reference to Senator Millen's defence of the position of the Vice-President of the Executive Council in this chamber that the only thing that struck me forcibly in his remarks was this: I wondered that Senator Millen did not on this occasion give voice to the very vigorous protest which he has expressed on other occasions with regard to the fact that the present Government have again followed the pernicious example of other Governments in appointing only two Ministers in the Senate.

Senator DRAKE.—That example was also followed by the late Government.

Senator PEARCE.—Yes, and Senator Millen vigorously denounced them for having appointed only two Ministers in the Senate.

Senator DRAKE.—The late Government helped to stereotype the rule.

Senator PEARCE.—But I am surprised to find that on the present occasion Senator Millen has said nothing on the subject. That is only another proof of the party loyalty which affects honorable senators opposite, and the absolute way in which their leaders compel them to keep silence where they would like to voice their dissatisfaction.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator spoke against the Deakin Government on that point.

Senator PEARCE.—I also expressed the same opinion in regard to the late Government. I said that I thought they had made a mistake. It seems to me that the only way effectively to protest in this matter is that when, as is now the case, there is a powerful Opposition in the Senate, that Opposition should use its power in such a way as to induce the Government to realize that it is necessary to appoint another Minister in the Senate. That is the only way to make our protests effectual. I do not complain or cavil that a Coalition Government has been formed. I am rather pleased to see it. I certainly cavil at the nature of the actions which led to the formation of the coalition. But that is the only part of the business to be ashamed of. Every earnest student of reform should rejoice to see that a Coalition Government has been formed, because it brings into Federal politics a new line of cleavage—a line differing altogether from that which has existed in our States Parliaments, and in the Commonwealth Parliament, in the past. It gets rid of the old line of cleavage between free-trade and protection. We now have a clear line between those who favour collective effort in the public interest, and those who are in favour of individual effort for individual self-aggrandizement. The Labour Party ought to be the last of all parties to object to that new line of demarcation. The sooner that line is accentuated, the better for us. The recent new movements in Federal politics have accentuated that line of demarcation, and have emphasized the fact that the real issue is between the respective parties which I have mentioned. In the past, in my opinion, the importance of the question of free-trade and protection was very much exaggerated. It was time that it was relegated to the back-ground. Senator Millen, in criticising the Opposition, wanted to know whether we deny that our programme is in a socialistic direction. No member of the Labour Party will deny that. We admit that our programme is in a socialistic direction. But because that is so, we do not admit that it naturally commits us to immediate Socialism. It is just as unreasonable for Senator Millen to say that the policy of the Labour Party commits us to immediate Socialism, because some Socialists are extreme in their opinions, as it would be for me to say that because Senator Millen is supporting a reactionary Government, therefore he is in favour of a complete reaction to barbarism. There are those who sit alongside Senator Millen who are opposed to practically all measures which are introduced into the Federal Parliament. Those people would, if they could, push our progress back a few years. But it would not, therefore, be fair to say of Senator Millen and his associates, that the majority of them are in favour of pushing our politics back to a state of barbarism. While Socialism may be our ultimate goal, I think that a good deal of misapprehension is created in the minds of people, and, perhaps, also, in the minds of politicians in regard to it; though I am not one of those who believe that politicians are usually led astray in reference to these matters. It must be remembered that we are all more or less Socialists nowadays. To a greater or lesser degree there is scarcely a business man or a member of the Employers' Federation who is not to some extent a believer in Socialism, or who is not prepared in some degree to regard the State as a socialistic entity, to increase or to advantage his particular interests. Wherever that can be done he is quite prepared to enter into socialistic schemes. It ill becomes these gentlemen to condemn all forms of Socialism, when they are prepared to take advantage of them when it suits their own interests. The attitude of the Labour Party is that, where any industry becomes a monopoly, which, to the injury of the community, is being used to the advantage of a few, we should make it an industry owned and controlled by the people. That is the interpretation which we put upon our programme in this respect. We have not attempted to deceive the people. We have plainly told them what our opinions are. We did not reach the Treasury benches or attain to our present strength by any subterfuge or any deceit, but by the goodwill and the votes of the people of Australia. Therefore, it is idle to object to our presence here unless it can be shown that it is likely to lead to some injury.

Senator Pearce.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I did not understand Senator Millen to raise that objection.

Senator PEARCE. — The tone of his speech to my mind indicated that objection. The honorable senator also said that the late Government, of which Senator McGregor was a member, made the preference clause of the Arbitration Bill vital. The late Government were prepared to do that, but the members of the present Government did not give them an opportunity to do so, and took the business of the country out of the hands of the late Government, who, having some respect for their political consciences, resigned. I wish to say, as an intimation to the present Government, that so far as I am concerned, I believe that the preference clause, without the amendment which was moved by a member of the present Ministry, is absolutely vital—that without such a clause we might as well be without an Arbitration Act. If the Government believe in arbitration—unless they are going to bring in a Bill which will take away from the workers of Australia the right to strike, or the right to take their cases to an impartial tribunal—they must insert a preference clause without the so-called McCay amendment. I only hope that when the Bill is introduced here we shall see that when it leaves the chamber it is a measure just to the trades unions of Australia. I was surprised to hear Senator Millen refer to what he called the enforced loans which Mr. Watson foreshadowed when referring to the Banking Bill. I do not think that the term “enforced loans” is a proper one to use, but in any case I should like to ask whether Senator Millen was not a member of the Legislative Council of New South Wales at the time when the private enterprise banks of Australia took a forced loan from the people who had in good faith deposited money in those institutions? The banks at that time took a forced loan on which they never paid any interest, and, in some instances, have not yet repaid the principal. Senator Millen objects to the Government taking what he calls a forced loan, though it ought to be remembered that the Government would pay both interest and principal, and safeguard the credit of the banks. Why did not Senator Millen, in 1893, endeavour to bring about such legislation in New South Wales as would prevent the spoliation of private individuals by the private enterprise banks? Then we find Senator Millen objecting to the political machine. Just fancy a member of the free-trade delegation from New South Wales objecting to machine politics! Why, if there was any example of the working of a machine in Federal politics in Australia, it was the return of the free-trade senators from that State.

Senator GRAY.—Absolutely, no.

Senator PEARCE.—It was absolutely the most perfect example of machine politics in Australia.

Senator GRAY.—In what respect?

Senator PEARCE.—The election was run on a ticket not chosen by an organization, but chosen by a newspaper editor and the leader of the free-trade party. That ticket was placed before the people of New South Wales, by the two party newspapers, and the free-trade senators were elected without cavil or question. The men who were fortunate enough to get on the ticket knew that they did not need to address a single meeting or issue a single manifesto. They knew perfectly well that the machine, though small numerically, and as an organization very little representative of the people, was powerful enough to elect them in spite of all opposition. I should like to draw Senator Millen's attention to the difference between that kind of machine and the machine which was indicated by Senator McGregor. The latter is not a machine of two men or two newspaper editors, but of thousands and thousands of electors. The organization is open to every man and woman in the Commonwealth, who may not merely become automata members pulled by the strings of a newspaper office, but who may have an equal and effective voice in its control. If we have to make a choice as to which is the best machine in the interests of the people, surely we ought to adopt the one which is controlled by and composed of the people rather than a machine controlled by, and composed of two individuals or two newspaper prints. As to the programme which has been placed before us by the Government, we can, at any rate, say that the present Ministry do not mean to work us in such a way that we shall have much overtime during the present session. The programme put before us is more noticeable for what is left out than for what appears. However, I congratulate the Attorney-General on the fact that the Government have recognised that two Bills on the notice-paper are non-party, and are very useful measures. It would have been very unfair, even if one of those measures, though it may contain some party or contentious matter, had been thrown under the table. I desire to give the Government every credit for recognising that the two measures to which I refer will be very useful to the trading community of Australia, and tend to the protection of the people, and for taking those measures up just as they were left, fully prepared to send them on to the other Chamber to be dealt with. We are all pleased to hear that the Government are negotiating in order to carry into effect the Seat of Government Act. I trust that the full spirit of that Act will be recognised. While there may be some room for negotiation as to area, I trust the Government will recognise that both Houses have distinctly provided that the area acquired must be ample. We must have an area sufficient for the growth of a considerable city—we must have so much that we shall know that whatever value is created shall be retained by the Federal authorities, and not be given to the State, simply owing to the small area acquired. I trust that some of the parochial statements which have appeared in New South Wales will, on further consideration, give place to a broader and more Australian sentiment. I trust that we shall have no more of that spirit of hostility which has been displayed by some of the public men of New South Wales, but that they will meet the Federal Parliament and settle this question in an Australian spirit. In regard to the Arbitration Bill, and the decision of the Government to proceed with it as it stands, I venture to say that when it comes before us we shall be able to take such action as will make it more in accord with what is required in a workable measure of the kind. I am rather surprised at the proposal of the Government, that the High Commissioner Bill shall be held over till next session. I notice that the Government state that they intend to call a conference of State Premiers on this matter. While it might very well be said that on some questions the Federal Government have every right to consult with the States Premiers, still I, as one who am jealous of the rights of this Senate, urge that we, more effectively than any States Premiers, represent the States. The High Commissioner Bill might well have been introduced to this House and passed, and the States then given an invitation to arrange their State agencies, so as to fit in with the Bill. It seems to me that the Government, in going first to the State Premiers and asking whether they are agreeable to change their arrangements, are placing this Chamber in a secondary position. I understand there are various questions on which it is proposed to take the opinion of the States Premiers; but I think the Government might first take the opinion of the Commonwealth Parliament. We find that, on the question of old-age pensions, the States Premiers are to be consulted, which simply means that we are going to ask the Premiers to make proposals as to finances of the Commonwealth. What can be the reason for consulting the States Premiers? Is it not that the Government contemplate that if a proposal for old-age pensions is made, we shall have to interfere with the amount of money now returned to the various States Treasurers? We are, therefore, to go cap in hand to the States Treasurers, and ask them if they will be willing to spare that amount of money—whether they will make a noise if we reduce the amount now returned. It is most certain that the States Treasurers will object, and we shall then be told that old-age pensions are not practicable, because, it may be, Mr. Butler, of South Australia, or some other Treasurer, finds that he cannot spare the money. If the Government believe in old-age pensions, they ought to bring a proposal before the Commonwealth Parliament, and make the necessary financial arrangements, leaving the State Treasurers to do their duty and make their arrangements for the revenue they require. If the people of Australia believe in old-age pensions, they are prepared to make the necessary sacrifice. The people do not vote for old-age pensions without knowing that they will have to provide the money, and they will be quite willing to make up any deficiency which may result in the revenue. This is one of the questions which the Government should refer to the Federal Parliament rather than to a conference of States Premiers. If the Government continue in office I shall, of course, be a critic, though a fair critic; and I hope that the measures which are passed will be for the benefit of the people of Australia.

Senator Pearce.

Senator STYLES (Victoria).—There does not seem to be very much interest taken in this debate, seeing that there is barely a quorum present. I was rather surprised that the Government did not put up a Minister who had not spoken, to reply to the leader of the Opposition, unless, of course, Senator Walker happens to be an honorary Minister. It would have been the course usually followed in such cases, and it was a compliment due, I think, to Senator McGregor. There are one or two faults I have to find with the present Ministry, and I shall deal not so much with their policy as with their personnel. Up to the present time in the Federal Parliament, each Chamber has been led by a protectionist, but now each is led by a free-trader. That causes me to look with some little suspicion on the present Administration. It would be idle for myself or any one to say that the leader of a House has no more power than any other honorable member; as a fact, he does not count only one, but very often counts a good many, and on that ground alone I take exception to the constitution of the Government as in itself an objection in a protectionist Commonwealth. Another objection I have is as to the alleged equality in all things. Mr. Reid and Mr. McLean are said to be "equal in all things." The very first step that Mr. Reid took when he became Prime Minister was to issue a manifesto addressed to the people of Australia, but his other half did not even know that such was Mr. Reid's intention until the manifesto was published in the newspapers. It seems to me rather a bad start for one-half of this double-barrelled Ministry to go off when the other was not even loaded. If they are co-equal, as we are assured on the highest authority—Mr. Reid—I wonder what would happen if Mr. McLean were to resign. Would his resignation involve the retirement of the Government, and would it be sent to the Prime Minister or to the Governor-General? It is absolute nonsense to talk about Mr. Reid and Mr. McLean being on a footing of equality. I propose to make some remarks about Mr. Reid, the politician, and not Mr. Reid, the private citizen. No one can accuse me of having any personal feeling in this matter, for I have no recollection of ever having spoken to Mr. Reid, except to wish him good day. It is generally admitted that he is probably the best platform speaker in Australia. He cracks his jokes on the platform with the same easy facility that he cracks his alleged political principles off the platform. Australians do not mind jokes, but they expect something better from the man whom they place at the head of affairs in the Commonwealth. From the man who holds the highest position in their gift, they require consistency. The nation has fixed a very high standard for the man who is at the head of public affairs. They do not want an opportunist with a political past, but a high-minded man to whom they can all look up. Mr. Reid, as we all know, slanders, abuses, and sneers at a man one day—

Senator PULSFORD.—Is the honorable senator in order, sir, in charging a member of the other House—the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth—with slandering persons?

The PRESIDENT.—I think it would be better if the honorable senator were to moderate his remarks, but I am not prepared to rule that it is out of order for him to say that a man slanders people.

Senator STYLES.—I am speaking of Mr. Reid, not as a private citizen, but as a politician, and I intend to prove before I sit down that he does these things. On one day he will slander and abuse people, and on the next day he will cringe and crawl to them if it suits his political views. He is merely an opportunist, and in my opinion he is quite unfitted to hold the high position to which he has been called. When a vessel is steered from the steerage we do not expect a very exalted standard of political or other morality, but when the good ship Commonwealth is steered from the saloon we do expect her crew to be good men, and above all, we expect the captain to be a high-minded, honorable politician, and not a man who will truckle to every person who comes along. I expect that my statements will be questioned, and at the risk of boring the Senate, I shall quote Mr. Reid's exact words. I do not wish to put my construction on his words, but to allow honorable senators and the public generally to see the kind of man who is at the head of the affairs of this great nation. When he was face to face with the Labour Party in the other House, he said—

I do not want to flatter the honorable member for Bland as the leader of the Labour Party, but, speaking as one man to another, I wish to recognise the services which he, being a protectionist, and acting on his principles, has rendered by his efforts to preserve the revenue as far as possible. The honorable member, and others of his party, have helped us in a manner that I here wish to recognise.

Coming from a man like Mr. Reid, this is very high praise for the Labour Party. But when he is away from the Labour Party—at Warracknabeal—he calls them everything that a man could possibly do, as honorable senators will see if they refer to the Warracknabeal Herald of the 15th July, 1902. Speaking of the Barton Government, at Bowral, on the 18th of August, 1903, Mr. Reid said—

If one thing had marked the Government more than another it was the subservient and crawling way in which it had always kept one eye on the labour members. The line of honorable alliance between the two parties had been crossed, and the line of discreditable subservency and cowardice had been reached. He charged the Government with being a dishonorable tool in the hands of the Labour Party.

That is stronger than the language I was challenged for using just now, and it was used about a man whom we must all respect, whatever we may think of his politics. I refer to the Right Honorable Sir Edmund Barton. Speaking at Prahran, only two or three weeks ago, Mr. Reid referred to the same gentleman as, "That great man, Sir Edmund Barton." I should like to know when Sir Edmund Barton became great. It must have been during the time when he was a public man, for he has done nothing very great that I am aware of since he became a Judge of the High Court.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I would not say that.

Senator STYLES.—I do not think that Sir Edmund Barton would claim to have done anything very great since he has been a Judge.

Senator DOBSON.—If the honorable senator had been at the Federal Convention he would know that Sir Edmund Barton did something great.

Senator STYLES.—He is a great man, no doubt.

Senator DOBSON.—Is any good to be gained by be-littling our public men hour after hour?

Senator STYLES.—I am repeating what the Prime Minister said about a greater man than himself.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—He was speaking of Sir Edmund Barton as a politician.

Senator STYLES.—I recognise that. I wish to point out the inconsistency of the opportunist at the head of the Government. When the leader of the Senate was speaking yesterday, I interjected, "There is no 'Yes-No' about Senator Symon. We generally know what he means, but we never know what his leader means." That is the distinction between the two men.

Senator FINDLEY.—We know that he does not always mean what he says.

Senator STYLES.—No; very often he means a great deal more than he says. When Mr. Reid was addressing the Farmers, Property Owners, and Producers' Association, in Collins-street, only last week, he said—

I was Premier for five years in New South Wales, during which the Labour Party had me in the hollow of their hand, but what was the result? I got my free-trade policy passed by protectionist labour men.

I shall point out how misleading that statement was to his audience. According to his own showing, he did a five years' grovel. He was under no compulsion to remain in the hollow of the hand of the Labour Party; he was crawling and subservient then. He charged Sir Edmund Barton with being crawling and subservient to the Labour Party; and yet he gets up and tells the public, when it suits himself, that he was in the hollow of the hand of the Labour Party for five years. The line of discreditable subserviency and cowardice must have been passed scores of times during that period, and his Government must have been a dishonorable tool in the hands of the Labour Party, as I intend to show. He said, at Bowral, that the Barton Government kept one eye on the Labour Party. It will be seen directly that Mr. Reid kept both eyes on the Labour Party for very many years. The inference which he wished his listeners in Collins-street the other day to draw from his remark was that he made use of the protectionist-labour members and other protectionists in order to get his free-trade policy placed on the statute-book, but the greater portion of the crawling and subserviency took place after his Tariff was assented to by the Governor on the 12th of December, 1895. I propose to show that he is a prohibitionist as well as an opportunist. In 1896, tenders were invited by the Government of New South Wales for the construction of a bridge over the Murrumbidgee River at Gundagai. A Victorian firm, named McKenzie and Sons, sent in the lowest tender, but it was put aside by Mr. Reid's Government, although there was no restriction placed in the advertisement on the location of the tenderers, and the contract was given to a New South Wales contractor. McKenzie and Sons were well known as contractors in Victoria and New Zealand. They purchased plans and specifications from the State Government, and their good cash was accepted, but the contract was refused to them. A transaction of that kind in private life would be called by a very ugly name. If this firm and other contractors had been notified that it would be of no use to tender for the work because they were not resident in New South Wales, they would not have bothered to send in a tender. There was nothing against this firm, and yet the contract, I repeat, was given to a local man by the Reid Government.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Is this local politics?

Senator STYLES.—I do not believe in Mr. Reid as the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth, and I propose to show that he is an opportunist, that when it suits his purpose he scatters his alleged political principles to the four winds of heaven.

Senator PULSFORD.—Has the honorable senator got the amounts of the tenders?

Senator STYLES.—Yes. I have taken from the New South Wales Hansard what Mr. Reid did say.

Senator GRAY.—Would it not be the head of the Department rather than Mr. Reid, who would have to do with this contract?

Senator STYLES.—No, because it was made a Cabinet question. The Tender Board of New South Wales recommended that the tender of McKenzie and Sons should be accepted. When it was not accepted Mr. McKenzie went over and wished to see Mr. Young, the Minister for Works, who declined to give him an interview.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does not the honorable senator think that this is ancient history?

Senator STYLES.—No.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—So many things have happened since then.

Senator STYLES.—If it was an act which Mr. Reid, as a State Premier, ought not to have stooped to, he is unfitted to be Prime Minister of the Commonwealth. Having failed to see Mr. Young, Mr. McKenzie was taken by Mr. Chanter, a member of the State Parliament, to Mr. Reid, and his reply to Mr. McKenzie was stated in the Legislative Assembly to have been given in these words—

I do not see why my colleague should not have given you an answer to your question. I will give it to you. The reason why your tender was not accepted was because you are a Victorian.

That was a nice answer for Mr. Reid to give to the lowest tenderer. Mr. McGregor, the firm's engineer, came to me at the time, and said, "We have spent over £300 in tendering for works in New South Wales at various times. This is the first time that our tender was the lowest, and it is not accepted, because we are Victorians." If it had not been made a Cabinet question, I could well believe that that course might have been taken by the Minister of Works behind the back of the Premier.

Senator GRAY.—The honorable senator does not really believe that that was the reason why their tender was not accepted.

Senator STYLES.—I am quoting Mr. Reid's own statement. I believe very little of what he says on political matters.

Senator PULSFORD.—Does the honorable senator believe that the statement he is quoting is Mr. Reid's?

Senator STYLES.—That is what Mr. Reid told Mr. McKenzie in the presence of Mr. Chanter. I spoke to Mr. Chanter on the subject to-day, and he said that when he gave that account of the interview in the Legislative Assembly, Mr. Reid did not deny its accuracy. There could not be any reason why the contract should not be given to the lowest tenderer. This firm, which was well known in Victoria and New Zealand, was carrying out public works here at the time. When a man tells me that he is a free-trader, and keeps the door open to all people, and then slams it in the face of a contractor in that way, I think that we should not take the slightest notice of what he says. He not only took the firm's money for the plans and specifications, but he deprived them of their profit, which might have amounted to thousands of pounds. I only mention this incident to show how utterly unreliable Mr. Reid's statements are when he declares that he is a free-trader. In the same year tenders were called by the Reid Government for supplies for the Government Departments, and on the 14th of July Mr. Chanter moved in the Legislative Assembly—

That in the opinion of this House all supplies for the Government service should be, as far as practicable, the products or manufactures of New South Wales.

Mr. Reid said on that occasion —

I thoroughly agree with the spirit of the resolution.

The head of the Free-trade Party sought to lead his audience in Collins-street the other day to believe that all these things were done so as to keep the Labour Party and the protectionists under his thumb in that House until he got his Tariff passed, but they happened to be done in the year after it was enacted. He talks about keeping an open door. We continually hear that expression rolled out by him in a very nice way, but he slammed the open door right in the face of the other Colonies in 1896. They were not to supply any goods or materials which could be furnished by New South Wales.

Senator GRAY.—New South Wales always kept her markets open to Victoria, but Victoria did not reciprocate.

Senator STYLES.—New South Wales did not open her markets on that occasion to Victoria. I could understand a Premier in a protectionist State adopting the policy which is embodied in that resolution, but I cannot understand the head of the free-traders of Australia heartily concurring in that resolution, and at the same time telling the people that he took a great pride in keeping the door open to the other Colonies. It seems to me that this was not very good free-trade, but it was excellent prohibition, both in the case of Mr. McKenzie and in the other case which I have just mentioned. This gentleman, Mr. Reid, who will not now take up the Iron Bonus Bill, says that he will allow every member of his Government to vote as he pleases with regard to the proposition contained in that measure. Yet this is the same gentleman who offered an advantage of 15 per cent. to those who would start iron works in New South Wales, to turn out 150,000 tons of steel rails. That, again, was excellent protection, but it was very bad free-trade. It shows that Mr. Reid is prepared to throw his principles to the four winds of heaven whenever it suits himself. After he had passed his free-trade Tariff in New South Wales, the Labour Party there compelled him to pass other legislation which was in their interests. They held him in the hollow of their hand. In 1896 he passed the Mines Acts Amendments Acts. In 1896 he passed the Coal Mines Regulation Act. In the same year he passed the Factories Act. In 1896, and again in 1898, he passed the Elections Acts. In 1898 he passed an Act for the exclusion of inferior races. I am quoting these instances from a pamphlet written by Mr. Black, who claims, and with apparently good reason, that the Labour Party in New South Wales were able to force these measures from Mr. Reid's Government. Was not that cringing and crawling to the Labour Party in order that he might remain in office? He could not have been doing it for any other purpose. It is really very funny! Four years ago Mr. Reid came to Melbourne and delivered a speech in the Town Hall. He there stated—and it is to be remembered that Federation was then about to be consummated—that if he came into office he would throw the protected industries of Victoria into the water and let them sink or swim as they might. He expressed the opinion that if an industry after having been established for thirty years could not carry on without protection it was not worth protecting. This was his dry-dog threat! But it was very cheap politics. In the same way, Senator Symon might come over to Melbourne, and threaten all sorts of things, knowing that he had no voters to face on this side of the border.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The people at that meeting all applauded.

Senator STYLES.—Yes, but it was an audience of importers and free-traders. Admission was by ticket.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Was it really?

Senator O'KEEFE.—It was not a public meeting, then?

Senator STYLES.—No; one had to get a ticket in order to gain admittance, just as though it were a soup kitchen! Having passed his Tariff in 1895, Mr. Reid did not place upon the free list several articles which were manufactured in New South Wales. My honorable friend, Senator Pulsford, who is a complete encyclopædia on this subject, will know that that is the case. He will recollect that Mr. Reid stated that he intended to wipe out the protectionist Tariff. And he did it to a certain extent. But he retained some items. He retained preserved and canned fruits, biscuits, confectionery, sugar, and certain other similar articles. In fact, at the end of 1898, three years after his Tariff came into force, Mr. Reid himself brought in a Bill to repeal some portions of his own Tariff, in order that the duties might continue to operate. The duty at that time on sugar was £4 per ton refined, and £3 per ton raw. Mr. Reid imposed a duty of £1 more per ton on refined than on raw sugar in order that the raw sugar might be refined in New South Wales factories by New South Wales workmen. This again was very excellent protection, but it was very bad free-trade. I am pointing out how subservient he was to the protectionists and to the Labour Party. But that is not all. He threatened, as I have said, that he would throw every Victorian industry into the water, because he considered that an industry ought to be able to swim after thirty years of protection. But sugar cannot have been grown in New South Wales for over thirty years. It was grown there before we had a single protectionist industry in Victoria. At the time Mr. Reid came into power there were over 30,000 acres under crop in New South Wales. But he did not attempt to throw that dog into the water. There were many thousands of votes behind the dog! The Colonial Sugar Refining Company was behind it also. That meant many votes in the Legislative Assembly. Therefore Mr. Reid determined to keep his hands off that dog. He now fawns upon the farming industry—the country producers. He talks of the “great producing industries of Australia,” and they cheer him to the echo. But that is not what he said at the Melbourne Town Hall in the speech to which I have previously referred.

He was then speaking to free-trade importers, and he said—

That door which was open in the mother colony always was going to be open in all Australia. With all these barriers down, the stock fatteners and wheat farmers would feel the cold southerly wind of a world's competition.

That was the same gentleman who is now continually telling the farmers that they cannot be protected. He then talked of exposing them to the cold southerly wind of the world's competition. The importers cheered him to the echo. He did not make a similar statement when he was speaking to the producers the other day.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The other leader of the Government is in favour of a stock tax.

Senator STYLES.—Yes. We have heard a great deal of fiscal peace and of fiscal truce. This is how Mr. Reid expressed his views on fiscal peace just before the election—

Some people say, "Let the tariff alone for two or three years." I do not believe that would be in the interests of the community.

Twelve months ago he did not believe that fiscal peace would be in the interests of the electors. Now he believes in letting the Tariff alone.

Senator GRAY.—He distinctly stated that if the vote of the people went against him he would allow the fiscal issue to lie.

Senator STYLES.—Is that really what Mr. Reid said? He went to New South Wales, and he made the following statement:—

He believed he would be more successful if he consented to sink the fiscal issue, but he could not in honour do that.

Was there anything about sinking the fiscal issue there? He also said—

His party had agreed to resist any further development of protective taxation; and, with only a few exceptions, is prepared to reduce the existing tariff to a revenue tariff level.

Why does he not do it? The leader of the Government claims to be a free-trader. I believe that in most things he is, in practice, a sound protectionist. But he does not own it, and does not like to admit that it is so. For my own part, I believe that if Mr. Reid were a Victorian he would be a protectionist to-morrow. That is my firm impression. I am saying these things in order to show why I think that Mr. Reid is not—to use the phrase that is employed at election times—a "fit and proper person" to fill the high office which has been conferred upon him, and which I hope he will not hold very long. Something has been said about preferential trade. Let me state what is Mr. Reid's opinion on the subject. He said—

If we can get the tariff down to a revenue tariff standard then we will dispose of England's grievance in a very satisfactory way.

Senator GRAY.—Hear, hear.

Senator STYLES.—I am glad to hear that cheer. Mr. Reid's idea of preferential trade is to wipe out all protectionist duties, and to allow Germany and other countries to bring their goods in on equal terms with Great Britain.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—He never said that.

Senator STYLES.—But he did say that if he could get the Tariff down to a revenue standard he would soon dispose of England's grievance in a very satisfactory way. What did that mean? It meant that foreign countries would have an equal right to dump their goods in Australia as the United Kingdom would have.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—When did he say that?

Senator STYLES.—I have read the passage in which Mr. Reid said that if he could get the Tariff down to a revenue standard he would dispose of England's grievance in a very satisfactory way. That is to say, that if he could get it down to a revenue standard the effect would be to shut up the protectionist factories in Victoria, and Great Britain would, therefore, have no serious competitors in the country. But he said that if he failed in that respect he and his party would devote their strength to granting a substantial preference to the mother country by making reductions in the present schedule of duties. He said—

If we fail, then we will have to devote the whole of our strength to granting a substantial preference to the mother country by making adequate reductions in the present schedule of duties wherever necessary.

That is exactly what he was going to do—give to Great Britain the same terms as other countries. Yet he complains of the Barton Government.

They brought down a high tariff which shut out Great Britain just as much as other old world countries. Now they are striving, by means of a spurious preferential trade cry, to get their tariff up . . . and let the rates as they stand . . . remain in force against the mother country, while they will raise them against foreign nations.

Let me now quote a passage from one of the leading journals of this State.

Senator GRAY.—Which paper?

Senator STYLES.—Probably the honorable senator will be able to guess the source of the quotation from the nature of it. It is as follows:—

Twenty-five years ago nothing would have seemed more unlikely than that the twentieth century would open with a scarcely veiled antagonism between Great Britain and Germany, and a rapidly growing conviction among Englishmen throughout the world, that the Germans are their enemies, the nation with whom they will have to reckon in the near future. It would have seemed incredible that in a few years they would develop national ambitions inconsistent with the continued existence of the British Empire, and would look forward eagerly to the time when they would be strong enough to challenge its naval supremacy. Yet this is exactly what has happened. It is as though a veil had been suddenly rent asunder, and we are able to see clearly what was before hidden from us, that a people whom we regarded as our best friends are really our bitterest rivals. The hostility of Germany to England is the dominant factor in the international politics to-day, and marks the opening of a new chapter in English history. We are again face to face with a power that, so far as present appearances go, will be satisfied with nothing less than our downfall. . . . They have made no secret of their longing to break up the British Empire, and appropriate its most valuable portions, such as South Africa and Australasia.

That extract is from the Argus, which supports Mr. Reid. I was staggered when I read that article, but I believe it to be absolutely and literally correct. No one will accuse the Argus of being an alarmist in that direction. Yet free-traders, with Mr. Reid, the Prime Minister, at their head, would open our ports freely to that power, which would, if it were able, break up the British Empire to-morrow.

Senator GRAY.—England opens her ports to us.

Senator STYLES.—England ought to open her ports freely to us, seeing that she opens them to Germany. What a difference there is between the leader in this chamber and the leader in another place! The latter would admit German goods and any person who cared to come to this country, whereas the Attorney-General would confine immigration to the British races.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I did not say so.

Senator STYLES.—Senator Symon himself declared that this country was intended for the British race.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I spoke of the Anglo-Saxon race.

Senator STYLES.—Senator Symon said that he would like to see every one excluded, even the white races, other than British.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Nonsense! The honorable senator is drawing on his imagination.

Senator STYLES.—What the honorable and learned senator said was that we did a great deal too much trade with foreigners. When I was speaking on this subject about two and a half years ago, the honorable and learned senator began to laugh, and I said—

It is quite right to laugh when, as is the case with Senator Symon, perhaps, one does not know how very large this trade is.

To that Senator Symon said—

I know that it is much too large.

That is reported in the Commonwealth Hansard, of 22nd January, 1902.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—And that is my opinion.

Senator STYLES.—And the honorable and learned senator also said that German and other white races should be excluded. According to Hansard, published on the 30th of November, 1901, the honorable and learned senator said that all white races, except Britishers, should be excluded. That was when we were discussing the Pacific Island Labourers Bill, and the honorable and learned senator stated there, very impressively—

We are nearly all of us agreed that Australia is peculiarly fitted to be the home of the British race. Speaking generally, we are agreed that, if it is possible, we should make Australia the resort and the home of ourselves, of our children, and of all of the same blood who choose to come here—especially, I would say, of all of the same blood. I do not extend it even to the other white races. I am, and always have been, an advocate of keeping Australia—I would not limit it to Australians only—for those of British blood, so far as we possibly can.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Hear, hear!

Senator STYLES.—The honorable and learned senator is now allied with a man who would open our ports to-morrow for the admission of all sorts and conditions of men.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator is changing his ground with every sentence. What he said was that I stated I would exclude the white races.

Senator STYLES.—And that is exactly what the honorable and learned member did say, according to the quotation I have read. There is more that I could read, but I thought that enough to convince Senator Symon that he is a very liberal-minded man according to my views, seeing that he would restrict immigration to people from England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, not even excluding Scotland. I am quite sure the honorable and learned member will agree with me as to the employment of coloured labour on mail boats. Mr. Reid, on the other hand, likes coloured labour on mail boats, but I am going to point out what greater authorities than the Prime Minister, or any one here, have to say on the question. There was a leaflet issued last year by what is known as the Navy League. I desire to remind honorable senators that the recruiting ground of the British Navy is the British Mercantile Marine; that has always been so, and I hope it will always be so. The leaflet reads—

Our reserve is insufficient to replace casualties and maintain a supply of seamen during hostilities. It is desirable therefore that the reserve should be largely increased, utilizing all the resources of the Empire.

One of the resources of the Empire is the exclusion of all aliens from mail boats and the employment of our own people. I do not say for a moment that those who own the boats should be deprived of any of their profits. When they are interfered with, and compelled to use more expensive labour, the circumstances ought to be taken into consideration; that I should regard as part of the insurance for the safety of the Empire. The report of the Naval Reserve Committee states—

One of the objects of a strong navy is to enable our merchants' ships to keep the sea in time of war, and this object would be defeated if too many seamen and firemen were suddenly withdrawn from the mercantile marine.

Here is another extract—

Since 1859, the requirements of the Navy have out-grown the power of the mercantile marine to supply them. The former have increased; the number of British seamen employed on the latter have decreased.

Honorable senators have noticed that a shipping inspector, giving evidence in the case of the wreck of the Australia, told the Court that sixty out of every 100 men employed on British mercantile ships which trade here are aliens.

Senator GUTHRIE.—The Board of Trade returns show that the proportion of foreign seamen is 68 per cent.

Senator STYLES.—I presume that the shipping inspector knew what he was talking about, or he would not have made the statement. In this connexion, I should like to read a short extract from the report of a Postal Conference, held some eight or nine years ago.

Senator FRASER.—That is too far back.

Senator STYLES.—I do not think so, although I know it must be very unpleasant to have those matters raked up.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—They are very stale.

Senator STYLES.—The right-about-face of the Prime Minister is quite new. I have here some extracts from the report of delegates at the Post and Telegraph Conference held in Sydney in 1896. The Honorable Joseph Cook, now a member of the House of Representatives, and then Postmaster-General in the Reid Government of New South Wales, was president. In the report of that Conference we read—

The Conference, having considered the reply of the London office to the stipulation of the Hobart Conference with regard to the manning of the mail boats by white instead of coloured labour, recognises fully the force of the reason given by the Imperial Government against insisting on the exclusion of coloured labour, viz.—the necessity of discriminating between various classes of British subjects; but in reply, would respectfully point out that by some steamship companies, the labour of the contributing Colonies is excluded from employment, and an invidious preference given to the labour of countries which do not contribute to the maintenance of the service. No injustice would thus be done by the stipulation that the labour of the countries subsidizing the service only should be employed. And, therefore, this Conference is of opinion that the mails to and from Australia and Great Britain should be carried by ships manned with white crews only.

I have here a telegram sent by the president of the Conference after the reply had been received from the Home authorities—

Much regret you decline to do anything re coloured labour. We are not in position to call for tenders on our own account, and are therefore compelled accede to your proposal.

That telegram was sent from Sydney in the beginning of 1896, after the New South Wales Tariff was passed, and it was sent, as I say, by Mr. Cook, who was Postmaster-General in the Reid Government. It would be idle to say that Mr. Cook, as Postmaster-General, would take such action without the knowledge of the State Cabinet. It was such an important alteration that was proposed, that there can be no question that Mr. Reid and the other members of the Government would be fully aware of what was being done. It seems, however, that Mr. Reid must take a very different view now, when he says that if he had the opportunity, he would exclude the coloured races. Here are a few expressive sentences from a newspaper of the 26th of last month:—

The Russo-Japanese war has shown what damage may be done to the shipping trade by the action of a few cruisers in exercising the right of search, and sinking or capturing merchant steamers. British and American commerce with the Far East has been virtually extinguished for the time being.

Let me point out that we are not at war, and yet our traffic with the Far East has been "virtually extinguished." What position should we be in if we were at war with a big naval power? The newspaper article goes on to say:—

This is an aspect of the question that appeals especially to Australia, which is so largely dependent for prosperity on her import and export trade—a trade that would suffer seriously in the event of war between England and any considerable naval power.

I notice that Senator Gray does not ask me from what newspaper that extract was taken, but I may tell him that it is from the Melbourne Argus, one of the last papers that we should expect to express such sentiments. With those sentiments, however, I most heartily concur, and I wish to impress on the Government that they should not attempt to disturb the White Ocean policy, which I look upon as much more important than the policy of a White Australia. The latter deals with only a corner of the British Empire, and a White Ocean is the initial step to what must ultimately become an Empire question.

Senator DOBSON.—Does the honorable senator think that we can retain India, and yet keep our Indian subjects out of the stoke-hold?

Senator STYLES.—What I think will happen if Great Britain gets into a naval war is that the whole of the aliens would leave our merchant service.

Senator DOBSON.—Then, we should want the black fellows all the more.

Senator STYLES.—The black fellows would go back to their own land of curry and rice. They would say that the Britishers had paid them about one-fourth of what was paid to the white men, and that their accommodation had been very inferior, and under the circumstances they would not think it good enough to be shot at, and would go to their homes. But the greater danger would be with the white foreigners, and in my opinion every man on a British ship ought to be made to take the oath of allegiance. We train foreigners to be hardy, competent sailors, and there is no doubt that very naturally, and rightly, they would, in the event of war, go to their own homes, and turn their country's guns against British ships. Here is an extract from a speech by Mr. Reid, at Swan Hill, last year—

The policy of a White Australia was going too far in seeking to break up a mail service because there were some lascars in the stoke-holds. If he got sufficient power he would repeal such a provision.

I only hope to goodness that Mr. Reid may never have the power. The interjection by Senator Dobson as to the stoke-hold is just an echo of Mr. Reid; and if these gentlemen know anything about the matter at all, they know that the ships are manned by lascars—that lascars are not only in the stoke-hold, but all over the decks.

Senator DOBSON.—I asked the question whether we could expect to keep India, and yet deny these men the right to live as they have been living for generations.

Senator STYLES.—We do not regard these men as equals, nor treat them as equals, and with their lack of parliamentary representation, they are, in our estimation, little better than serfs. Those men would certainly leave us in the lurch if any crisis arose, and I think the Government would do well not to interfere with the White Ocean policy. During the railway strike, I went to Adelaide by the Orient steamer Orotava, and I asked one of the officers to show me the lascars' quarters. He informed me that there were no lascars on the ship; and, as a fact, it is only within the last three or four years that coloured men have been employed on Orient boats.

Senator DOBSON.—Why? Because it was said that it was impossible to get them.

Senator STYLES.—The men were employed because they were cheap. It would be unfair to deprive the ship-owners of part of their profits. If, in carrying out any national policy, loss should be incurred, it should be made good to them in the same way as Germany makes good a similar loss to her ship-owners. We are told that the Britisher cannot go into the stoke-hold in the Red Sea. How do the Germans work their vessels? If a labour man were to go down to a German ship tomorrow, and offer to work for nothing, he would not be given a job. France does not object to lascars being employed along the coast, but she objects to foreign ships engaging in the coastal trade. Neither in France nor in America can a foreign ship trade from port to port along the coast.

Senator GRAY.—Does the honorable senator say that they are doing wrong?

Senator STYLES.—No, I think that we ought to take a leaf out of their book.

They do a number of things which we might well copy. We might deal with our mail boats in the same way as they do. Their vessels are subsidized, because they cannot compete with our vessels, manned with black labour. There is no doubt that the Empire will have to adopt that policy. I do not object to French vessels coming here and trading on our coast if they pay the Australian rate of wages. We allow a Frenchman to engage in our coastal trade on his own terms, but he pays nothing towards the upkeep of the British Navy. We shall have to protect ourselves against the French in the case of a fight, but if an Australian vessel desired to trade from port to port along the coast of France she would soon be stopped.

Senator DOBSON.—Does the honorable senator recollect that the British Empire has 51 per cent. of the shipping of the world, and therefore cannot get enough English sailors?

Senator STYLES.—I wonder if the honorable senator knows how many men are employed in the British mercantile marine?

Senator DOBSON.—I have read all the reports, and I know that it is simply impossible to get men.

Senator STYLES.—There are 250,000 men employed in the British mercantile marine.

Senator DOBSON. — And 37,000 black men.

Senator STYLES.—The House of Commons has begun to look into this question. At the end of 1900 it directed that an inquiry should be made into the condition of the aliens in the British mercantile marine. An inquiry was held, and a report was laid before both Houses of the British Parliament in August, 1901, showing that during the fifteen years ending with 1900 the British mercantile marine had so increased that it employed 43,000 more men at the end of that period than it did at the beginning, that this number included 19,000 coloured aliens, 12,000 white aliens, and 12,000 boys of the bulldog breed, or a little over one in four. I should like to make a few more remarks—

Senator DOBSON.—On the policy of the Government, I hope.

Senator STYLES.—No; on the policy of the Prime Minister in the past.

Senator DOBSON.—We have had enough of the past.

Senator STYLES.—I have reserved the best part of my speech for the last, and I am sure that Senator Dobson, who has such a great admiration for the Prime Minister, will be delighted by the time I have finished. At the time when it occurred, I considered, and I believe that a large number of others considered, that Mr. Reid was rather badly treated when he was not offered the opportunity of becoming the first Prime Minister of Australia.

The PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable senator think that has anything to do with the policy of the present Government?

Senator STYLES.—I intend to show that his political past unfits Mr. Reid for the position he is in. That has been the whole object of my speech.

Senator GRAY.—He has got there.

Senator STYLES.—Yes; and I am going to show that it would be right to put him out as rapidly as possible, as he is an unsafe man to be there. I propose now to trace his career in another direction. I, in common with, I think, the great bulk of the people, believed that when the first Governor-General, after Sir William Lyne had failed to form a Ministry, gave a commission to Mr. Barton, a private citizen, Mr. Reid was rather badly treated. But I have gone more fully into the matter lately, and I now think that Lord Hopetoun acted rightly. He was well posted in Australian politics, and in my opinion now he could not have done anything else than he did.

Senator DOBSON.—Does the honorable senator propose to try to prove that Lord Hopetoun did not send for Mr. Reid on account of his political career?

Senator STYLES.—Yes, as I shall prove.

Senator DOBSON.—I think the honorable senator ought to leave it alone.

The PRESIDENT.—I would point out that all these interjections greatly lengthen the speech.

Senator DOBSON.—Is it relevant to the question before the Chair, sir, for the honorable senator to try to show what was Lord Hopetoun's reason for not sending for a certain gentleman three or four years ago to form a Government?

The PRESIDENT.—I asked Senator Styles if he thought it was relevant to the policy of the Ministry to discuss the reasons why Mr. Reid ought to have been the first Prime Minister, and he said that he was going to connect his remarks with the public acts of Mr. Reid, in order to show that he is not a proper person to be the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth. If that is so, I cannot say that he is out of order.

Senator DOBSON.—I admit, sir, that Senator Styles may criticise Mr. Reid's public career, and attempt to show that he is unfit to be Prime Minister; but he is now seeking to show that Lord Hopetoun, from a large knowledge of public affairs, regarded Mr. Reid as an unfit person to send for to form a Government, and I submit that is out of order on the ground of irrelevancy.

The PRESIDENT.—I really cannot see what connexion it has with the question before the Chair, but I understand that Senator Styles intends to connect his remarks therewith.

Senator STYLES.—I was going to show why I at one time thought Mr. Reid was not well treated. The Commonwealth would not have been in existence now if it had not been for his action. He called a Conference of Premiers, to meet in Hobart in January, 1895. It agreed to a draft Enabling Bill, which the Parliament of each Colony was to be asked to pass for the purpose of calling into existence a Federal Convention, to frame a Constitution. Mr. Reid took the first step in that direction. His Bill, when it was introduced, contained no provision for a minimum affirmative vote.

Senator DOBSON.—This seems to me to be absolutely irrelevant.

Senator STYLES.—The honorable and learned senator knows what is coming perfectly well.

Senator DOBSON.—I have not the faintest idea.

Senator STYLES.—The honorable and learned senator is a well read man, and knows that what I am about to mention is not very creditable to the Prime Minister as a politician. Mr. Reid was forced into the position of adopting a provision for a minimum affirmative vote, and he was willing to accept a vote of 38,000. Subsequently an amendment was moved by Mr. Hughes to fix the number at 50,000 votes, and Mr. Reid adopted that view. That was all perfectly straight. He then attended the meeting of the Convention in Adelaide, and when he was bidding his fellow-delegates good-bye, on the 21st April, 1897, he said—

I may be allowed before I go . . . to express to the public of Australia my profoundest satisfaction, as one of those who helped to bring this Convention into existence, at the conciliatory and patriotic spirit which has been shown throughout the whole of the transactions by the various delegations from the Australian colonies. I confess I came here with misgivings; but I am glad now to be able to state that our proceedings have been of such a character that I feel more confident than ever that we are really at last on the brink of that glorious transformation which will enable us, and all the people of Australia, to rise to the true dignity of the destiny which lies before us.

One would think from that speech that he was well satisfied with the Convention Bill, which I may say was completed two days afterwards. Fourteen days afterwards he laid the draft Bill before the local Parliament. And four weeks later one of his supporters introduced a Bill to amend the Enabling Act, by increasing the minimum affirmative vote from 50,000 to 80,000. Any gentleman who had the appointment of a Prime Minister would look at an act of that kind two or three times before he selected Mr. Reid. The Convention Bill of 1898, it will be remembered, was wrecked because of that increase. Only 72,000 votes were polled, that is about 40 per cent. more than the original number required. In Victoria we framed our Enabling Bill on the lines of the New South Wales Enabling Act. We copied verbatim the provision for the 50,000 affirmative vote.

The PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable senator think that that has anything to do with the policy of the Government?

Senator STYLES.—I wish to make it quite clear to those who have not followed his history that Mr. Reid is not to be trusted, that he has broken faith with the other States.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does the honorable senator think that Mr. Isaacs is to be trusted?

Senator STYLES.—I do.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does the honorable senator know that Mr. Isaacs was anti-Federal at one time?

Senator STYLES.—And so were a good many others. I should like to quote Mr. Reid's own words, in order to show the value which he places upon a solemn compact entered into between himself and his Parliament and the other States of the Commonwealth. I wish to show how easily responsibility sits upon the shoulders of the present Prime Minister. He said—

I do not for a moment wish to raise a serious issue in this matter, even now, so long as we keep some kind of faith with the other Colonies; but if a proposition is carried, which seems to me to involve a breach of faith of this country with the other Colonies, then I must frankly say to the House that a very serious question must arise.

He did not say that it was not a serious breach of faith. He said—

I do not object to an alteration of a reasonable character. . . . To require an absolute majority is really asking too much.

The proposal was that 135,000 affirmative votes should be the minimum. That was one-half of 270,000 electors. The Hansard report goes on—

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—100,000 is quite enough.

MR. REID.—50,000 is too low.

It must be remembered that Mr. Reid introduced the Enabling Bill in the first instance without any minimum vote provision. Of course he did the dignified thing, as Premiers do sometimes, when he stated—

I represent this Parliament in reference to the other Colonies in a peculiar sense, and it is with reference to the faith which this House has to keep with the other Colonies that I have to address myself to this matter. When a people enter into bargains, or pass Acts of Parliament on the faith of which other people, other communities, pass important Acts of Parliament, then I think we have to pause before we seriously disturb the compact upon which the movement is based. I appeal to my honorable friends to meet me to the extent of 75,000 or 80,000 votes.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—No, 100,000.

MR. REID.—All I can say is that 100,000 makes me an utter opponent of the whole proposal right through, from start to finish, because I think that 100,000 would amount to too serious a breach of the compact with the other Colonies.

He agreed to 80,000. That introduced, as honorable senators will see at once, an advance of 60 per cent. upon the original 50,000. Mr. Reid had a curious idea of what was a serious breach of faith in raising the minimum in this way from 50,000 to 80,000 after all the trouble which the people of Australia had gone to. When Mr. Reid was driven from office, one of the newspapers had a leading article upon the situation. I will quote a passage from it. It said—

With respect to the Federation movement, Mr. Reid was most unhappily an opportunist. Nobody expected Mr. Reid would assume a yes-no attitude in the first referendum. This halting policy was partly a concession to the anti-Federal section of his supporters in Sydney, and partly personal jealousy of the Convention leader, Mr. Barton. The game of an opportunist is a game of calculation, and Mr. Reid miscalculated. Had he decided to run a straight course when he returned from the Convention, his personal advocacy would have secured the statutory majority at the first referendum, the Commonwealth would now be in existence, and Mr. Reid now be Prime Minister of the Commonwealth.

That was written fifteen months before Federation was consummated. It was urged that if Mr. Reid had run a straight course he might have been Prime Minister of the Commonwealth. It was the Argus, a supporter of Mr. Reid's, which said that. Not knowing many of these things, I thought that Mr. Reid had been dealt with hardly, seeing that the Governor-General selected Sir William Lyne as the first Prime Minister, and asked him to form a Ministry. It will be remembered that Sir William Lyne failed. If it were necessary that a member of the New South Wales Parliament, holding a prominent position, should be sent, for by the Governor-General, it seemed to me at the time that the fair and proper course, seeing that the Premier of the State had failed to form a Ministry, was to send for the leader of the Opposition, who at the time was Mr. Reid. I held the opinion that at that time Mr. Reid had done more for Federation than any other man in Australia. But Sir William Lyne having failed, the Governor-General passed over Mr. Reid and asked a private citizen, Sir Edmund Barton, to undertake the formation of the first Federal Ministry. It is true that that private citizen had been leader of the Federal Convention. But the Bill which that Convention prepared had been defeated by the people of his own State. So that Sir Edmund Barton, to my mind, was really out of the running. The Bill that was accepted by the people of New South Wales was based upon the Bill which the Convention framed, but it had been revised and amended in vital points by the Premiers' Conference. Mr. Reid called that Conference together. He was its moving spirit. The Bill which issued from it became our present Constitution, and not the Bill framed by the Convention. These, it seemed to me, were strong reasons why Mr. Reid should be sent for, and commissioned to form the first Federal Ministry, failing the Premier of New South Wales; it being admitted on all sides that the parent State had a kind of right to have one of its own citizens chosen to be the first Prime Minister.

Senator HIGGS.—I think that Australia recognised that Sir Edmund Barton was the man to be sent for.

Senator STYLES.—Australia, perhaps, did not know the whole of the circumstances. I did not know them. I must say that, if Mr. Reid's political record had been as clean as Sir Edmund Barton's was, he would have been badly treated.

Senator HIGGS.—Does the honorable senator mean to suggest that the Governor-General knew him?

Senator STYLES.—My own fixed conviction is that the Governor-General knew all the circumstances which I have related. Lord Hopetoun was a man who was quite abreast of Australian politics. He had been here before, and being a man of mark, we may rely upon it that he kept himself abreast of Australian affairs.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Did it not strike the honorable senator then, that the Governor-General should not have sent for Sir William Lyne, who was the strongest anti-Federalist in New South Wales?

Senator STYLES.—Lord Hopetoun sent for Sir William Lyne, because he was the Premier of the State. But my point is that, failing him, the leader of the Opposition in that State should have been called upon.

Senator DOBSON.—Certainly not; the leader of the Convention.

Senator STYLES.—Seeing that since 1895 Mr. Reid had done more for Australian union than any other half-dozen men in Australia, I thought he ought to have been sent for.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator is the only man whom I have ever heard say so.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Certainly, Mr. Reid did a great deal for Federation.

Senator STYLES.—Was it not through him that the Conference of Premiers was held? These facts led me strongly to the opinion that there must have been good reasons why Lord Hopetoun did not send for him, and commission him to form the first Ministry.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The voice of Australia pointed to Sir Edmund Barton.

Senator STYLES.—Who took notice of the voice of Australia? Did the Governor-General do so when he sent for Sir William Lyne? I have a high opinion of Lord Hopetoun's powers, and I believe now that he saw clearly what ought to be done.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Federalists thought—wrongly perhaps—that he made a blunder.

Senator STYLES.—He knew perfectly well what he was doing. He selected Sir William Lyne, notwithstanding that he was the greatest anti-Billite in New South Wales—I do not say the strongest anti-Federalist—because he was Premier of that State. Failing Sir William Lyne, I think that there were good reasons for sending for Mr. Reid, and that if he had had a clean political record he would have been sent for.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Another Scotchman found him out.

Senator STYLES.—Yes. One Scotchman found out another one.

Senator DOBSON.—It is a very unfair thing to impute motives of that sort to the Governor-General on such grounds.

Senator STYLES.—I have a perfect right to my own opinion.

Senator DOBSON.—It is grossly unfair.

Senator STYLES.—That may be the honorable and learned senator's opinion, but if Senator Dobson knows his own opinion on any matter he is the only man in this chamber who does know it at any time. I intend to touch upon another aspect, and then I shall have done with Mr. Reid. I have no doubt that honorable senators have heard of the Neild episode in Mr. Reid's career. Mr. J. C. Neild was a member of Parliament in New South Wales. I mention this because I think that a gentleman holding such a high position as that of Prime Minister of Australia is fairly open to criticism.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Did he not expiate that by being turned out of office?

Senator STYLES.—I thought that question would come. But let me ask Senator Symon whether, if he had an accountant who had committed a breach of trust, and was punished for it, he would take him back into his service again? I am quite sure that the honorable and learned senator knows too much of the world to take a man back into his employment in a position of trust, who had done what he ought not to do in such a connexion.

Senator GRAY.—What he did was a grand thing.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Why should we go into the no-confidence debates of New South Wales?

Senator STYLES.—I have a right to show that the political career of the Prime Minister is of such a character that he ought not to be intrusted with the highest place in the service of the people of Australia. That is the position I take up.

Senator DOBSON.—Do not hit below the belt.

Senator STYLES.—I do not intend to do so.

Senator PULSFORD.—The honorable senator has been doing so all along.

Senator STYLES.—These remarks come from honorable senators who are so accustomed to doing what they complain of, that they attribute the same conduct to others. Do they not remember how Mr. Reid hit below the belt in criticising Sir Edmund Barton and others? Let me recall these facts to the minds of honorable senators. Early in 1897, Mr. J. C. Neild, then member for Paddington, New South Wales, went to England. When he was just about leaving, the following question was asked in the New South Wales Parliament, Mr. Reid then being Premier—

Senator HIGGS.—Is the honorable senator referring to the poet or the politician?

Senator STYLES.—I am referring to Mr. J. C. Neild, the politician, now the honorable Senator Lt.-Col. J. C. Neild. The question to which I allude was as follows:—

I have been requested to ask the Premier: Is it a fact that he has given a roving commission to the honorable member for Paddington to inquire into the system of old-age pensions in Europe; and, if so, is it to be distinctly understood that no expense is to be incurred by the State?

Mr Reid replied—

I desire to say that the honorable member for Paddington, who is about to visit England, has been empowered by the Government to make such inquiry; but he has consented to do so without the slightest remuneration, either in the way of allowance for expenses, or otherwise. He will do so without the slightest expense to the Government.

The last paragraph in the Neild Report, which was written by Senator Neild himself, reads as follows:—

I have now completed my arduous task, which I undertook at my own charge, and without hope of reward, save that which comes from useful work honestly done in the interests of humanity.

There we have the two parties to what was subsequently a bargain, positively declaring that there was no understanding that a payment of public money should be made from one to the other. But a year afterwards, another question was asked in the New South Wales Parliament to the following effect:—

Has any report been received in respect to old-age pensions from Mr. J. C. Neild, M.P.?

The Chief Secretary replied as follows:—

Mr. Neild has prepared one . . . and the work is now being printed at the Government Printing Office.

Then the question was asked—

What cost has been incurred in procuring the report?

and the Chief Secretary replied—

None.

On the 30th August of the following year, a motion of no-confidence was tabled, and came on for discussion. Just before it was debated a question was raised in the New South Wales Parliament, which in the report is headed—

Privilege.—Mr. J. C. Neild.

The report goes on—

Mr. LEVIEN.—I wish to ask the Colonial Treasurer a question, without notice. I wish to know whether the money which has been paid to the honorable member for Paddington has been paid back into the Treasury by him? The Colonial Treasurer will know whether that is so or not.

The answer was as follows:—

Mr. CARRUTHERS.—I may say that the amount has been paid into the Treasury by Mr. Neild.

To an outsider it must seem to have been curious that the money should have been repaid if it were due to Mr. Neild. If it were not due to him, why should it have been paid to him; and why should Mr. Reid have declared that he was doing this work at his own cost? Speaking on the no-confidence motion, Mr. Reid himself said—to show that it was not his Government, but himself, who authorized the payment of this money—

I voluntarily said to Neild, "Now, Neild, we will pay you your expenses in connexion with this work, and I will add £250 for your personal trouble."

All this came out when the no-confidence debate was on. Sir William Lyne had moved—

That the present Government does not possess the confidence of this House.

But the House was not satisfied with carrying that motion. It was satisfied that Mr. Reid, personally, and not his Government, was responsible. Consequently, the House resolved—

That the present Government does not possess the confidence of this House, and deserves censure for having made payments of public money to Mr. J. C. Neild, member for Paddington, without asking Parliament, and contrary to the assurance given by the right honorable the Premier.

There were 125 members of the House, of whom 118 voted, seventy-eight in favour of the motion of censure, and forty against, whilst six paired.

Senator GRAY.—Does the honorable senator know that Mr. McGowan, the leader of the Labour Party, stated that that was not the real reason for the motion?

Senator STYLES.—I do not know what Mr. McGowan said, but I can tell him what was said by the Daily Telegraph, one of the largest newspapers in Australia. The Daily Telegraph said:—

When Mr. Reid allowed himself to be enticed into devious political paths, he placed a strain on the loyalty of his followers which could not be endured. In the midst of it, came the disclosures connected with the Neild case, which made it necessary that Parliament should take decisive action to prevent the under-mining of that safeguard which, whether effective or not, is the only one by which the purity of public life can be guaranteed. There was nothing, therefore, but to bring the errant Government before the bar of constitutional justice, and at any cost pass the inevitable judgment upon them. Any attempt on Mr. Reid's part to escape the penalty which the House has apportioned to the breach of Ministerial faith involved in the transaction for which the Government was censured, would simply be a step from bad to worse.

I think that is one of the strongest condemnations I ever read. Neither of the extracts which I have read is from the Melbourne Age.

Senator WALKER.—Wonderful!

Senator STYLES.—It is not wonderful at all. I knew that, no matter how accurate the extracts might be, if they were from the Age, I should be told the statements were biased, and so I went to the free-trade bible and prayer-book.

Senator GRAY.—How much did poor Neild get out of it?

Senator STYLES.—Nothing; he returned the money. I do not know any more of the case than what I have read in Hansard and the public press. I was twitted a little while ago, when I expressed the opinion that Lord Hopetoun might have been influenced by all this business. That is still my opinion, because I cannot see any reason why Lord Hopetoun should have ignored this particular man.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator has no right to say that.

Senator STYLES.—I have a perfect right to express my opinion, so long as I do so respectfully.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Why express an opinion of that kind in regard to Lord Hopetoun?

Senator STYLES.—There must have been some reason why Lord Hopetoun deliberately ignored this man, and there cannot be found in any of the newspapers which supported Mr. Reid, any protest against his being passed over at the time.

Senator DOBSON.—He was not passed over.

Senator STYLES.—He was passed over by Lord Hopetoun. I could have understood if Lord Hopetoun had said that, as he believed Sir Edmund Barton would be the choice of Australia, he would ask that gentleman to form a Government.

Senator WALKER.—That was the reason.

Senator STYLES.—Lord Hopetoun asked an anti-Billite to form a Government because that anti-Billite was the Premier of a State. But it was Mr. Reid's Bill that was being dealt with in the form of a Constitution Act, and not the Bill of a Convention at all.

Senator GRAY.—Mr. Barton was the recognised leader of the Federal movement.

Senator STYLES.—Can it be said that Sir Edmund Barton did as much as Mr. Reid did for the Federal movement? Mr. Barton may have made as many speeches as Mr. Reid did, but it was the latter who brought the Federal movement to a practical issue.

The PRESIDENT.—I cannot see the relevancy of these remarks to the question before the Senate.

Senator STYLES.—I am only trying to show why I have no confidence in the present Prime Minister. I believe him to be an opportunist in politics, who trims his sails to catch every favouring breeze—a man who will cling to office as long as possible, and will need a locomotive to drag him from the Treasury benches. I am thankful to honorable senators for having listened so patiently to me while, rather ruggedly, I am afraid, I have placed my views before them. There can be no personal feeling on my part, because I have never spoken to Mr. Reid, but when I read of such things I begin to wonder whether, if he was not good enough to be Prime Minister in the first case, he has so improved as to be good enough now.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—He was good enough then, but there was another man before him.

Senator STYLES.—At all events, Mr. Reid is in double harness with Mr. McLean, and I only hope they will not go too fast. I must confess that I am astonished that certain members should have joined this Government. All I have said this evening is in regard to the Prime Minister; I have found no great fault with any of the other Ministers, though I should have liked to see any one of several members as Prime Minister in preference to the gentleman now at the head of the Government.

Senator GRAY (New South Wales).—As a new member, I feel it may be deemed an impertinence on my part to criticise the manner in which the debates in this Chamber are conducted. I feel, however, that during the two last debates, the tone has deteriorated in comparison with the tone previously observed. On the two last occasions we have been treated to biographical sketches of the past careers of members of this Parliament, without any reference whatever to the larger questions which we are here to consider. I do not think that the speech of Senator Styles, or, to a certain extent, the speech of Senator McGregor, will cause the people of the Commonwealth to think that they are represented with that dignity which is their due. I feel it my duty to endeavour to fairly and equitably defend my leader from the criticism which Senator Styles has seen fit to apply. Senator Styles is too old a parliamentarian to be influenced by any personal feelings in a matter of this kind; but outrageous personalities in connexion with the political careers of members of the present Government had much better be omitted from our discussion, or, at any rate, left to those honorable senators who have knowledge and experience of the public men of the mother State. I venture to say that throughout Australia there is no gentleman, who, according to his lights, has carried on his political career more in the interests of his State and the Commonwealth than has the present Prime Minister, and I speak of him with many years experience as a close personal acquaintance. It is not necessary to go into details in order to defend Mr. Reid. A gentleman who has had the good will of his fellow citizens and has held the proud position of Premier for many years, should, at all events, be credited with good faith. When an honorable senator undertakes to give reasons why Mr. Reid is not a fit person to become Prime Minister, he should make himself absolutely certain as to the particulars he wishes to prove. Senator Neild did not only go to England, but travelled throughout France, Germany, and other European countries, and produced a report which is regarded by experts as one of the most valuable ever produced on the question which he investigated, namely, old-age pensions. When Senator Neild first undertook the commission it was not thought that he would take the immense trouble he did, or that his report would be of such a valuable character. Senator Neild is not a rich man, and in view of the great work which he had done, Mr. Reid volunteered to pay the expense absolutely incurred in getting the information together. That money Mr. Reid, in his good nature, advanced; and I may tell honorable senators what I suppose they know, that if the State Parliament had declined to authorize the expenditure Mr. Reid would have been personally responsible. There is no truth whatever in the insinuation that this money was paid with any intention of concealing the fact from Parliament.

Senator STYLES.—Is the motion of censure an insinuation?

Senator GRAY.—It has been stated over and over again by the leader of the Labour Party in New South Wales that the actual reason for the motion of censure was that Mr. Reid would not consent to introduce an early closing proposal with arbitrary conditions in regard to small shops. There was not a single member of the New South Wales Parliament at the time who really believed in the principle of the motion for which he voted. I also believe there was scarcely a member of the House who did not justify Mr. Reid in advancing this money. The remarkable thing is that a subsequent Government, which for four years was dominated by the Labour Party—the party which voted for the expulsion of Mr. Reid from office—have since then spent thousands upon thousands of pounds without putting the proposals through the routine of the House in the usual constitutional course.

Senator DAWSON.—Why use the word “dominated”?

Senator GRAY.—I used the term because at any moment the Labour Party lifted their fingers they could have sent the Government right-about-face, and everything was done under the domination of the Labour Party, who were just as much responsible as the Government.

Senator DAWSON.—Could the honorable senator not use the word “assisted”?

Senator GRAY.—I do not know that I could justly use the word “assisted,” because I believe a good deal of the money would not have been spent but for the craving of the Labour Party. I left Mr. Reid's guidance, and went over to Sir Edmund Barton, because Mr. Reid would not give his adhesion to the first Constitution Bill brought forward, though since then I rather feel that I was wrong, and Mr. Reid was right. We should have had no Federation to-day, but for the fact that Mr. Reid gave his adherence to the Federal movement after the second Convention. When he did so, there was a shout of exultation from all Federalists, because they knew that Federation was an accomplished fact, so far as New South Wales was concerned. It must not be forgotten, however, that Sir Edmund Barton had for years been acknowledged as the leader of the Federal movement, and he had certainly given much time and labour to his advocacy. Mr. Reid had the same feeling as that to which Senator Styles has given expression, and considered, so far as I know from indirect information, that he ought to have been "sent for." There were, however, others who, after Sir William Lyne had formerly been offered the position, thought it only right that Sir Edmund Barton should be called upon, as the leader of the movement, to form the first Federal Government. The insinuation that Lord Hopetoun formed such an opinion of Mr. Reid that His Excellency did not feel disposed to commission that gentleman to form a Government is beneath contempt. When I hear these strong fanatical views of different parties, and leaders, expressed. I am reminded of a conversation I once heard in Yorkshire between two gentlemen. One of them said, "If I had my way I should drown Gladstone," while the other said, "I would hang Disraeli as high as I could if I had my way." That was how the leaders of two distinct parties in the old country were regarded by two educated gentlemen. The speech of Senator Styles, with its narrow provincialism, was not of a character to foster the Federal spirit. On the contrary, it could only serve to keep alive the provincialist feeling, and to emphasize the fact that one man is from New South Wales, and another is from Victoria.

Senator STYLES.—I made no reference to that.

Senator GRAY.—No; but I formed an opinion from the circumstances which were placed before me. I believe that much of the ill-feeling which has been generated in connexion with Mr. Reid, is due to the fact that he is regarded as the most powerful factor in the political atmosphere of New South Wales. I believe that there is no man who will do so much as the Right Honorable G. H. Reid, to bring about the brotherhood of the people of the States, as I believe that, if he is given the opportunity, he will show the people of the Commonwealth at large that he is not only a representative of New South Wales, but a representative of the Commonwealth, and will do his best to promote the happiness and welfare of the people.

Senator HIGGS.—And he commences to show that feeling by denying to the smaller States a representation in his Government.

Senator GRAY.—I do not know that he ever denied that.

Senator HIGGS.—His is a Victorian and New South Wales Ministry.

Senator GRAY.—I wish to say a few words on the labour caucus. The statement has been made here that the decision of the labour caucus is only binding so far as it refers to the programme which has been laid down, and that no question outside that programme can be dealt with by the caucus. I desire to give an illustration which I think is not in keeping with that statement. When the pastoral industry of New South Wales was in that condition that no one knew whether it was going to be relieved or to be ruined; when a condition of affairs existed in that State such as has never occurred in any other State in the Commonwealth, it was felt by some gentlemen that the State or the Commonwealth Parliament ought to come to the relief of the brave, struggling settlers on the land. A deputation waited upon the Prime Minister, Mr. Deakin, in Melbourne, and he gave us very strong sympathy. The deputation also waited upon the Premier of New South Wales, and we got strong sympathy there, too, but nothing else. It was then thought that we might be able to do something with the Labour Party, because it was known that many labour members deplored as much as we did the condition of the country. Some of these gentlemen were approached, and a meeting of the Labour Party was held. The caucus sat for over three hours, but the vote was against anything being done to assist the struggling settlers. I know that many members came away from the meeting with heavy hearts. They felt that in some measure they ought to do all they could to relieve the pastoral industry. But in the State Parliament the members of the Labour Party would not move their fingers to assist any one to bring forward a motion, or to support a motion when it was brought forward, simply because those who were in favour of granting relief were dominated by the caucus vote.

Senator DAWSON.—Is the honorable senator referring now to the suspension of the fodder duties?

Senator GRAY.—We were asking the Commonwealth Government to suspend the fodder duties, and the State Government to assist in purchasing fodder for the starving stock.

Senator DAWSON.—What had the New South Wales Labour Party to do with the suspension of the fodder duties?

Senator GRAY.—Does the honorable senator mean to tell me that the condition of country districts in which men were struggling and being ruined, and millions of money were being spent, was a matter of no concern to a labour member? Take, for instance, Mr. Holman, who represented a part of the State which was suffering terribly from the drought. His constituents were doing all they could in order to get him to obtain some relief. I know that in the caucus he did his best to achieve their object.

Senator DAWSON.—Take Senator Drake, who was a member of the Federal Cabinet. He would not agree to suspend the fodder duties.

Senator GRAY.—I am not talking about Senator Drake, but pointing out that there have been cases outside the platform in which the caucus has bound labour members to act as it dictated.

Senator FINDLEY.—What is the honorable senator's authority for making that statement with regard to the Labour Party of New South Wales?

Senator GRAY.—My authority is the labour men themselves.

Senator FINDLEY.—Binding on every one of them?

Senator GRAY.—The result of the holding of that meeting was that nothing was done in the State Parliament to help the settlers to tide over the period of suffering.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Of how many men did the Labour Party consist at that time?

Senator GRAY.—Twenty-six or twenty-eight.

Senator O'KEEFE.—And how many members did the Legislative Assembly comprise?

Senator GRAY.—It comprised 125.

Senator O'KEEFE.—How could twenty-six labour members carry a vote against the rest?

Senator GRAY.—But the Labour Party held the balance of power in the House.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable senator admits that the other parties were equally wrong.

Senator GRAY.—I admit that the Premier, Sir John See, was absolutely wrong in not providing some relief for the settlers. Two of his colleagues attended a meeting at the Hotel Australia, and strongly urged the Government to do what we asked. Mr. Crick, the Minister for Lands, made one of the strongest speeches I heard in favour of our request.

Senator DAWSON.—Was it not the Barton Cabinet which absolutely objected to suspend the fodder duties at that time?

Senator GRAY.—The Barton Government simply said that they did not think that they were in a position to suspend the fodder duties, but Mr. Deakin stated afterwards that the Parliament of New South Wales could grant the desired relief if it chose.

Senator DAWSON.—But the State Parliament could not deal with a Commonwealth matter.

Senator GRAY.—The State Parliament, if it had felt disposed, could have voted the equivalent of the fodder duties. If it had met with the approval of the caucus there is no doubt that the desired relief would have been granted.

Senator DAWSON.—But the honorable senator has asserted that it was the members of the Labour Party who were against the suspension of the fodder duties.

Senator GRAY.—No. I said that some labour members did their best to bring about what we desired by causing a meeting of the caucus party to be held. The blame for the want of sympathy shown to the struggling settlers at that time must be attributed in a large measure to those labour members who formed the majority at the caucus.

Senator PEARCE.—Can the honorable senator give the name of one labour member who was prevented by the caucus from voting for the grant of that relief?

Senator GRAY.—The proof is that the caucus assembled, and that in consequence of its decision no relief was granted.

Senator PEARCE.—Who told the honorable senator what was done in the caucus?

Senator GRAY.—I am sure that the honorable senator would not deem me worthy of being a member of the Senate if I were to detail a private conversation.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator has detailed a private conversation but suppressed the names.

Senator GRAY.—No; I have stated as a broad principle that the Labour Party in caucus did consider the question as to whether they should do anything to force the hands of the Government in that direction. They came to an adverse decision, and not a single labour member ever did anything in the State Parliament to bring about the granting of any relief.

Senator GIVENS.—Did they do anything to prevent the settlers getting relief voted?

Senator GRAY.—I do not know that any member of the Labour Party did anything of that kind.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator has utterly failed to show where a single member of the Labour Party was interfered with by the caucus.

Senator GRAY.—If I have failed to convince the honorable senator it cannot be helped.

Senator FINDLEY.—Assuming it to be true, what has it to do with the caucus meetings of the Federal Labour Party?

Senator GRAY.—The statement has been made that the caucus never interferes with the vote of a labour member in respect of any matter outside the platform.

Senator DAWSON.—And that is absolutely correct.

Senator GRAY.—I am in favour of a good deal in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. I am sorry to say, however, that I am gradually weakening in the opinions which I have held. If the measure as it stands would be a means of settling industrial disputes it would be a great factor in promoting the happiness and prosperity of the people of Australia. If I had that belief I should be courageous enough to do the utmost in my power to secure its passage. But in our treatment of the Bill we must be guided by practical experience. We must be guided by the knowledge we have gained from those countries which have had an experience of an Arbitration Act during the last few years. Mr. McGregor was, if not the pioneer, one of the pioneers, who, with Mr. Reeves, brought the Arbitration Act of New Zealand into existence.

Senator PEARCE.—Mr. Reeves has never mentioned his name.

Senator GRAY.—I am only repeating a statement which has been published in the newspapers of New Zealand, as well as in a pamphlet written by Mr. McGregor, who is a member of the Legislative Council of that Colony.

Senator PEARCE.—It is a strange thing that in his history of the Arbitration Act Mr. Reeves has not mentioned the name of Mr. McGregor.

Senator GRAY.—Mr. McGregor mentioned the fact in his own pamphlet and it has been confirmed by four correspondents to whom I wrote, in Invercargill, Dunedin, Wellington, and Napier. In the pamphlet Mr. McGregor goes into details. He shows how terribly disappointing in effects the Arbitration Act has been, and that, instead of proving a blessing, as we had hoped, it has proved to be a very great injury to New Zealand.

Senator FINDLEY.—And that is why it is so prosperous.

Senator GRAY.—New Zealand would have been prosperous under almost any kind of political maladministration. It is the garden of Australia. It has a sea-board which no other country in these seas possesses, and I suppose that it contains the richest land in the world.

Senator FINDLEY.—Had not New Zealand all these advantages before Mr. Findley came into power?

Senator GRAY.—The prosperous conditions of New Zealand have been increased by reason of the droughts prevailing in Australia, and also by reason of the increase of the export trade to South Africa. It may by legislation retard a country's progress, but you can hardly kill it. I do not say that the arbitration laws of New Zealand have in any sense killed the prosperity of that country, or that they have retarded it, but the opinion of these gentlemen is the effect that those laws have been an injury rather than otherwise to the progress of their country.

Senator FINDLEY.—The opinion of New Zealand, as a whole, is infinitely preferable to the opinion of one or two of its citizens.

Senator GRAY.—Even in this event the Herald there is a cablegram, which is pertinent to the point which I am making, reports that—

Mr. Ben. Tillett, secretary of the London Dockers' Union, submitted an important resolution to the thirty-seventh annual Congress of the Trades' Unions, now sitting at Leeds. He proposed the appointment of a Minister of Industry and the establishment of an Advisory Board of Conciliation and Arbitration, with a provision that it should be optional for unions and employers to register under compulsory or voluntary arbitration sections. Mr. Tillett, in the course of his speech quoted the satisfactory working of Arbitration Acts in New Zealand and some of the Australian States. Much opposition was given to the arbitration portion of the resolution, mainly on the ground that it would be unwise on the part of the unions to make it impossible. The proposal affirming the desirability of conciliation and arbitration was adopted.

tived, on a division, by delegates representing trades unionists in the following numbers:—Against, 869,000; For, 383,000. Majority against, 486,000.

Senator DAWSON.—Do not forget that our object is to make strikes impossible.

Senator GRAY.—I quote this to show what the trade unionists of England think about the subject. Practically the vote shows that the opinion against compulsory arbitration is more than double the opinion in favour of it.

Senator PEARCE.—Is the honorable senator aware that the majority has been dwindling every year?

Senator GRAY.—Is the majority this year lower than the majority last year?

Senator PEARCE.—Yes.

Senator GRAY.—Then it is very little lower. I am quoting these facts in order that we may be guided to a practical conclusion. I believe that if we could prevent strikes by means of an Arbitration Bill, it would be a very great blessing indeed. But I do not believe that it is so.

Senator FINDLEY.—It has been so in New Zealand.

Senator GRAY.—I believe, further, that arbitration laws are causing ten times more friction than occurred, and ten times the number of absolute difficulties than existed, in connexion with trade before such measures were passed. It may be said by some that that is a reason why Arbitration Courts should be brought into existence. But I contend that it shows that those who are interested, not only in trade unions, but in connexion with the Labour Party, generally find, in many instances, that it pays them well to do their best to bring about friction between employer and employé.

Senator PEARCE.—That is very unworthy.

Senator GRAY.—I speak as a business man, with some knowledge of the facts. I will give an illustration of what took place three months ago in connexion with a firm in which I am interested. This firm employs between forty-five and fifty coopers. A deputation waited upon the firm and asked whether the employers were aware that two of their coopers were non-union men. We stated that we knew nothing about that, and that all we wanted to know was that these men did their duty properly. They had been working for the firm for fifteen months, and they had wives and children at home. They had been working in perfect harmony with the unionists during the whole time they had been there. But the members of the deputation gave it to be understood that if those two non-unionist men were not discharged, they would call out the other coopers. The remarkable thing was that these two men had applied over and over again to be admitted into the trade union, and were rejected. In the very same week the secretary wrote, asking the two unionists to call at his office, and they were at once admitted to the union. Mr. Watson, the late Prime Minister, and Mr. Hughes, the late Minister of External Affairs, have both said that they are opposed to the action taken by that union. They have publicly stated that they would not approve of converting the unions into what I may call close boroughs. But I give this illustration to show that there was a case in which a union used its authority in order to endeavour to turn these two men, who had wives and children to provide for, into the streets, so far as they were concerned.

Senator PEARCE.—One swallow does not make a summer.

Senator GRAY.—No; it does not. But the instance shows that these gentlemen hold positions which depend to some extent upon their getting up disputes here, there, and everywhere. Much friction has been caused which would not have existed had not the Arbitration Court been in existence. The experience in New South Wales has been that the whole of the trading community is, I was going to say, absolutely disgusted with the verdicts that have been given by the Arbitration Court, and also at the frivolous manner in which the affairs of that Court have been conducted. I will not say more, because the Judicial Bench of Australia is worthy of respect. We are proud of it, and I believe that the President of the Court to which I have alluded is carrying out his duties faithfully according to his views, although to many of us it is unaccountable how he arrives at the verdicts which he has given. When the Arbitration Bill comes before the Senate, I trust that it will be dealt with not in a party spirit, but in a spirit broad enough to allow us to resolve that it must not be made an element of danger in regard to the future prosperity and growth of Australia. I thank honorable senators for the patience with which they have listened to me, and wish to state, in conclusion, that, as long as I am a member of this Chamber, I shall try to deal with the subjects which are brought before us in a spirit which is not actuated only by the interests of party, but by the interests of the people of Australia as a whole.

Senator HENDERSON (Western Australia).—I do not intend to deal at great length with the questions that have been put before the Senate. But in listening to the Attorney-General's presentation of the policy of the Government yesterday, I could not help observing the vast contrast between his effort on that occasion and on previous occasions when I have had the pleasure of listening to him. I have no doubt that if he speaks in reply we shall hear something of a more brilliant character than that to which we listened yesterday. Perhaps the reason for his lack of vigour and of ardour was his want of sympathy with the position in which he finds himself, and with the work in hand. We cannot fail to recognise that the policy outlined by Senator Symon is very largely the policy that has been advocated for years and years by this very much maligned caucus party. Therefore, I have no particular fault to find with the policy outlined by the Government in a general sense. Nor do I intend to say anything in connexion with the personnel of the Ministry, except this: I certainly do agree with Senator Styles that of all the leaders of political thought in Australia to-day, the present Prime Minister is the least representative of the general will of the Australian people. On that account I agree that he has no right whatever to fill the position which he now occupies. But the policy of the Ministry is in very strong contrast with the platform utterances of both its leaders—because there are two of them—and of several of their more ardent followers during the past few weeks. We have read reports of meetings where the only real business has been an attempt to ridicule, and even wilfully to villify, the intentions and the general attitude of the party known in politics as the Labour Party. The policy of that party has been altogether misrepresented, and knowingly misrepresented by the persons who have been making those utterances. A member of the Senate has publicly stated that the battle of to-day is between Socialism and anti-Socialism. I refer to Senator Dobson, who made such a statement when addressing a meeting of ladies at St. Kilda. I give Senator Dobson this credit—that he uttered one or two sentences with which every one of us will heartily agree. He pointed out that those who hitherto had control of the welfare of the nation, and who were engaged in the industrial life of the country had been largely responsible for the great growth of this socialistic thought, as he characterized it.

Senator PEARCE.—In consequence of their selfishness.

Senator HENDERSON. — Through their selfishness.

Senator WALKER.—The honorable senator should not hit his own party.

Senator HENDERSON.—I am not doing so. I am merely pointing out that we have an excellent ally in Senator Dobson so long as he continues to place before the ladies and gentlemen of this country such plain truths, showing that the present day position has been arrived at simply as the result of the education of the people that has been borne in upon them by the facts with which they are daily confronted. There is one reason why I must compliment the Government and their supporters. I have tried, as an honest man will try, to steer a straight course through life. I have also tried to follow, as far as it was profitable for me to do, the advice given by men whom I considered to be infinitely and eminently capable of giving advice. But when it comes to the political arena I have an aptitude, it may be a very slow one, to somewhat think for myself, and possibly my thoughts have occasionally led me astray. When I have been reading those brilliant free-trade speeches, which have been made by the present Attorney-General, and when I have listened to eloquent protectionist speeches made by gentlemen who now sit with him in the same cabinet, I have been strengthened in the conclusion at which I arrived years ago, that on both sides they were on this one question almost faddists. I have always been led to believe that there was a ring of insincerity about the politicians—great statesmen as they may claim to be—when they stood on the platform and tried to gull the public as a whole, by preaching to them, as the primary cause of all evil, or the primary cause of all good, either one or other of the fiscal systems.

Senator DRAKE.—Whoever did that?

Senator HENDERSON.—We have men, whom I need not mention, because they are well known, who have urged that free trade or protection as the case may be, will do almost anything in the world, other than rearrange the basic principles of our Christian civilization.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator thinks it good that those gentlemen should take to fiscal peace?

Senator HENDERSON.—I think it is very good that the honorable and learned senator and his friend should have done what they have done. They have shown to the people of Australia that there has been insincerity in the whole of their advocacy—that freetrade was merely a useful bogey to trot before the people of this great nation. They have shown also that protectionists ideas do not embrace the primary question with which the mind of Australia ought to be occupied—that both systems in themselves are secondary, and very secondary, indeed, to the well-being of the people.

Senator GRAY.—We have taken a lesson out of the book of the Labour Party.

Senator HENDERSON.—I am very glad to hear that; and in a few more years I am satisfied that several more lessons will be taken out of the same book. The honorable senator who interjected will become convinced that the Labour Party have never yet asked a legislative assembly in Australia to place on the statute-book any law that is not humane in its every instinct—that has not for its ultimate object the uplifting and the general welfare of the people. Ardent leaders of freetrade and protectionists' movements hesitated not, when the Labour Party with their sunken fiscal policy came into the arena, to show how infantile were our notions, and how useless our aspirations, inasmuch as it was utterly impossible for any man to enter politics unless he made either freetrade or protection his battle cry in life. Those gentlemen, in an endeavour to show the impossibility of our position, hounded us from every platform, and now they have given the great object lesson to the people that, after all, the insincerity must be dropped, and a position adopted precisely similar to that of the Labour Party.

Senator GRAY.—Does the honorable senator say that the freetraders in his party are insincere?

Senator HENDERSON.—I say that our party is a Labour Party.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Labour Party have sunk the fiscal issue, and we have done the same.

Senator HENDERSON.—First of all, we are a Labour Party, and whatever else we may be, is a secondary consideration. There has been a good deal of fairly reasonable banter in connexion with the political machine—that instrument by which we are brought together, and through which our deliberations are transmitted from one to another. Senator Millen when speaking, referred in a disparaging tone to our machine politics, and I interjected that he had endeavoured to enter public life by means of the influence of that very machine. It was then the disturbance arose, the honorable senator stating that what I had said was false. Probably, judging from his intentions from the beginning, it may have been false, but to me it certainly appeared very correct indeed, inasmuch as on the 9th November, 1893, I sat in the next chair to Senator Millen at a large conference, which lasted for two days, of representatives of labour leagues, who were perfecting this machinery for the purpose of making our political existence sure. Senator Millen was then a delegate of the Labour Party, and if my memory serves me right he represented the Carters' Union of Bourke, New South Wales. Those are the facts on which I base my impression, and if the honorable senator's own position was false, that, of course, is not my fault.

Senator DOBSON.—We can change our minds, but honorable members opposite cannot change theirs.

Senator HENDERSON.—The honorable and learned senator can change his mind very accommodatingly sometimes. I am somewhat pleased that the Government have placed so early in their programme the further consideration of the Arbitration Bill. Notwithstanding some of the remarks which have been made, I sincerely hope that that Bill will not pass in anything like its present shape. I should not like us as a Senate to do anything that would appear a travesty on legislation, and in its present form this Bill is utterly impotent, and very far from realising the anticipations of people who are to be guided and controlled by it. It would be better to put it at once into the waste-paper basket rather than pass it in its present shape. I hope with Senator Gray that the Bill will leave this chamber as perfect a measure as our intelligence can make it, so that we may effect the object we have in view, namely, the prevention of the unsettling of any industrial arrangements on which the whole of our people depend. We know how disastrous every disarrangement of our industries is, but there is no analogy between the position of the people of England and the people in Australia. We cannot reason from the position of the English people as to the position in industrial matters here.

Senator GRAY.—Why?

Senator HENDERSON.—To-day the private employer has not yet gone out of existence in England, but he is going out, and he is not to be found in Australia. The private employer is a mere figment—a shadow. We are the creatures of a trust and syndicate system, and our real employer is an American millionaire, or, more probably, a London millionaire.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There are very few millionaires here.

Senator HENDERSON.—But, unfortunately, they are taking away the wealth of our country. We are employed by people who are in the old country; we are controlled by managers who are paid a salary, and are, in turn, controlled by men who, in most cases, do nothing, 13,000 miles away. In England that is not the case.

Senator GRAY.—It is not the case in Australia.

Senator HENDERSON.—I have been employed as a worker in Australia for many years, and I have never yet been employed directly by a man whose interests are in Australia. I have been employed in big concerns, where thousands of men are engaged, and those concerns were always owned by people who never see Australia.

Senator WALKER.—That is in Western Australia?

Senator HENDERSON.—And New South Wales, too.

Senator DOBSON.—Would the honorable senator prefer that that capital should never have come into the country?

Senator HENDERSON.—I am not talking about capital, but about the comparison there has been an endeavour to draw between the position of Australian workers and the position of English workers, and I say that the cases are by no means analogous. Since I was a boy of very tender years there has been a form of conciliation adopted almost right throughout England. For the last thirty years there has been conciliation of a voluntary nature, but under such conditions as have made it operate almost in a compulsory way. Employers and workmen in England have for all those years had their joint committees, at which they sit at the same table, and there is that feeling of sympathy which can be created at close quarters, but which can never be created at a distance of thousands of miles.

Senator DOBSON.—That sympathy is what the Labour Party are driving out of Australia.

Senator HENDERSON.—We are not driving it out of Australia—it is out of Australia, and we seek to prevent the havoc which may result to us as industrial operatives.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator has hit the nail on the head, but his argument is dead against himself.

Senator HENDERSON.—My argument shows that the positions in the two countries are not analogous. Private employers are gradually dying out of industrial operations in England, and all are coming under the influence and power of trusts and syndicates. The result is that, whereas twelve years ago scarcely a worker in England would breathe a word in favour of compulsory arbitration, representatives at a union conference representing nearly 500,000 people have just declared in its favour.

Senator DOBSON.—The voting was two to one against compulsory arbitration.

Senator HENDERSON.—But twelve years ago there were 100 to one against compulsory arbitration. What does the English worker say? He says, "What! make strikes impossible? No!" He does not want strikes to be made impossible. We, on the other hand, hold that strikes ought to be made impossible. We want to establish a system which will keep our industrial wheels moving in sympathy and harmony with the surrounding conditions. If we desire to secure industrial peace it can be obtained by that method, and it will be infinitely more profitable to us in the end than even the fiscal peace which has been so mildly arranged by the old parties. I do not propose to make any other comment on the programme of the Government, except to express my pleasure that they intend to bring down a Bill to authorize a survey of the Trans-Australian Railway to be made. I am sorry, however, that it occupies so low a position on their programme. I believe that they will not get a chance to pass the Bill, but if they do, it shall have my ardent support. I am satisfied that, having taken the project in hand, the Government, unless a day comes when they may cease to exist—

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is in the dim and distant future.

Senator HENDERSON.—I trust the time will speedily come when not only a survey will be made, but the railway will be constructed.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator will support us in passing the Bill?

Senator HENDERSON.—I shall support the Bill, and more than that, I shall do all I can, if I am spared, to support the Government in completing what to me appears to be one of the most essential necessities to this nation.

Debate (on motion by Senator MATHE-SON) adjourned.

Senate adjourned at 9.30 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Thursday, 8 September, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I desire, with the indulgence of the House, to make a personal explanation. I have not troubled honorable members in this way before, because I think that as a rule such explanations are a mistake; but, in his speech yesterday, the Prime Minister made a statement regarding myself, which, coming from one in the high official position which he occupies, I do not feel free to ignore. His statement was to the effect that, during my term of office in the late Administration, I was most of the time absent from the House, and took little concern in its business. As my late colleagues know well, nothing could be further from the facts.

Mr. WATSON.—Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I was in the House every parliamentary day, and when not actually within this chamber, listening to excellent arguments excellently repeated, I was in the room behind, doing work for the Government and for the country in connexion with my Department. I also rendered such assistance as was required of me in shaping amendments, and in dealing with clauses. The work of the Arbitration Bill being left to very competent hands—the late Prime Minister and the late Minister of External Affairs—and the work of the Seat of Government Bill also being left to competent hands—the Prime Minister and the Minister of Home Affairs—I remembered that too many cooks may spoil the broth, and I felt that I should be doing no good by interfering in the course of debates which were already too prolonged. I have to thank the right honorable gentleman for having fathered the statement, because, although I have noticed it before as coming from anonymous sources, yesterday was the first time that it was actually and boldly put forth, and his remarks have given me an opportunity to publicly deny it. I felt the accusation very deeply, and particularly because I regarded it as a reflection upon my good faith in the circumstances under which I assumed office.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member's own newspaper, the Bulletin, was the first to repeat it.

Mr. HIGGINS.—This is the first chance I have had to refute it, and I hope that I shall not have to trouble the House with my personal affairs again.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—My remark was a random one, I admit, and was based upon proceedings in the chamber; but I most cordially accept the statement of the honorable and learned member. I see that I have quite unintentionally done him an injustice.

Mr. FRAZER.—How often was the Prime Minister here to see if the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne was or was not present?

Mr. REID.—Lately I have been here a good deal.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHINESE IN SUGAR PLANTING.

Mr. BAMFORD.—I wish to ask the Minister of Trade and Customs, without notice, if the statement which has been attributed to him, that the transfer of Chinese from the other States to the Queensland sugar fields would be a desirable policy, was made by him.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am sorry that my honorable friend has not extended to me the usual courtesy of mentioning the matter to me beforehand; but I think I can remember pretty accurately what took place on the occasion to which he refers. I presume that the statement of which he speaks is one occurring in a report in the daily press of some remarks made by me under the following circumstances:—The representatives of the newspapers came to me at the end of the day, as they generally do, to see if there were any items of news to be obtained, and among other things they asked me if there was any truth in the reports that Chinese were largely replacing kanakas on the Queensland sugar plantations. I told them that we had no knowledge of any such thing having occurred, that only one application for a bounty had been made by Chinese prior to my taking office, and that on that occasion the applicant showed that he had employed nothing but white labour. One of the reporters asked, "Do you not think it would be a good thing rather than otherwise, if the Chinese, who are competing with white persons in other industries, would take to sugar planting on their own account?" and my reply was, as nearly as I can remember, to this effect, "No doubt it would be a good thing for the States who got rid of their competition, but the people of Queensland, who are primarily interested, are those who should be consulted in the matter." I may remind my honorable friend that the migration of Chinese from one State to another is not a matter in which my Department has any concern, and I believe that the opinion which I expressed is that which he would have expressed under similar circumstances.

DEFEAT OF THE WATSON ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. THOMAS.—I wish to know whether the following passage, which appeared in the Argus of the 30th August, is a correct report of the Prime Minister's remarks:—

If I had tabled a direct motion of censure, every one of the gentlemen who voted against the Ministry on that occasion would have voted against them just the same later on.

Mr. REID.—I believe that, for once, the newspapers have reported my utterances with absolute accuracy. I was expressing an opinion which I entertained at the time, and which I still entertain.

Mr. McDONALD.—Is the right honorable gentleman aware that on the evening when he made that statement, the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, who is one of those who voted for the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, stated in Bendigo that had a no-confidence motion been moved, he would not have voted for it?

Mr. REID.—I accept the assurance of the honorable member.

CONTRACT POST-OFFICES: MELBOURNE.

Motion (by Mr. MALONEY) agreed to—

That a return be laid upon the table of the House showing—

- (1) All post-offices in the metropolitan area of Melbourne which are let by contract.
- (2) The amount paid annually in each case by the Department to the contractor.

PUBLIC SERVANTS' INCREASES.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON asked the Minister of Home Affairs, upon notice—

1. What is the opinion of the Government in regard to the annual increases of civil servants who, under State Acts, were, prior to the Constitution Act, entitled as of course to annual increases until they reached the top of their respective classes?

2. If the Government consider such servants to be so entitled, will they make provision on the Estimates for the payment of such increases during the current financial year?

3. If the Government are of opinion that such servants are not so entitled to such increases, will they obtain the opinion of the law officers on the matter and inform the House what such opinion is?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1 and 2. Officers who are entitled to automatic increases under State laws at the date of transfer to the Commonwealth are entitled to be paid such increases up to the date of the Order in Council confirming the classification of the Service, when, in accordance with the advice of the law officers of the Commonwealth, the State increases become superseded by the classification effected under the provisions of the Commonwealth Public Service Act 1902.

3. The opinion of the law officers has already been obtained, which is to the above effect.

TELEGRAPH MESSENGERS.

Mr. CHAPMAN (for Mr. EWING) asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Is he aware that under section 10 of the Post and Telegraph Act many telegraph messengers have to leave the service at eighteen years of age?

2. Have not the services of many of these officers been utilized in more advanced posts, and have not some of them become proficient telegraphic operators?

3. Will he consider the advisability of amending section 10 of the Act in order to enable the Department to retain the services of suitable messengers in the advanced positions for which they have prepared themselves?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—This matter is now under consideration.

LOCAL PREFERENCE IN GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

Mr. TUDOR (for Mr. CROUCH) asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

1. Whether he proposes to carry out the policy that in all Government contracts preference shall be given to local manufactures and products?

2. Whether he will cause to be inserted in all Government contracts a condition that goods which can be reasonably manufactured in Australia should have preference over similar articles manufactured outside?

Mr. REID.—I regret that this question, of which notice was given a long time ago, did not come before me until yesterday. It is my intention to make inquiries as to the practice which the Departments have observed in these matters during the preceding years of the Commonwealth, and I hope to be able to give some definite reply within a week or so.

RABBIT DESTRUCTION.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE asked the Prime Minister, upon notice—

If he will communicate with the State Premiers to ascertain whether any State will give facilities to Pasteur's agents to test the efficacy of chicken-cholera as a destructive agent to check and ultimately destroy the serious plague of rabbits which is so rapidly extending?

Mr. REID.—The agents have made no application to this Government. I would suggest that Pasteur's agents might communicate direct with the States Governments.

QUEENSLAND BALLOT-BOXES.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON asked the Minister of Home Affairs, upon notice—

1. Whether the police in Queensland have been paid for collecting ballot-boxes at the General election?

2. If not, why not?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows:—

All accounts received in the Home Affairs Department for services by the Queensland police have been paid, but further inquiry will be made.

MILITARY OFFICERS.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

1. Is there any truth in the rumour that he intends securing some military officers from Great Britain?

2. If so, is it owing to the superiority of the European officer over the Australian; or is it an admission of the incompetency of the Australian officer?

3. In the light of the South African experience during the Boer war, and the alleged failure of the European officers as compared with the brilliant success of the Australian officers, is the Minister justified in filling the military positions (which many people think rightfully belong to Australians) with Europeans?

Mr. McCAY.—In answer to the honorable member, I wish to say that, in the first place, I am not aware that such a rumour is in circulation. The only thing I know is that I expressed the opinion, which I still hold, that, owing to various causes, in the early future there may be a shortage of officers of higher rank to fill various positions in the Commonwealth Defence Service, and that it will be necessary for the Department of Defence to take the requisite steps to prevent that shortage occurring or continuing. The inference was founded upon that statement of mine that I had made up my mind to ask for the services of officers of the Imperial Army; but that was subsequently contradicted in the newspaper in which it was made. I have formed no such intention. As I think honorable members know, my desire has always been to officer the Australian Forces, so far as that can be done, with Australians, and it is still my feeling that that should be done. I do not say absolutely that we should not ask for officers from home, but I would certainly do so only if there were a shortage which could not otherwise be made up. In reply to questions 2 and 3, if any such officer were obtained, it would neither be owing to a belief that the European officer, as the honorable member calls him, is rank for rank superior to the Australian, nor to the idea that the Australian is incompetent.

PAPERS.

Mr. McCAY laid upon the table the following paper:—

Addition to the financial and allowance regulations of the Military Forces, dated 3rd September, 1904.

The CLERK laid upon the table the following paper:—

Return to an order of the House of the 8th September as to contract post-offices in the Melbourne metropolitan area.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—I think that the House will concur with me that it is highly desirable that the debate on the Ministerial Statement should be continued, and with the consent of honorable members who have business on the notice-paper for this afternoon, and with the concurrence of the House, I move —

That general business be postponed until after the consideration of Government business, Order of the Day No. 1.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

Debate resumed from 7th September, (vide page 4353), on motion by Mr. REID—

That the despatch from the Secretary of State, with reference to the metric system, be printed.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I think that if there is one feature of the speech of the Prime Minister yesterday upon which we can congratulate him, it is its extraordinary brevity. As to any other aspects of it, I hardly think that they would form the subject of much congratulation on the part of his supporters. In fact, to my mind, a certain proportion of honorable members sitting on the Government benches must have been filled with disappointment, both on account of the fewness of the matters referred to, and of the proposals in detail which the Prime Minister put forward. The right honorable gentleman dealt first with the crisis that has existed in this Parliament for some little time past, and stated that the late Government chose its own battle-ground in connexion with the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. He quoted a statement of mine which was made to representatives of the press in Sydney, as to the attitude that the then Government would take up if this House failed to reconsider its position in regard to the amendment adopted at the instance of the Minister of Defence. The honorable member for Grey took exception to the statement put forward by the Prime Minister, so far as its first presentation was concerned. His statement as it was first put forward would lead the public to believe that the Government had chosen the particular motion upon which they were afterwards defeated as their battle-ground, but that was very different from what was stated by myself. I stated to the representatives of the Sydney newspapers that if the House failed to reconsider the amendment adopted at the instance of the Minister of Defence, we should take their action as an intimation that our services were no longer required. That, however, was a very different thing from the proposal of some honorable members of this House to take the whole conduct of business out of the hands of the Government by refusing to go into Committee. No Government would have been worth its salt if it had submitted to an insult of that kind lying down, and therefore when the right honorable gentleman stated that we chose our own battle-ground he was some distance from the truth, so far as the particular motion which was carried against the Government was concerned.

Mr. REID.—I was referring to the clause containing the amendment to which the late Government took exception.

Mr. WATSON.—We never reached the clause. Owing to the machinations of the right honorable gentleman and those honorable members who assisted him, we had not an opportunity of reaching the clause. The right honorable gentleman and some of his supporters stated that the effect would be the same, whether we reached the clause or not. No doubt the effect was the same for their purpose, which was to dislodge the then Government by a side wind. But so far as it affected the supporters of the Arbitration Bill, the effect was very different, because if those gentlemen who supported the right honorable member in ousting the Government had honestly desired to have that Bill passed in the shape that the majority of Parliament were anxious to see it assume, they would have gone into Committee, and tried every expedient to obtain the decision of the House, and the full sense of its desires in regard to that important measure. My complaint is, however, that the right honorable gentleman and his supporters showed no desire to pass the Bill in such a shape that it would prove effective. Their sole anxiety was to take advantage of the declaration of some honorable members that they would not change their vote upon clause 48, in order to eject the Government from office. So far as I am concerned, I entertain no great regret at being thrown out of office. I never whined for office, nor have I whined at being thrown out of it, I made no improper attempt to get there, and I never went to one man with the idea of inducing him to alter his opinion, so that the Government might be retained in office. Therefore, I have no regret at being ejected from office. As one, however, who has supported the principle of conciliation and arbitration for years past, and as one who believes that if an effective measure were passed it would save the Commonwealth millions of pounds, and that it would be in the best interests of the country, I do regret that some honorable members thought fit to wreak their vengeance upon the Government by leaving the Bill to its fate. I say, therefore, that the battle ground was not of our choosing. We certainly objected, and still object, to the proposal embodied in the Bill; but I think—I may be wrong—that much greater regard would have been shown for the principle which the majority of honorable members on the other side of the House have always professed to support in regard to the Bill, and a more seemly spirit of sweet reasonableness, if they had consented to go into Committee, and to there confer as to the best means of expressing the desires of the majority. There was one feature of the Prime Minister's speech yesterday that I thought was regrettable. In speaking of the recent crisis, the right honorable gentleman was good enough to refer to myself as having tendered certain advice to His Excellency the Governor-General. Of course, the fact that the House is still in existence is sufficient evidence that that advice was not accepted. I do not wish for one moment to canvass the right of His Excellency as the representative of His Majesty the King to take whatever course he thought proper in the interests of the people of Australia. I have not the slightest doubt that the action he took was dictated by no other consideration than what he conceived to be the best interests of the community. But I say that it comes most improperly from the right honorable gentleman, who must have assured His Excellency that he could carry on the Government of this country, and that the time had not arrived for a dissolution—who must have given his assurance in explicit terms in the face of the fact that there was only a majority of two in support of the Government—to come down, and, in so many words, threaten this House with a dissolution if what?—if the Opposition did not combine with their strength the quality of mercy, if the Opposition did not extend consideration to the Government far and away greater than that extended by the right honorable gentleman and his supporters to the late Government. We were told that if we did not extend to the Government greater consideration than they gave to us, the result would be a dissolution.

Mr. KENNEDY.—We heard something of the same kind from the last Government.

Mr. WATSON.—I beg the honorable member's pardon. That is not correct.

Mr. KENNEDY.—We heard it from their supporters.

Mr. WATSON.—If any supporters of the late Government said that, they had no authority from me. On the contrary, I took the opportunity to explicitly deny, by interjection, that there was any such promise made, or any such contingency afloat.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member told the House that he would seek a dissolution.

Mr. WATSON.—Certainly. Who would object to the Prime Minister stating that he would seek a dissolution? His statement went a great deal further than that.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think it did.

Mr. WATSON.—Perhaps the right honorable gentleman is a biased observer.

Mr. McCAY.—Is not the honorable member also biased?

Mr. WATSON.—I do not think so—not to the same degree, at any rate. The action of the Prime Minister appears to me to be most improper, and certainly unprecedented. I do not remember a single instance in which a Prime Minister, upon meeting the House for the first time with his programme, practically threw out, in so many words, a threat that if the members of the Opposition did not behave themselves they would have to go about their business.

Mr. REID.—I said no such thing.

Mr. WATSON.—I refer the right honorable gentleman to the words of his own speech.

Mr. REID.—I am not the Emperor of Japan; I could not dissolve the House.

Mr. WATSON.—Probably that is a good thing for the country.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member, when he asked for a dissolution, admitted that the House was not competent to carry on the business of the country.

Mr. WATSON.—I shall argue that question when it arises. I am quite prepared to take the full responsibility of any advice I tendered in that direction. I must say that I regret exceedingly that we had not an opportunity to consult the country.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Pray leave this most distasteful subject.

Mr. WATSON.—The Prime Minister then proceeded to compare his party with honorable members in Opposition. I suppose that he was justified in speaking of his "party"; although the members who support him are certainly a heterogeneous lot.

Mr. REID.—Do not say that.

Mr. WATSON.—I think so. I do not use the term disrespectfully. Among honorable members who sit on the Government benches, there exist the most remarkable differences of opinion upon many of the leading questions before the community. I do not in any way seek to imply that such opinions are not legitimately held, or that honorable members are not honestly seeking to secure the betterment of the condition of the people; but that their opinions widely differ must be admitted by the most unprejudiced observer. The Prime Minister said that there was one great point of similarity between his supporters and the members of the Opposition, namely, that they were all democratic. We can understand the excitable ramping democracy of the honorable and learned member for Parkes, who has been noted as a democrat for many years past in New South Wales. Then there is the honorable member for Flinders, who is another raging democrat, who is anxious to put all the power in the hands of the people, and to secure absolute equality for all classes of the community. I notice, too, that even the honorable member for Corangamite shelters himself under the term "Liberal."

Mr. WILSON.—We are democrats who have not gone mad.

Mr. WATSON.—It is always safe to imply that the other fellow is just a little weak in his top storey. I do not, however, wish to say that of honorable members opposite. I do not think that my honorable friends are even politically mad. No doubt they are politically sane, so far as the interests of the people they represent are concerned. But it does sound like a travesty upon the term democrat when we find coming under its beneficent shelter the gentlemen I have indicated who are sitting in the Government corner. Sitting behind the Government also, there will be found other gentlemen who have just as little title to the term "democrat" as those to whom I have referred.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—What about the honorable member for Kooyong?

Mr. WATSON.—He is another excellent sample of a democrat. He is a most estimable gentleman, but I do not think that he would claim to be particularly imbued with democratic ideas. The honorable member for Oxley is another strong democrat, whose whole aim during the time he has been in politics has been to advance the cause of democracy. He has been pushing its interests forward with all his strength, and the only regret that remains to him is that he has been comparatively unsuccessful in his own State.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member would be proud to have the support of every one of them.

Mr. WATSON.—If I had their support, it would be a clear indication that I was at last going wrong in my public career. The right honorable gentleman, passing from that vain attempt to prove similarity between the two parties to an endeavour to accentuate the points of difference, said that the great primary distinction between the supporters of the Government and the Opposition was that the former did not believe in a caucus. We are given to understand that the Government conduct their business in quite a different way. There is no bringing of their supporters into consultation, that a proper result may be arrived at. They manage these matters at present. I understand, not by the domination of one man, but by the domination of two half men. They arrange their business on the basis of the two heads of the Government being "equal in all things," and these two honorable gentlemen seem to manage the concern for the rest of the party.

Mr. THOMAS.—It saves trouble, so far as the rest are concerned.

Mr. WATSON.—Certainly it does; but the thinking machine is liable to become rusty if not occasionally agitated, and such a thing may perhaps happen to the supporters of the Government. There is one feature of the right honorable gentleman's statement that certainly calls for remark from me. Some considerable time ago—I think it was when addressing a rather innocent audience at Warragul, in the Federal electorate of Flinders—the right honorable gentleman stated that the policy of the Watson Government was put together in the vaults. The Prime Minister has rather a weakness for graphic forms of expression, and we can understand the attractiveness of the word "vaults" to a man who is given to vaulting so regularly over any obstacle, no matter how high it may be. I think it was on the day following the making of that speech that I made a clear and distinct statement to the press to the effect that the policy of the Government of which I was the head was determined by the Ministry, without reference to any outside person—without reference to even an extra leader, or kind of fifth wheel to the coach, a practice which, we are told, obtains in the present Ministry. In any case, the programme of the late Ministry was prepared without reference to any outside person, and was subsequently placed before the supporters of the Government at a meeting held, not in the vaults of this House, but in the ordinary meeting-room.

Mr. REID.—What does the Labour Party do at these meetings?

Mr. WATSON.—I shall come to that matter in the course of a few moments. I do not wish to be drawn away from the point that, to my mind, it is a regrettable feature of public life that, when a definite statement is made, to which an equally definite denial is given, that denial is not accepted clearly and without reservation.

Mr. REID.—I have not seen the newspaper statement to which the honorable member refers.

Mr. WATSON.—It appeared two days after the statement made by the right honorable gentleman.

Mr. REID.—I can assure the honorable member that I do not read the newspapers regularly, but that I would accept any statement made by him, whether made through the medium of a newspaper, or in any other way.

Mr. WATSON.—It is very good of the right honorable gentleman to say that. As a matter of fact, there was no necessity for the late Ministry to go before the caucus, for the simple reason that the policy on which the members of the Labour Party had been elected to this Parliament was well known to all. So long as no attempt was made to depart from that policy, there was no occasion to consult members of the caucus or of the party individually in regard to it. The members of the Party had sufficient confidence in the late Ministry—and would have had sufficient confidence in any other Ministry formed from its ranks—to believe that they would stand by the policy to which its members had pledged themselves when before the country. In these circumstances, there was no necessity for the late Government to do more than tell their supporters what particular portion of their policy they hoped to carry out in the immediate future, and how much of it would necessarily have to be left in abeyance until the time arrived to take action.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The caucus never instructed the late Government, even in regard to that matter.

Mr. WATSON.—I must say that I was treated with a generosity which certainly was never excelled by the supporters of any Prime Minister of the Commonwealth, or of the Premier of any of the States. No member of the Party ever approached me in regard to the personnel of the Ministry which I was about to form, or in reference to the programme which we should insist on carrying out. This, perhaps, is not a matter of public importance, but it is only right that the facts should be stated. The Prime Minister attempted to make some capital out of the alleged power exercised over members of the Labour Party by the Labour Leagues, and the honorable and learned member for Ballarat traversed the same ground in a speech which he delivered some little time ago. For public men who have been acquainted to a greater or lesser extent with the Labour Party and its organizations for a number of years—and certainly the Prime Minister has been very closely identified on some occasions with the Labour Party—

Mr. SPENCE.—He was “in the hollow of their hand.”

Mr. WATSON.—I believe that the right honorable gentleman confessed that he was at one time in that position. It is strange that such gentlemen should exhibit so much ignorance as to what are the relations between the Labour Leagues and members of the Labour Party.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—It is not ignorance, but something worse.

Mr. REID.—That is rather a vulgar assertion.

Mr. WATSON.—I scarcely like to assume that these honorable gentlemen would be guilty of deliberate misrepresentation; but the statement having been reiterated yesterday, it is proper that I should in a few words, state exactly what the facts are. In the first place, the programme of proposed legislation which the Labour Party will support is agreed to by a conference at which every supporter of the party, whether a unionist or non-unionist, may be represented. I am glad to say that the vast bulk of the support of the Labour Party comes from the ranks of the non-unionists—from men who, while not actively opposed to unionism, are certainly not at present included within its ranks. Every person who supports the programme of the Labour Party has an opportunity to be represented, either through the agency of a labour league or by a union, at the conference to which I have referred.

Mr. FISHER.—Farmers have been represented at such conferences.

Mr. WATSON.—I am pleased to say that we receive substantial support from the farmers of New South Wales and Queensland. When the programme is agreed to, it is, of course, laid down that every person desiring to stand as a labour candidate must first subscribe to that programme—it would not be of much use for a man to appear as a labour candidate if he did not—and, secondly, he must pledge himself, if not selected by the organization, to stand down in favour of the selected candidate.

Mr. WILKS.—The Labour Party have two platforms—a fighting programme and a propaganda.

Mr. WATSON.—Quite so. We have one programme for immediate action, while the other is a declaration of principle; but it makes no difference to the position of the candidate. He is asked to express his belief in the whole programme.

Mr. WILKS.—He takes the lot.

Mr. WATSON.—That is so. From the time a candidate is elected on that programme, until he again comes before the league for selection, that league has no power over him. Its members trust to his honesty, and to the honesty of those associated with him in the Parliament, to carry out the programme on which he has been returned. There is no domination in the slightest degree by the outside leagues or organizations of the Labour Party.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But they can pass resolutions.

Mr. WATSON.—Certainly; but do not the supporters of the right honorable member occasionally pass resolutions?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They do not.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—In Western Australia they have passed several resolutions in regard to the right honorable member.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They have never passed any about me.

Mr. WATSON.—I was about to say, when this cross-firing commenced, that it was absolutely incorrect for persons to assume or to state that any power over members of Parliament exists in the hands of any labour organization, except in this degree—that, as the right honorable gentleman stated yesterday, if those members do not give satisfaction, they may not be again selected to stand for Parliament. What sort of a man is he who is afraid to face those who are in agreement with him in regard to every detail of his political programme? What man is there who, being honest, and anxious to carry out the principles to which he has pledged himself before the electors, would fear to face those who necessarily must be prejudiced in his favour, seeing that they are in thorough harmony and agreement with him on all the material issues that come up for public discussion? The members of the Labour Party share the liability to rejection equally with every other member of this House. The right honorable gentleman finds it convenient to talk about machine politics as applied to the Labour Party, but he seeks to gloss over the operations of equally objectionable machine politics among the ranks of his old-time supporters. Let us recall to mind the case to which he referred yesterday—the case of a member of the State Parliament of New South Wales, who was one of the most faithful supporters of the party which the right honorable gentleman led so ably and so long, and who, in regard to both loyalty and service, deserved well of the party. The machine—the local organization—selected another man.

Mr. WATKINS.—By ballot?

Mr. WATSON.—Yes. They ran a gentleman in opposition to Mr. Hawthorne for the electorate of Leichardt, and, notwithstanding that the leader of the party which is now heir to the ideals of the right honorable member for East Sydney—Mr. Carruthers—had received every support and assistance from Mr. Hawthorne—notwithstanding that Mr. Hawthorne had been as loyal to his new leader as he was to his old one—

Mr. McDONALD.—For sixteen years!

Mr. WATSON.—Notwithstanding that he had given this support to his leaders for sixteen years, the machine was so strong that not only was another man brought out against him, but the leader of the party spoke against his old henchman. The accusation may be made against the Labour Party that they are governed by organizations; but I say, without the slightest hesitation, that if a man had been loyal to the party of which I was leader, I should never speak against him. The “machine” might do as it pleased, but, whatever else I might do, I certainly should not be guilty of such an action. I am not putting this forward against the machine. Unfortunately, some kind of machine or organization is necessary.

Mr. CHANTER. — To which of the machines is the honorable member now referring?

Mr. WATSON.—I was referring to the machine called, I believe, the "Liberal and Reform Association of New South Wales." We shall shortly learn how far that "reform" will go.

Mr. REID.—What is the name of the newly-formed alliance between the Opposition and honorable members in the Opposition corner?

Mr. WATSON.—It is a Liberal and Labour alliance. I repeat that so-called machines are necessary and are universally employed. The Prime Minister himself used a machine at the last elections in New South Wales. I am told that it was not quite so effective in this State, but in New South Wales we had the free-trade organization working hotly and strongly for him. I do not blame them; but what I do object to is the political hypocrisy of which men are guilty when they come here and object to the Labour Party as an organization per se, while they themselves use the machine, and, as in the case of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, bring into existence yet another organization to remedy the defects of that already existing.

Mr. REID.—It is only the despotism of an enlightened democracy.

Mr. WATSON.—I think that the decision of a Committee appointed in part by the right honorable gentleman before the last Federal election, and in part by gentlemen who had previously appointed themselves a committee, is a form of despotism a little more complete than the organization of the Labour Party, in connexion with which every individual may join a labour league, and may in that league have his direct vote by ballot to decide whether a particular candidate shall be run for Parliament.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The only difficulty about it is that it is not true. That is all.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is true. It has been done all through New South Wales.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the honorable member for Parramatta, if I correctly understood him to say that something which was said by the honorable member for Bland is untrue, to withdraw that statement.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I certainly withdraw the statement. I made it in no personal sense.

Mr. WATSON.—I quite accept the explanation of the honorable member for Parramatta that he did not intend any imputation on my trustworthiness.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Merely that the statement was not one of fact.

Mr. WATSON.—Just so. What I understand is that one-half of the committee was appointed from members of Parliament, presumably on the initiative of the right honorable member for East Sydney, and the other half from organizations consisting of a number of gentlemen who were not representatives of leagues or organizations existing throughout New South Wales.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is that the statement the honorable gentleman made before?

Mr. WATSON.—I think it is nearly the same. I have no wish to say any more on that point. I come now to deal with the Prime Minister's statement that another great difference between the members of his party and the Labour Party is that the latter believed in socialistic legislation. The right honorable gentleman referred to some remarks I made in reply to a deputation from the May Day demonstrators.

Mr. MAUGER.—Did the right honorable gentleman bring that up again?

Mr. WATSON.—Yes, but not in quite the same terms as those in which it was previously referred to. I was quoted as stating that the time was not ripe to enter upon a general socialistic propaganda, but that one might begin with the plum that was in a condition fit to pluck—the tobacco monopoly. The way in which that was referred to by the right honorable gentleman would lead people to believe that some great public wrong was likely to be inflicted if the tobacco monopoly were nationalized. The Prime Minister did not proceed to explain exactly of what the tobacco monopoly consists, or how far it is necessary in the public interests that some steps should be taken in order to clip the wings and cut the claws of that and kindred monopolies.

Mr. MAUGER.—Or that a Select Committee of the Victorian Legislative Assembly recommended the nationalization of the tobacco industry some years ago.

Mr. WATSON.—That is so, but the question has developed very materially since that Select Committee inquired into it.

Mr. MAUGER.—The position is much worse now.

Mr. WATSON.—Then the monopoly existed in a comparatively innocuous form. It was then practically confined to one State, and was not there complete; but to-day the tobacco monopoly has its tentacles over every State in the Commonwealth.

Mr. HUGHES.—It is a real monopoly.

Mr. WATSON.—It is an actual monopoly. It is not one to which the term may be applied merely in a general way; because it has now become actually and specifically a monopoly, and is taking advantage of the people at both ends.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why does the honorable gentleman support it?

Mr. WATSON.—My method of supporting it is to transfer its control to the national Government of Australia at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable gentleman subscribes to its funds.

Mr. WATSON.—I admit that I indulge in tobacco, if that is the insinuation of the honorable member; but beyond that, I do not support the trust. So far as Australia is concerned, I believe that, no matter what form of Tariff we have, and no matter what other steps we take short of the nationalization of some of these industries, we are bound to have enormous monopolies batten- ing upon the people, and taking advantage of them at every opportunity. Are we to stand idly by and impotently lament that these things should be, or are we to seize the nettle resolutely, and determine that if there is to be a monopoly—and in many cases I admit that monopolies cheapen production, so far as manufacture is concerned—it shall be in the hands of the people, and controlled for the benefit of the people? The Prime Minister went on then to refer to another socialistic proposal of the late Government, namely that we propose to take some £8,000,000 sterling belonging to the banks—

Mr. WILKS.—Has not the new combination opposite thrown that over?

Mr. WATSON.—Not that I am aware of.

Mr. McCAY.—It is not in the joint scheme.

Mr. WATSON.—There is plenty of time; we do not propose to deal with the matter this session.

Mr. REID.—I notice that there is something about "social status" in the joint scheme. Where did honorable members opposite get that phrase? Possibly they could not express what they intended in English.

Mr. WATSON.—I should like to remind the Prime Minister that what he terms a socialistic proposal in regard to banking legislation—

Mr. REID.—I did not say that it was socialistic.

Mr. WATSON.—I think the right honorable gentleman did. He was referring generally to the socialistic proposals put forward by the late Government, and included in the number the proposal to take £8,000,000 belonging to the banks. I say that that financial policy has been given effect to, as I indicated some time ago, for over thirty-four years in Canada—a country where, so far, at all events, there has not been any great progress on the road to Socialism.

Mr. REID.—They were very hard up for money at the time they adopted it.

Mr. WATSON.—They were, but in view of the indebtedness of Australia, and of the fact that we have to cut down in every direction in order to balance our finances, one would think that we were not too flush of money at the present time.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Hear, hear. We starve the members of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. WATSON.—I propose to refer the Prime Minister to a statement made by the present Treasurer when delivering his budget in 1901. At page 5693 of Hansard for 1901 the right honorable gentleman is reported to have said—

I have looked at the Canadian system. It is said that instead of borrowing money we ought to take ten or twelve millions of gold which the banks have lying in their coffers.

I said only eight, or less than eight millions.

In Canada they compel the banks to keep a reserve—I do not think we do—but they provide that a certain portion of that reserve must be kept in the Dominion's notes. By that means they get the use of a considerable amount of money without paying any interest. On the face of it, it appears to be a fair proposal, and that no harm is done.

Mr. McCAY. — The right honorable gentleman said, "on the face of it."

Mr. WATSON.—I propose to quote the right honorable gentleman fully. The honorable and learned member for Corinella need not be afraid that I shall do the Treasurer any injustice.

Mr. REID.—I know the right honorable gentleman's present opinion on the subject.

Mr. WATSON.—The right honorable gentleman further said—

But until I get the fullest information I am not going to rush into any scheme of the kind.

Mr. REID.—Hear, hear!

Mr. WATSON.—The report goes on—

Mr. O'MALLEY.—It is a splendid scheme.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—In theory I admit it is splendid, but I do not know that in practice it works out well. I have sent to Canada to get the fullest information with regard to the working of the scheme.

Mr. REID.—Hear, hear! There is no duty on bank notes there. We get a revenue from a duty on bank notes here.

Mr. WATSON.—That is so, but in Canada, as the right honorable gentleman is probably aware, the Government issue all notes below the denomination of five dollars. They issue one, two, and four-dollar notes against which they, practically speaking, hold no reserve.

Mr. REID.—That is a very bad system.

Mr. WATSON.—They hold no reserve up to nine million dollars. But after that issue is reached, they hold a certain reserve, increasing as the issue increases. Up to an issue of nine million dollars, which it is believed the country can fairly carry without any risk, they hold no reserve at all. What I desire to point out is that the present Treasurer, in 1901, thought that that, on the face of it, was a fair scheme. The right honorable gentleman had not, I admit, gone fully into it, but he led the House to believe that he considered it favorably, so far as he had then gone, and he intended to refer to Canada for further information. But, of course, the right honorable gentleman has got into different company since then.

Mr. REID.—The right honorable gentleman got the information long before he joined me.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes; but the right honorable gentleman had not declared against this scheme before he joined the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. REID.—The right honorable gentleman has not done so yet.

Mr. WATSON.—I can quite understand, when so many members of the present Reid-McLean Administration are sinking their convictions in so many directions, the right honorable member for Balaclava must sink some portion of his.

Mr. TUDOR.—The members of the Government will sink themselves in the end.

Mr. REID.—And will come up again smiling. It is all in a life-time.

Mr. WATSON.—I come now to deal with the practical proposals of the Government. I regret that I have taken up so much time in the introductory portion of my observations, but in that I have merely followed the example of the Prime Minister, who yesterday devoted the greater part of the admittedly short time he took up, to general matters outside of his programme.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is the honorable gentleman going to continue to imitate the Prime Minister?

Mr. WATSON.—Only in so far as the right honorable gentleman is right. The first definite statement we had in the right honorable gentleman's speech yesterday was with regard to Preferential Trade. The Prime Minister says that he takes up the position taken up by the Deakin Government in respect to Preferential Trade.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—And that involves the raising of duties to the foreigner.

Mr. WATSON.—This is a most interesting alteration of policy on the part of the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. REID.—The honorable gentleman does not complete what I said in respect of waiting for a definite proposal from the Imperial Government.

Mr. WATSON.—That was an addition to the statement first put forward, and not retracted, that the position taken up by the Deakin Government on the subject of Preferential Trade was the position adopted by the present Administration. I say that this discloses a most interesting state of affairs.

Mr. MAUGER.—Because that was to raise the duties against foreigners.

Mr. REID.—Some of the newspapers say that I have dropped it altogether.

Mr. WATSON.—I desire to have some clear understanding as to what policy in this matter the present Government has taken up. If there is to be any emendation of the statement put forward yesterday, the sooner it is made the better in the interests of the public generally. I am quite willing that the position of the Government in this matter should be cleared up now. If the statement I heard yesterday is correct, that the policy of the Deakin Government is taken up, I desire to know what is the opinion of the honorable and learned member for Werriwa on the subject? Is that honorable and learned member prepared to support the proposal of the Deakin Government to raise duties against foreigners? Personally, I am in favour of it.

Mr. MCCAY.—What does the honorable and learned member for West Sydney say to that?

Mr. WATSON.—I am quite prepared to increase the duties; but I wish to know is it the Government decision to follow the Deakin proposal in that regard?

Mr. MAUGER.—They say—No.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not know what they say. That was the statement yesterday.

Mr. REID.—No.

Mr. WATSON.—I am sorry if I have misunderstood the right honorable gentleman. If that is not the position, are we to assume that the honorable and learned member for Ballarat is going to acquiesce in the lowering of the duties at present existing in favour of British goods?

Mr. DEAKIN.—Who said so?

Mr. WATSON.—Only two positions are possible, even to this Government. Even this Administration cannot take up more than one of two positions on this question, and it must be one or other of the two positions which I have mentioned.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member is all astray.

Mr. WATSON.—I am asking what the Government propose to do, and whether they do not propose to do what I heard yesterday was their intention. I am free to admit that the versatility of the right honorable gentleman is equal to all emergencies, but I hardly think that it is possible, even for him, to find more than two paths to follow in relation to this particular matter.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We should know what their policy is, at any rate.

Mr. REID.—Is this a caucus?

Mr. WATSON.—Perhaps for an explanation of the other aspect of this particular question we should look to the other head of the Government. When, a little later, the Minister of Trade and Customs speaks, he may supplement the statement of the Prime Minister in regard to preferential trade with an amended proposal which will be distinct from that which we heard yesterday; but, in the absence of such an amended statement, I am forced to the conclusion that those who followed the Prime Minister originally are now being asked to back down upon their ideas of preferential trade, and to submit to the duties being raised against the foreigner.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No.

Mr. WATSON.—If that is so, I congratulate them upon having come to an opinion which I share, and which I have shared for a considerable time past.

Mr. THOMAS.—The Government is solid only on the trade marks measures.

Mr. WATSON.—I regret the decision of the Government to postpone the passing of the High Commissionership Bill until next session.

Mr. McCOLL.—It is a wise decision.

Mr. WATSON.—It seems to me an unwise decision.

Mr. REID.—It is certainly an un-Wise decision.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not know that there would be any greater wisdom in an appointment which might be made in another direction. It is possibly because of the unpopularity, if not unwisdom, of some appointment that the Bill is not being proceeded with. In my opinion, it is certainly a proper thing to have a High Commissioner in London at the earliest opportunity possible. I have held the view that true economy in this relation consists in having a Federal representative in the heart of the Empire as soon as we can, and that the cry about the expense is a paltry matter when it is recollected that we shall be able to do without the services of the Agents-General of the States if the High Commissioner is appointed.

Mr. McCOLL.—We cannot dispense with the services of the Agents-General of the States, though the Governments of the States may do so.

Mr. WATSON.—If a Commonwealth officer is appointed, who will be competent to perform, for one-sixth or one-fourth of their salaries, the work which the Agents-General of the States are now doing, public opinion will force the Governments of the States to make use of his services in order to save expense.

Mr. McCOLL.—But this House has no control over the States in regard to the appointment of Agents-General.

Mr. REID.—Would not friendly negotiations with the States be better than an attempt to force the change upon them? I think that, in the first instance at any rate, it would be better to proceed by negotiation.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not see any objection to friendly negotiation, but, seeing how much time has already elapsed, it is rather too late to proceed in that way now. Australia has already suffered through having no proper representative in London. In my view, the acts of this Parliament have been misunderstood and grossly misrepresented in London, and that could have been avoided if we had had some one there able to speak with authority on behalf of Australia, as to what our aims and our intentions really were. I was informed, only a couple of days ago, of an instance in which an Agent-General, speaking in London, showed himself absolutely ignorant of the terms of the Constitution, and thereby conveyed an altogether false impression to the people to whom he was speaking as to the powers of this Federation. This is a most unfortunate state of affairs. The least we should expect from any gentleman appointed to that high position is that he would be fit to interpret to the people of England our Constitution, and the legislation under it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Interpret our Constitution?

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member knows what I mean. He should not make any gross errors in regard to it. But in the case to which I refer, a gross error was made. I am sorry, therefore, that the Government have seen fit to postpone the passing of the High Commissioner Bill, and the appointment of a High Commissioner. I believe that to be false economy. I do not think that there would be any friction with the Governments of the States if a High Commissioner were appointed. On the contrary, anxiety would be shown at an early date to take advantage of the facilities which his office in London would afford. There is another measure referred to in the Ministerial statement upon which I should like to say a word or two, and that is the Iron Bonus Bill. We have been told that the question of the granting of an iron bonus is to be an open one with the Government. The right honorable gentleman seemed to be rather concerned yesterday as to the opinions of those in Opposition upon this highly important question. I at once say that I have been opposed to the granting of bonuses to private individuals, just as a number of the members of the Ministry, and a number of those who are supporting the Ministry, have been opposed to it. But I have never been unprepared to take the opinion of the House in regard to that question as in regard to other questions. In my view it is one in regard to which a difference of opinion may legitimately exist. I give way to none in my anxiety to see the iron industry successfully established in Australia; but I differ from those who think that the best way to establish it is to pay large bonuses out of the public Treasury to private individuals. I was, however, prepared to bow to the decision of the House on the question, both before I took office and while I was a Minister. The policy of the last Administration in regard to that measure was not parallel with the course proposed to be followed by the present Government. The Prime Minister, in common with, and almost in company with, the honorable member for Ballarat, has for months past been impressing upon the electors of Australia that what is needed in this country is to restore responsible government and majority rule; that that is the one thing necessary, and the great end to which all energies should be bent. Judging by the appearance of the benches in this chamber, both yesterday and to-day, it does not look as though majority rule has been achieved, and certainly one cannot say that it was responsible government which the right honorable member emphasized yesterday. He spoke about the example of the British Parliament in this matter; but responsible government is not achieved by a decision such as that of the Ministry in respect to the Iron Bonus Bill. The right honorable gentleman was frank enough to say that there is no rule, no matter how good, to which there may not be exceptions. These exceptions appear to be getting rather frequent, and are made nearly always when it is convenient that there should be an exception. I myself have no complaint against the proposed treatment of the Iron Bonus Bill; but it must be a sore disappointment to those outside who have followed the Prime Minister blindly, believing that when he obtained office he would give them this much-vaunted responsible government—what it may be worth I do not know, but they seem to think that there is something in it—and now find that they have been left in the lurch. Perhaps we have an explanation in their attitude towards this question of the disinclination of the Government to meet its followers in caucus. The right honorable gentleman stated yesterday that it has not been their practice so far to meet in caucus, and we could understand the difficulties of a caucus on the Iron Bonus Bill if the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, and the honorable member for Lang division, or the honorable and learned member for Werriwa, and the honorable member for Echuca were present. We can understand that it would not be wise to bring these full-grown tigers into so small an arena.

Mr. REID.—It would not be more incongruous than to bring the honorable member, the honorable and learned member for West Sydney, and the honorable member for Hume together.

Mr. WATSON.—Our contempt of responsible government, as the right honorable member seems to understand it, and has advocated it throughout the country, was not disguised. I have never made any pretence of regard for responsible government as it has been understood and written about in British communities for many years past. I see no virtue in it per se. The right honorable gentleman, however, has taken quite a different stand. He seems to me to have tried to persuade the people that if they achieved responsible government all their troubles would disappear as if by magic. Now, however, that opportunity has been taken from them, because in dealing with the Iron Bonus Bill he proposes to drop it as inconvenient.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—All coalitions have their little differences—even the Opposition coalition.

Mr. REID.—There is one little difficulty that might be fixed up. Who is to be leader of the Opposition?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The right honorable gentleman need not worry; he will find out.

Mr. WATSON.—Upon that head, we shall not have half the difficulty that seems to have confronted the right honorable gentleman some little time ago. There is one remarkable statement in the speech of the Prime Minister that is another striking commentary upon this cry for responsible government. The right honorable gentleman said, by way of apology for the small programme that he was putting forward, that if there was anything else for which time could be found, and which the House desired, the Government would afford opportunities for its discussion. That is responsible government with a vengeance. The Prime Minister said, in effect, "Gentlemen, we present a programme to you; if it does not suit it can be altered, or extended, or anything else done, so long as we remain in office." I must say that that struck me as a rather peculiar way of reintroducing responsible government.

Mr. REID.—There is no more consistent man in Australia than I am.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not make any reflections upon that head, but I cannot quite harmonize the statement that room will be found for anything in the Ministerial wagon so long as the House gives some reasonable indication of its desires, with the claim that responsible government will be restored. That appears to me tantamount to saying that responsible government can go hang.

Mr. REID.—I did not say that.

Mr. WATSON.—I defy any one to attach any other meaning to what the right honorable gentleman said. For myself I can conceive of no other, and I should like to hear an explanation of that phrase.

Mr. REID.—I shall make a note of it.

Mr. WATSON.—I should like to hear each of the Government supporters getting up in turn and trying to explain by thorough dissection exactly what that phrase means, if it does not mean what I have said. We were told yesterday that every endeavour would be made to establish cordial relations between the Commonwealth Government and the States Governments.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—As if they were not already established.

Mr. WATSON.—I was just about to say that I was not aware that any Government so far had failed in the endeavour to act in the most generous fashion towards the various States Governments. I have certainly heard no complaint from any of the States Governments upon this head.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Mr. Bent does not seem to think that the relations have been satisfactory.

Mr. WATSON.—So far as Mr. Bent is concerned, his bark is very much worse than his bite. According to my own experience, whilst Mr. Bent has occasionally spoken about the awfulness of the Federal Government—and he will probably speak in just the same way of the present Government in a little while—I have found him most easy to work with in regard to matters which concern both the Commonwealth and the State of Victoria. I succeeded in settling up several matters which had been in abeyance for some years, and which I wished to have disposed of upon equitable terms, so far as both Governments were concerned. Therefore, while it is true, as the honorable member for Lang has indicated, that Mr. Bent may have made some random remarks about the Commonwealth Government spending money they were not entitled to, so far as the actual relations between the two Governments are concerned, they were of the most cordial character.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Perhaps Mr. Bent was misreported.

Mr. WATSON.—He may have been; but in any case I do not know of any real complaint. Further than that, so far as the States Governments generally were concerned, there was no exception taken, or any ground for taking exception, to the administration of the last Government. And I heard nothing as to the relations of the previous Government with the States Governments being unsatisfactory. Therefore, the Prime Minister appears to me to convey quite a wrong impression when he states that every endeavour will be made to establish cordial relations with the various States Governments. I do not wish to say a great deal more with regard to the programme of the Government. The Prime Minister, when speaking at Warragul some time ago, referred to the programme of the late Ministry as a crawling programme. If that term was justifiably applied to the programme of the late Government, which included some debatable matter—something over which a fight might be made—surely it could be applied with tenfold force to the wretched programme which the Prime Minister has put forward, which is not calculated to offend the meekest individual in the community.

Mr. REID.—That is what makes it so indigestible.

Mr. WATSON.—The right honorable gentleman talked about the crawling programme of the late Ministry. One would imagine that he was the knight valiant, who was going to put forward a programme when he had an opportunity—when the “chap to save the country” was called on—about which there would be no cavil, and which would range all the forces of righteousness on his side. The mountain has been in labour, and what is the result? This programme is significant quite as much in respect of its omissions as for what it contains. On the occasion of the last election, we heard from the right honorable gentleman some statements about the administration of the legislation of the then Government. When he made the opening speech of the campaign at the Protestant Hall, Sydney, on 13th October, 1903, he stated that the contract labour provisions of the Immigration Restriction Act, and the prohibition of coloured labour on steamships, constituted blots upon the prospects of Australia. We were told by inference, if not explicitly, that this was the reason that immigration had fallen off, why people barred Australia when they desired to settle in a new country and make homes for themselves. The right honorable gentleman said he would not rest until these blots upon our statute-book were removed, that no effort of his would be spared to alter both the legislation and the administration in these regards. Now, we have a most significant silence in regard to these important matters—important in our eyes, as they were held to be important by the right honorable gentleman a short while ago. We hold them to be important, because we believe that the best interests of Australia are bound up in their retention, whereas the right honorable gentleman regards it as important that they should be abolished. I ask why there is no mention in this programme of any proposal to deal with either of these important matters?

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable and learned member for Ballarat will not permit it.

Mr. WATSON.—Is it that the stress which the right honorable gentleman laid four months ago upon administration, is to find expression in the action of himself and his colleagues in the Departments? Are they content to rely on administration for effecting their purposes, instead of coming down to Parliament fairly and openly and asking for the reversal of the previous decisions? I say that the circumstances are such as to arouse suspicion. When the Prime Minister sought the suffrages of the electors, and asked for their support, he put these matters in the very fore-front of his programme, and emphasized their importance; but now he is significantly silent upon the subject. This must arouse the suspicion that, either he is dropping these questions, upon which he assumed an attitude which he claimed to be just and right, or that he is going to effect his object in an underhand way, by means of his administration, instead of asking Parliament reasonably and fairly to arrive at an opposite decision. I think that we are entitled to a statement upon the matter. In coalitions it is, no doubt, necessary that some sacrifices of opinion should be made, temporarily, if not permanently; but I say that on important matters regarding which so much controversy has been raised in Australia—because it was sought to make the last election turn, to some extent, upon the question of the six hatters—it is surely reasonable to ask that a fair and candid statement should be made to Parliament on an occasion of this kind. I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister upon his new-found anxiety to promote friendly feelings between the States of New South Wales and Victoria. Relying for his support—I will not say for his majority at present—in the bulk, upon the representatives of these two States, we find the right honorable gentleman saying that it is time that Inter-State jealousies died out, and that we should demonstrate our belief in the fairness of members who come from the other States. Now, I would point out that this sentiment was not especially expressed during the last election in New South Wales.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That feeling should be reciprocal.

Mr. WATSON.—Of course it should. But who has done the most to keep alive the feeling of animosity between the States?—the press supporters of the right honorable gentleman in New South Wales.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—And the press opponents of the right honorable gentleman in Victoria.

Mr. WATSON.—I admit that some of the Victorian newspapers have helped to keep alive the feeling of hostility between the States. I contend, however, that no encouragement has been given to any such feeling by myself or by any other member of the Labour Party, whereas it was distinctly stimulated by the right honorable gentleman. I say that the honorable member spoke about the domination of Victoria ad nauseam throughout the last election campaign, and stated that the Barton Government had been enabled through its brutal majority of Victorian representatives to carry through a Tariff to which he objected. He laid stress upon that fact at almost every meeting he addressed.

Mr. REID.—None of those appeared in the press; no statements in that strain.

Mr. WATSON. — The right honorable gentleman will find such statements in the report of his meeting of 10th October, 1903, published in the Sydney Morning Herald, and also in a report of his speech at Bowral in August of the same year. That was just before the opening of the electoral campaign, and I dare say that he will find similar statements in other speeches delivered at a later stage. I have not had time to look them up. We had an example of this only a few days ago. The Sydney Daily Telegraph, which is to-day amongst the most influential newspapers supporting the present Government, stated that the Liberal Protectionists, now in alliance with the Labour Party—the Liberal Protectionists who are in opposition to the present Government—constituted that section of Victorians who had all along shown the utmost enmity to New South Wales.

Mr. REID.—It spoke of a section of Victorians, not of Victorians generally.

Mr. WATSON.—It stated that they constituted that section of Victorians who had shown the greatest opposition to New South Wales.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is absolutely untrue.

Mr. WATSON.—It is a most unfortunate libel.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I rise to a point of order. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports loudly interjected that a certain statement was untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I distinctly heard the interjection, and it was to the effect that the statement quoted from the Sydney Daily Telegraph was false.

Mr. WATSON.—It is most unfortunate that attempts of this kind should be made to stir up inter-provincial feeling. I am happy to say that this feeling is largely confined to the cities of Sydney and Melbourne, and that there is very little evidence of it in the country districts.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—There is none in Melbourne.

Mr. WATSON.—There is some feeling of the kind.

Mr. MAUGER.—Very little.

Mr. WATSON.—Surely no public man should encourage, and no public print should give publicity to, such statements. They are absolutely untrue, so far as individuals are concerned. I have not seen evidence of any desire on the part of any representative of Victoria to do injury to New South Wales interests. There has naturally been an anxiety evinced by them, and I am happy to say, by the representatives of New South Wales also, to stand firmly by their opinions, but I have not seen any indication of a desire on the part of Victorians or of any other section of the House to attack New South Wales interests. I am satisfied that there is no such desire existing in the minds of honorable members on either side of the House. As an instance of the length to which these tactics may be carried, I should like to mention a statement which I read in an issue of the Sydney Daily Telegraph, published shortly before the last general election. It was contained, not in a letter to the editor, but in an article written by a member of the staff, and it was to the effect that some blunder had been committed in the electoral office, and that "Melbourne must be called to account for this." Having regard to the fact that the Minister of Home Affairs, who then controlled the electoral office, was a New South Welshman, and that the Secretary of the Department of Home Affairs, as well as the gentleman immediately in charge of the electoral office, were New South Welshmen, it does not seem to me that Melbourne was particularly responsible for any blunder that had occurred.

Mr. JOHNSON.—All of them had strong Victorian interests.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not think that is true.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I think it is.

Mr. REID.—I think the expression was—"The Melbourne office" not "The city of Melbourne."

Mr. WATSON.—I am sorry to say that the reference was to Melbourne itself. It is only in keeping with frequent statements of the kind that have been made. I believe I speak for every honorable member on this side of the House, when I say that while we recognize that the Government are entitled to reasonable consideration as to the form that any attack should take, we have so little confidence in them as a Ministry—we have so little confidence in their public administration, apart altogether from the personal merits of the individual members of the Ministry, which, of course, must at once be conceded—that we shall avail ourselves of every legitimate step that can be taken to turn them out of office. It is all very well for the right honorable member to speak of the democracy which is behind him. We know, as against that statement, that all the reactionary forces of Australia are banded together in support of the Ministry; all the conservatives who can be martialled into line are strongly of the opinion that the present Government should be maintained.

Mr. REID.—And all the anarchists are behind the Opposition.

Mr. WATSON.—The right honorable member talks of anarchists! Where are the anarchists in Australia, if we except the honorable and learned member for Werriwa and the honorable and learned member for Parkes? I am glad to say that, so far as I have been able to ascertain, there are none. If there are any they certainly have never demonstrated their support of the Labour Party. We cannot in New South Wales even secure the support of the official Socialistic party, not to speak of the anarchists. All the gentlemen whose belief in non-interference with private enterprise inevitably leads them in the direction of political anarchy are on the other side.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Necessarily.

Mr. WATSON.—Necessarily they are on the other side, and linked with them are, as I have said, all the reactionary conservative forces which exist to-day in Australia. The Government have even the moral support of Mr. Walpole, the paid organizer of the Employers' Federation, who tells the workmen of Australia that marriage is a luxury which should not be indulged in by the poor.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Is the honorable member responsible for the views of every outside supporter of his party?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Are we responsible for the statements of Mr. Tom Mann?

Mr. WATSON.—What about the insinuations made by the Prime Minister yesterday in his endeavour to place the responsibility for various statements by irresponsible persons on the shoulders of the Opposition? The present Government are not responsible for all that is said by these persons.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—This side of the House has nothing to do with Mr. Walpole.

Mr. WATSON.—The present Coalition Government is supported by Mr. Walpole, and by every other force similar to that by which he is maintained as a paid organizer. The right honorable gentleman has told us that the Government are in favour of encouraging private enterprise. He will, of course, go to the assistance of those who are anxious for the success of private greed as against the public good. The gentlemen who have lately done so well out of the butter trade will give every assistance to this Government. They do not believe in interference with private enterprise. Why should the State step in?

Mr. PAGE.—Why should the State interfere?

Mr. WATSON.—That is what they say. Why not let the weakest go to the wall? Why should not free play be given to these grand original individualistic instincts of the people? That is their doctrine.

Mr. FULLER.—All this is the result of the bonus system.

Mr. WATSON.—No; the honorable and learned member knows that the later swindles disclosed by the evidence given before the Butter Commission had no connexion with the bonus system. The gains in question were made at the expense of the butter producers, quite independently of the bonus system.

Mr. FULLER.—But the operations of these men did not commence until the bonus system was inaugurated.

Mr. WATSON.—I repeat that the swindle was perfected, independently of the butter bonus, and was the legitimate product of private enterprise in the form of a trust.

Mr. FULLER.—It is such systems which give rise to tactics of the kind to which the honorable member refers.

Mr. WATSON.—The Government will certainly receive every assistance from gentlemen of the character to which I have referred, as well as from the members of the tobacco monopoly, who will also give them all the influence that it is possible for them to exercise; and when we find all these forces brought together in support of a Government it is certainly time for the radicals of Australia to sink their minor differences, and to concentrate all their energies in hurling that Government from power.

Mr. McLEAN (Minister of Trade and Customs).—I think that honorable members will agree with me that in the tone and manner of the discourse he has just concluded, as well as by the great force and ability displayed by him in its delivery, the leader of the Opposition has well maintained the high reputation that has made him so deservedly popular in this Chamber. The honorable member, however, cannot expect me to concur with the views he has expressed on the different matters with which he has dealt, seeing that they constitute the distinction between the Government and the Opposition. Before proceeding to reply to the honorable member's speech, I should like, with the indulgence of the House, to refer briefly to some statements which have been made regarding myself and the other protectionist members in the ranks of the Government and of their supporters. It appears to me that if there is one section of the House who need not explain their position—who are acting in strict accordance with their election pledges—it is the protectionists on this side of the Chamber. Honorable members are aware that after we had spent more than a year in wrangling over the Tariff Bill and in settling it on the most favorable terms that we could obtain, we went to the country advocating fiscal peace during the life of the present Parliament, and in the advocacy of that policy we were joined by several free-trade members. At that time we heard nothing of our honorable friends the seceding protectionists.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The seceding protectionists are members and supporters of the present Government.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member is a distinguished member of the seceding protectionists. I can show him a list of the names of both protectionists and free-traders who went to the country as advocates of fiscal peace. If honorable members in the Opposition corner, who are now asking that the Tariff be immediately re-opened, held that opinion at the time of the last Federal election they should have been found working under the banner of my right honorable colleague the Prime Minister, who went to the country openly advocating its immediate revision.

Mr. HUGHES.—But what did he do?

Mr. McLEAN.—What were these honorable members doing? If they intended to support the re-opening of the Tariff question—as my right honorable colleague said he intended to do as soon as the House met—they were simply masquerading under the banner of those who advocated fiscal peace. The position of the Protectionist Party was at the time well stated in the columns of the Age, and I will quote one or two passages from an article which appeared in that journal on 12th December last, some four or five days before the general election took place. In the issue of that date the following statement appeared in its leading columns:—

The watchword of the Deakin Ministry is fiscal peace, and all Australia should, at the present juncture, cry a truce on the tariff question—

A truce, bear in mind. That is the very word I have been taken to task for using—while the great issue of Imperial Preference is being fought out in England.

There are two points in that paragraph, short as it is, that bear directly on our present attitude. It describes the position of the Deakin Government at that time. Their policy was to have a fiscal peace, or a fiscal truce, I care not which phrase is used, during the term of the present Parliament, and to wait to deal with the question of preferential trade until some proposal was made by the Imperial Government. That position is put as plainly as it can be in the paragraph I have quoted—"While the great issue of Imperial preference is being fought out in England," we were to have a fiscal truce.

Mr. THOMAS.—That is the Age. What has it to do with the members of this Parliament?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is the age in which we live.

Mr. McLEAN.—That appeared in the Age of 12th December, and I quote it, because that newspaper correctly reported the views of the Deakin Government at the time.

Mr. HUGHES.—Was it not the attitude of the Deakin Government on preferential trade, to raise duties against the foreigner?

Mr. McLEAN.—It was. I was one of those who went to the country, advocating fiscal peace during the life of the present Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS.—And preferential trade.

Mr. McLEAN.—I believe I can say for every protectionist on this side that we pointed out to our constituents that we had got the best Tariff which could have been got, considering the relative strength of parties, and that there was no use in re-opening the Tariff while the relative strength of parties remained unaltered.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Does the honorable member think it consistent that those who opposed fiscal peace should ask for fiscal peace when they are beaten?

Mr. McLEAN.—I think their position is quite logical. They went to the country openly advocating an immediate revision of the Tariff.

Mr. HIGGINS.—And they were beaten.

Mr. McLEAN.—They were hopelessly beaten on that question, and they are prepared to bow to the decision of the majority. But is it consistent for my honorable friend opposite, or any one who went to the country advocating fiscal peace, and who won on that policy, when the country backed them up, and dealt with their request by sending into this House an overwhelming majority, made up of protectionists and free-traders, in favour of fiscal peace, to turn round now and say, "We were only fooling you at the elections; we did not believe in fiscal peace. We believe in re-opening the Tariff at the earliest possible moment"? What are the excuses that are being put forward? We are told that what we objected to was the re-opening of the Tariff by free-traders, but that it was quite legitimate for protectionists to re-open the Tariff. Surely, that is a story which will not impose upon the credulity of the inhabitants of a nursery, much less upon intelligent adult people? Does not every one know that if the Tariff is re-opened—and it does not matter a rush by whom, whether by protectionists or free-traders—if one item of the Tariff is re-opened, every item on it is open to attack by both free-traders and protectionists. We have had over twelve months of a struggle on the Tariff. It has been admitted by both sides that the relative strength of the protectionist and free-trade parties was not disturbed at the last election. That was stated in the columns of the Age newspaper a couple of days after the elections took place. It was explained that the losses in one place were made up by gains in another, and that so far as the relative strength of the parties was concerned it was exactly as before.

Mr. HIGGINS.—May I interrupt the honorable gentleman for a moment? We asked for fiscal peace as a compromise. That compromise was refused. Does the honorable gentleman think that we are now bound by the compromise?

Mr. McLEAN.—It was not refused by the country.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It was refused by our opponents.

Mr. McLEAN.—It was granted by the country. Will honorable members opposite say that the country having given a majority to them, and to those who fought under the same flag, they should turn round immediately, and take up the attitude of the party that was defeated at the elections?

Mr. HIGGINS.—The question is: Have those who were defeated when they refused the compromise a right to insist now on the compromise being kept?

Mr. McLEAN.—There is no insistence. They say openly, "We asked for permission to re-open the Tariff. That permission was refused by the country, and we bow to the verdict."

Mr. HIGGINS.—Honorable gentlemen wish to tie our hands, and to keep their own hands free.

Mr. McLEAN.—We, as protectionists, tied our own hands at the last election. The name of my honorable and learned friend is in the list of those who went to the country asking for fiscal peace.

Mr. HIGGINS.—No, I did not.

Mr. McLEAN.—Then the honorable and learned gentleman allowed his name to be used in that connexion. If we take the protectionists who are now asking for a revision of the Tariff away from the the majority who supported fiscal peace, and add them to the members of the party led by the right honorable member for East Sydney, who advocated an immediate revision of the Tariff, it will be found that we shall make a very material difference in the verdict of the country.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—There can be no truce where both sides do not agree to it. If one side fires on the flag there is no truce.

Mr. McLEAN. — The truce was confirmed by the country. The country was the arbiter and the proper arbiter. The electors who were the judges heard both sides, and they said virtually, "We are tired of this Tariff wrangle, and we decree that the Tariff shall not be re-opened during the life of the present Parliament." That is the position which I and other protectionists on this side took up. That is our position to-day, and I therefore say that we have nothing to explain to our constituents, because we are acting in strict accordance with our election pledges.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Then why is the honorable gentleman explaining now?

Mr. McLEAN.—Because my honorable friend and others acting with him have been making certain statements to the country—statements very much at variance with their utterances of a few months ago. Perhaps the honorable member for Hume will give me his attention for a moment while I quote a paragraph from his own speech in returning thanks for his election to his constituents at Albury.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—These papers ought to be burnt.

Mr. McLEAN.—These are the words of the honorable member for Hume, as reported in the Age of 18th December—

The fiscal question should never have been raised in this election. Owing to the stringency of the financial clauses of the Constitution it was impossible to have either protection or free-trade. Whatever party was in power, the only possible Tariff must be very similar to that now in force; and until the expiration of the Braddon clauses, it was vain for either party to dream of radical alterations.

Those were the views of almost the whole of the members of the party with which my honorable friend was associated at that time. The only difference at the present time, so far as I can learn, is that we are still of that opinion, whilst some of our honorable friends have seen fit to change their attitude.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Who said that?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Sir William Lyne.

Mr. McLEAN.—A gentleman for whom I have the highest respect, my old and honorable friend the member for Hume.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Hear, hear; and I shall refer to it myself presently.

Mr. McLEAN.—It is quite true that I, and I believe all of the protectionists on this side, advocated preferential trade. The attitude of the Government which we supported was to wait until some proposal on the subject emanated from the Imperial Government. That is our attitude to-day. We do not think it is likely that these proposals will come to us during the life of the present Parliament, but if they do, we are prepared to carry out our election pledges, and to deal with them in accordance with those pledges.

Mr. HUGHES.—Is the other head of the Government going to do the same?

Mr. McLEAN.—The head of the Government is absolutely willing that every member of the Government and their supporters should be true to their election pledges on this as well as on every other question.

Mr. HUGHES.—Is there, then, a free hand on preferential trade; is it an open question in the Cabinet?

Mr. McLEAN.—It is a question on which we shall all vote in accordance with our election pledges.

Mr. HUGHES.—That is to say, that the honorable gentleman will vote in one way, and the right honorable member for East Sydney in another?

Mr. McLEAN.—Probably, if that question should come up. The honorable and learned member for West Sydney is aware that in that respect we are a coalition Government in just the same way as the Government of which he was himself a member. Will he tell me that he would have voted in the late Government for preferential trade, and in favour of raising the duties against the foreigner?

Mr. HUGHES.—The late Government was not a coalition Government.

Mr. McLEAN.—My honorable and learned friend should be straight and candid. We know what he would do. He is too honorable to do otherwise than vote in accordance with his honest convictions. The honorable and learned gentleman knows very well that four members of the Cabinet to which he belonged held one fiscal belief, whilst another four held the opposite view.

Mr. HUGHES.—I do not know that at all.

Mr. McLEAN. — My honorable and learned friend must know that the Government of which he was a member included four free-traders and four protectionists.

Mr. HUGHES.—I am not aware of that, but it may have been so.

Mr. McLEAN.—The innocence of the honorable and learned gentleman is charming. Possibly he was not aware of it, but I may tell him that every other member of the House was. In that respect, on the Tariff question alone, and on questions arising under the Tariff, we admit that we are essentially a coalition Government—some of us hold one view and some another.

Mr. HUGHES.—Is that consonant with responsible government?

Mr. McLEAN.—It is on all the matters we have in hand. If this matter should come before us by request from the Imperial Government, we shall deal with it in accordance with our election pledges.

Mr. HUGHES.—Who will deal with it? The present Government cannot deal with it.

Mr. McLEAN.—Every individual member of the Government.

Mr. HUGHES. — But who will lead? The honorable gentleman or the other half of the head of the Government?

Mr. REID.—Wait until it comes along; we shall then soon tell the honorable and learned member.

Mr. McLEAN.—When the matter comes before us by request from the Imperial Government we shall be prepared to deal with it.

Mr. HUGHES.—I do not know that the Government will then be able to deal with anything.

Mr. McLEAN. — Dealing with the speech of the leader of the Opposition, that honorable gentleman, in his opening remarks, complained bitterly of the action of honorable members now on this side of the House in taking the conduct of business out of the hands of the late Government. He argued that, under ordinary circumstances, we should have allowed the House to go into Committee, and to deal with the amendment of the honorable member for Corinella there. I admit that, under ordinary circumstances, that would have been a fair request to make, and I should have been one of the first to agree to it; but my honorable friends know that the late Government stated openly the alternative which they had to propose.

Mr. HUGHES.—Not on the motion to recommit.

Mr. McLEAN.—They told us what they intended to do in Committee. If they had asked us to go into Committee to deal with the question on its merits, they would have been allowed to do so; but they did not ask that. I believe that if we had gone into Committee, the majority against the Government would have been larger.

Mr. HIGGINS.—There would not have been a majority against the Government in Committee.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member for Barker, for one, would have voted against the Government in Committee.

Mr. HIGGINS.—What about the honorable member for Dalley? How would he have voted, if we had moved to strike out the whole proviso?

Mr. McLEAN.—The amendment of the honorable member for Corinella was carried on its merits by five votes, whereas the Government were defeated on the proposal to recommit by a majority of two votes.

Mr. HUGHES.—On the one occasion there was not a full attendance, but on the other there was.

Mr. McLEAN.—For my own part, I was not aware that the amendment was to be moved by the honorable and learned member for Corinella.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Nor was I.

Mr. McLEAN.—I do not think that many of us knew of it until it was proposed. I voted in accordance with the views which I expressed during the second reading debate on the Bill introduced by the Barton Government, and I think that most honorable members did likewise. On that occasion I stated what were the provisions to which I objected, and I voted all through in strict accordance with that statement. It was not our fault that the late Government chose to make clause 48 a vital question. That was a matter for themselves. But they could hardly expect us, who were not supporting them, to reverse the vote we had recorded a few days previously, simply because they were making the question a vital one.

Mr. FRAZER.—We expected fair play, and we were deceived.

Mr. REID.—Poor little babies! But honorable members were not deceived. They are too clever for that.

Mr. FRAZER. — The right honorable gentleman's turn is coming.

Mr. McLEAN.—If we get the same amount of fair play as we extended to the late Government, we shall not ask for anything more.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member will get it.

Mr. McLEAN.—We do not wish for anything more. My honorable friend cannot point to a single instance in which the late Opposition attempted to obstruct business, or to thwart progress in any way. We dealt with each matter as it came up, purely and simply on its merits.

Mr. HUGHES.—Hear, hear! There is no question about that.

Mr. McLEAN.—The ejection of the late Government from office was a matter for which they alone were responsible, since the situation was one of their own creation. Honorable members who voted against them did so in accordance with their previously expressed convictions. The leader of the Opposition referred in a sneering tone this afternoon to the remark of the Prime Minister, that in one respect there is a strong resemblance between the members of the Opposition and the supporters of the Government, in that both are democrats and liberals; and he proceeded to ridicule the assertion by referring to two or three honorable members whom he regarded as conservatives. It is well known that I have never had any sympathy with conservatism, and that I have supported advanced liberalism throughout the whole of my political career. But in the matter of exclusiveness, there is a very strong resemblance between the ultra-conservative and the labour member. They are equally exclusive. Your ultra-conservative is in favour of class rule, and your labour member is also in favour of class rule. The only difference between them is this: Your ultra-conservative believes in entrusting political power to that class which, having acquired a stake in the country, has shown some capacity to manage its own affairs.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Cannot the labour members do that?

Mr. McLEAN.—They have not done it. Honorable members must remember that I do not sympathize with the conservatives, and have never sympathized with them. They contend that those who have shown their capacity to manage their own business by acquiring a stake in the country, in the shape of property—

Mr. PAGE.—What does the honorable member call a stake in the country?

Mr. McLEAN.—I am stating the argument from the conservative, not from my own point of view. Their contention is that the class for which they ask for what I consider an undue share of political power has given evidence of being able to manage its affairs intelligently.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Is it not the man with a wife and family and no money who has the real stake in the country?

Mr. McLEAN.—My honorable friend's tent, if he had one, would be a good instance of what is meant by a stake in the country. Honorable members opposite also believe that the Government of the country should be in the hands of one class, the labour class.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is the honorable member's mistake.

Mr. McLEAN.—I do not say that it is not just as capable as any other, but they desire to give exclusive power to a section of the community which has not yet given the same evidence of capacity to manage its own affairs.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Does the honorable member mean that the labour members have not shown that they can manage their own business?

Mr. McLEAN.—The labouring class has not shown that capacity to the same extent as other classes have done. If they had done so, they would not be under the necessity of working for wages.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Many of the honorable members of the Labour Party do not work for wages, but manage businesses of their own.

Mr. McLEAN.—I have been opposed to both parties always. Both the Prime Minister and myself believe in making every section of the community equal in the eyes of the law, and in giving every section of the community the same voice in framing the laws of the country.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—That is the policy of the Labour Party.

Mr. McLEAN.—It is in that respect that we differ from our friends opposite. The honorable member for Hindmarsh cannot deny that he came into this Parliament bound by a very stringent pledge.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—What was the pledge?

Mr. PAGE.—Read it. We are proud of it.

Mr. McLEAN.—It is this—

I hereby pledge myself not to oppose the candidate selected by the recognised political organization, and, if elected, to do my utmost to carry out the principles embodied in the Federal Labour Platform, and on all questions affecting the platform, to vote as a majority of the parliamentary party may decide at a duly constituted caucus meeting.

My honorable friends claim to represent the whole people; but had the employers any voice in framing the programme, to which they have bound themselves body and soul?

MR. KING O'MALLEY.—Certainly. They can come into the unions if they like. We welcome them.

MR. MCLEAN.—My honorable friends know that they come into Parliament as the pledged advocates of one class.

MR. HUGHES.—Not at all.

MR. MCLEAN.—I accept the correction to this extent. In using the word class, I was rather too comprehensive. I should have said section of a class. The recent action of my honorable friends shows that they have come here as the pledged advocates of those who are enrolled in the trades unions, and not of the whole of the workers.

MR. HUTCHISON.—Employers, lawyers, squatters, doctors, and other sections of the community belong to the Labour Party.

MR. MCLEAN.—That is a revelation to me. I am not surprised at lawyers belonging to the party, though I believe that the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has not yet signed its platform.

MR. HIGGINS.—I think that the honorable member will admit that men of all classes and occupations are free to join the party.

MR. MCLEAN.—Just as any person is free to commit suicide. If they are willing to enter upon a career of confiscation, they can join the Labour Party.

MR. KING O'MALLEY.—No one is free to commit suicide. The honorable member would be arrested if he attempted to do so.

MR. MCLEAN.—Perhaps I should not have used that illustration.

MR. PAGE.—Have not the labour candidates to face the electors?

MR. MCLEAN.—Yes.

MR. PAGE.—Then whose fault is it that we are here?

MR. MCLEAN.—I am not blaming the honorable member for anything. He should not be ashamed of his position.

MR. PAGE.—I am not ashamed of it; I am proud of it.

MR. MCLEAN.—If I have misrepresented the platform of the Labour Party in any way, I am open to correction.

MR. HUTCHISON.—Do not the electors accept our platform in choosing us to represent them?

MR. MCLEAN.—My honorable friends come here as the pledged advocates of the trade unions.

MR. HUTCHISON.—That is not so.

MR. MCLEAN.—The trades unions are excellent electioneering organizations; there is no denying that. Every man in a trades union is a canvasser for a labour candidate, and they certainly select excellent representatives. I have never said anything against the labour members in this Chamber. They are a most reputable body of men, who are attentive to their duties, and conscientiously carry out their election pledges. But I object to the whole machine which creates class rule. My honorable friends know that I have always been opposed to that. I object to any man binding himself body and soul to an organization outside Parliament. I think that it is right for every man to place his own views before the electors. If those views are acceptable, he should be sent into Parliament. I do not believe in any man so moulding his views as to comply with a platform framed by a body of men outside of Parliament.

MR. PAGE.—Those views must be entertained by the majority of the electors, or they would not send us here.

MR. MCLEAN.—The honorable member must, of course, represent a majority of those who vote in his constituency.

MR. REID.—Yes, of those who vote.

MR. PAGE.—I secured a majority of 4,780 over the candidate who would have been supported by the right honorable gentleman.

MR. SPEAKER.—I am sorry to again have to call attention to the fact that interjections across the chamber—practically conversations carried on between honorable members—are highly disorderly, and render it almost impossible for the honorable member who is addressing the Chair to pursue a consistent line of argument. I must again ask honorable members to refrain from engaging in conversations across the chamber.

MR. MCLEAN.—The leader of the Opposition took exception to a remark made by the Prime Minister in a recent speech at Warragul, to the effect that the programme of the Labour Government was framed in the vaults. He contended that there was no truth in that statement, and, of course, I accept his denial. But what does that denial involve? It involves the abandonment of the election pledges of the members of the Labour Party, by which they engage to abide by the views of the caucus in every matter affecting their programme. Therefore, it is a poor compliment to pay to a Labour Government to say that they could act independently only by a violation of the pledge under which they entered Parliament.

Mr. HUGHES.—If the whole of the members of the Labour Party are of one opinion, how can their views be influenced by persons outside?

Mr. McLEAN.—I will answer that in the true Scotch fashion by asking another question. If my honorable friends are of the one opinion before they go into the caucus, where is the necessity for the rule that has been laid down?

Mr. PAGE.—Because we have been tricked too often by people giving us pledges and promises.

Mr. McLEAN.—Then what the honorable and learned member for West Sydney says cannot be true. All the members of the Labour Party cannot be of the one mind before they go into the caucus.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member stated that we had violated our pledge in regard to the Arbitration Bill; I say that we were of one opinion, so far as that was concerned.

Mr. McLEAN.—How did the honorable and learned member know that?

Mr. HUGHES.—We found it out first of all.

Mr. McLEAN.—That is what the leader of the Opposition denied. He said that the Government had framed their own programme in absolute independence of the party. Honorable members must have entered the caucus, either in order to make the minority bow to the will of the majority, and come in here as if they believed in it, or merely to perpetrate a farce. If they were all of the one opinion before they went into the caucus it would be absurd for them to enter into any conclave upon the matter. The leader of the Opposition told us that the policy of the late Government was known to the whole world. I would ask the honorable member whose policy it was. Was it the policy of the Government or of the labour organizations outside of Parliament?

Mr. HUGHES.—It was the policy of the Government.

Mr. McLEAN.—It was a policy framed by the organizations outside of Parliament, which the labour members were sent in here to carry out in obedience to their masters.

Mr. HUGHES.—It was the policy of the electors at the last general elections, which was confirmed by an overwhelming majority. It is so good a policy that the honorable member is not game to knock out one plank of it.

Mr. McLEAN.—The leader of the Opposition referred to the Free-trade League and compared it to the labour organizations outside of Parliament. Now, is there a single member of this House who comes in here with the brand of the Free-trade League upon him, and bound body and soul to carry out its behests? The Free-trade League will, no doubt, pledge itself outside of Parliament to vote for those candidates whose views are in consonance with its own, but it does not make its representatives its servile instruments.

Mr. HUGHES.—They have to sign a pledge in New South Wales.

Mr. REID.—They can do without it just the same.

Mr. McLEAN.—The Free-trade League of New South Wales did not put their brand upon the Prime Minister. The leader of the Opposition referred also to the tobacco monopoly, and pointed out the injury that was being done to the community by that combination. I am not prepared to say that his assertions are not absolutely true, but I submit that there are other means of dealing with such a matter, besides nationalizing an industry and making it a State monopoly. Surely these monopolies can be prevented by legislation from doing any harm to the public. The present Government are just as much opposed as are my honorable friends opposite to any monopoly that imposes disabilities upon the general public. We may have a different method of dealing with it, but we have the same object in view, and honorable members will find that we are quite as earnest as they are in that respect.

Mr. HUGHES.—What is the honorable member's method?

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member is questioning me rather too soon. We have not yet had time to consider the whole of the details of the legislation by which we could deal with such matters.

Mr. HUGHES.—What has the honorable member been doing during the last three weeks?

Mr. McLEAN.—What was the honorable and learned member doing for three months?

Mr. HUGHES.—Combating the stratagems and tricks of honorable members opposite.

Mr. McLEAN.—The late Government during the three months they were in office passed only one Bill, namely, the Seat of Government Bill.

Mr. HUGHES.—That was something which the former Government did not succeed in achieving during the three years that it occupied office.

Mr. McLEAN.—That Bill was passed in a day or two, and the other portion of the term during which the late Government held office was fruitless. The leader of the Opposition also took exception to the proposal of the present Government to postpone the appointment of the High Commissioner. He said that we ought to make the appointment at once, and trust to public opinion to compel the States Governments to come into line. Is that the proper way to approach independent States Governments, who have just as clear rights as we have under the Constitution? We believe that it would be much more conducive to the best interests of the people whom we both represent if we met the States Governments in friendly conference, and came to some amicable agreement. We know that the members of the States Governments are as anxious as we are to promote the greatest good for the people at the least possible cost, and we believe that economy can best be served by entering into friendly conference with them. I would point out that the High Commissioner will have very important functions to discharge, and that, if he does his duty ably and conscientiously, he can accomplish a great deal. He will be in a position to promote the interests of our producers, by advertising our products and resources in the old world, by opening up markets, by making the best possible freight arrangements for the cheap transport of our exports to those markets, and by the collection and dissemination of useful information. In this connexion, perhaps, I may be permitted to digress a little from the speech of the leader of the Opposition, by saying that the Government are looking forward to accomplishing very useful work, in conjunction with the States Governments, during the recess. In the first place, the States have public debts, amounting to £222,000,000. One of the strongest arguments in favour of the Federal Union was that increased facilities would be given for borrowing money for public purposes on favourable terms, because the credit of the Commonwealth would stand very much higher than that of individual States; I think that that was a fair and reasonable view to take. If the credit of the Commonwealth stands higher than that of individual States to the extent of even a half per cent.—and I think that is a very modest assumption—we might by taking over the States' debts, effect a saving upon our annual interest bill of £1,110,000. That would surely be an advantage well worth gaining.

Mr. HUGHES.—Why delay the matter?

Mr. McLEAN.—There will be no delay in dealing with the matter, unless honorable members opposite unduly prolong the session. If we can go into recess within a reasonable time, we shall be able to deal with the matter promptly. If we do not succeed in reaching recess, the honorable member will not find us whining for office. We can leave office in as good a spirit as we came into it. Reverting to the subject of the appointment of a High Commissioner, I would point out that there are many directions in which that official may render great service. I would remind my honorable friends that the Federal Parliament has already devoted more than a year to the consideration of one question, the fiscal issue, and it seems to me, that by the time that the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill has been finally dealt with, we shall have devoted something like a similar period to the consideration of that measure. Surely it is fair that the great producing interests of Australia should receive some attention. The Federal Constitution has left the control of those interests in a somewhat divided state. The Governments of the States have charge of the various Departments of Agriculture; but the Government of the Commonwealth have the sole power to give direct encouragement to production or export. It is absolutely necessary, if we are to evolve a wise and intelligent policy in this direction, that we shall do so in conference with the States Governments, and that is a matter to which the Government intend to devote special attention. I believe that the Parliament and the Government of the Commonwealth may do more good for Australia by developing and expanding her natural resources than they can in any other direction. I would draw attention to the proposal which was submitted last session, as well as early this session, by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, in regard to the creation of a Federal Bureau of Agriculture. It is the intention of the Government to take that proposal into their serious consideration. We are all in sympathy with the object which the honorable and learned member has in view, and it is the intention of the Government to do all that we can to come to such arrangements with the States as will enable us to give every reasonable encouragement to the expansion of the natural resources of the country.

Mr. ISAACS.—Have the Government any concrete suggestion to make?

Mr. McLEAN.—If we have a concrete proposal, there is good reason why it should not be made public. The matter is one that must be dealt with, as the honorable and learned member will admit, in conference with the States Governments. What position should we occupy if we first announced exactly what we proposed to do, and then proceeded to negotiate with the States Governments? My honorable and learned friend will surely see that it is only reasonable that we should not make any definite proposal until we have conferred with the States Governments. It is indeed due to the States Governments that that position should be taken up by us. But I am at liberty to point out the direction which these negotiations will take. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat has been long and honorably associated with such progressive movements as water conservation, immigration, and other important questions of public concern, and I may tell the House that in these respects the Government are in entire sympathy and accord with him. These also are matters that will have to be dealt with in the first instance in conference with the States Governments.

Mr. HUGHES. — Does the honorable gentleman speak of irrigation?

Mr. McLEAN.—I am referring to water conservation and irrigation generally.

Mr. HUGHES.—We are entirely in accord with the Government programme, but what we wish to know is when it is to be proceeded with.

Mr. McLEAN.—We shall go on with it as rapidly as possible.

Mr. HUGHES.—Then why not go on with all these matters without any recess?

Mr. McLEAN.—Such a suggestion may impose on the occupants of the galleries, but it can have no such effect on old politicians like the honorable and learned member himself. Did the Government, of which he was a member, attempt to do anything in the direction to which I am referring?

Mr. HUGHES.—We undoubtedly did; but we were throttled by the attacks of honorable members like the Minister of Trade and Customs.

Mr. McLEAN.—Then the Government kept the matter a very close secret.

Mr. HUGHES.—We had to do so.

Mr. ISAACS.—The Minister does not mean to say that the Government will not do anything for the producers, except that which the States Governments agree to do?

Mr. McLEAN.—Certainly not. This is not the time to make such a declaration. If we desired to flout the States Governments, to defy them, and to have them arraigned in opposition to us, that is the course which we should follow. We commence by saying that we shall endeavour by friendly negotiations and conference with the States Governments to come to amicable arrangements that will be conducive to the best interests of the people of the Commonwealth. We surely should not, on the other hand, hold out a threat to the States Governments, and say to them, "If you do not agree with what we propose, we shall carry it out in spite of your opposition."

Mr. ISAACS.—It is surely our duty to help the producers.

Mr. McLEAN.—We shall not be found shirking our duty in regard to the producers. I trust that my honorable and learned friend is doing his duty to his constituents.

Mr. ISAACS.—I hope so.

Mr. McLEAN.—I trust that my honorable and learned friend feels that he is discharging his duty to his constituents, the producers, by doing all that he can to bring into power an organization which would proceed to tax them off their holdings. Is that the way in which he desires to do his duty to them? I have fought with the honorable and learned member in the past, and I hope to fight with him again, and the remark which I made a moment ago was drawn from me only by his interjection. It relates to a matter which his constituents will have to determine.

Mr. ISAACS.—I do not object to the remark; but I say that the policy of taxing the people off the land is the policy of the free-trade democratic association, with which the honorable gentleman is now allied.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable and learned member knows that that is the ultimate goal of the party which he is now supporting. He knows that it supports the nationalization of Land, Capital and industry. How are they to be nationalized?

Mr. HUGHES.—By the method which is favoured by the honorable member for Lang, who is a Government supporter.

Mr. McLEAN.—By means of taxation imposed not for the legitimate purposes of revenue, but to reduce the value of holdings, in order that they may be ultimately acquired by the money wrung in this way from the holders.

Mr. ISAACS.—Who imposed the Land Values Taxation in New South Wales?

Mr. McLEAN.—My honorable and learned friend knows that the doctrine to which I have referred is preached by the paid agitators of the Labour Party, and is advocated by their press. I presume that they will not repudiate their utterances on these questions? The leader of the Opposition was very candid in his statement that it was the intention of his party to turn the Government out of office at the first opportunity. The Government do not complain of that attitude. If the Opposition proceed fairly the Government will be quite prepared to meet any legitimate attack as soon as it may be desired to launch it. I give the leader of the Opposition every credit for his statement, and do not feel less friendly towards him, or to any member of his party, because of the attitude which he and they have taken up towards the Ministry. I recognise that they differ from our views just as we honestly differ from those which they hold. We can fight fairly, and if we are members of the defeated party we shall be able to take our defeat like men. I can only say in conclusion that I trust that the Government during their term of office, whether it be long or short—and I am not particularly concerned about the duration of its life—will acquit themselves in a manner that will be creditable to the Commonwealth, and conducive to the best interests of its people.

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—I have listened with some degree of interest to the statement of the policy of the peculiar Government that now controls the destinies of the Commonwealth.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is not more peculiar than is the Opposition.

Mr. SPENCE.—It is the most peculiar Government that has ever been brought into power.

Mr. REID.—There are some peculiar combinations in the Opposition.

Mr. SPENCE.—We are peculiarly solid. We all should, doubtless, have liked to hear the opinion of the late Sir Henry Parkes, who was a high constitutional authority, on the position of the present Government. I have some recollection of a speech in which he dealt with the principles of constitutional government in the sense that the head of a Government should be responsible to the King's adviser, and have the right to act as the mouthpiece of his Ministry. In that respect we find that the present Government occupy a most extraordinary position. It is a double-headed Government. We have two Prime Ministers, each of them speaking according to the dictates of his own conscience.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Only one Prime Minister.

Mr. SPENCE.—I think I shall be able to show, from statements made by the respective leaders of the coalition, that there are two gentlemen at the head of the Government who are "equal in all things." It is known as the "Reid-McLean Government," which means that it has two heads. I expected to hear from the first spokesman on behalf of the Government some declaration as to the methods which they will adopt in proceeding to work, but no such statement was given. The Prime Minister occupied much time in dealing with the one question on which the Ministry—and presumably their supporters—appear to be somewhat solid—the policy of anti-labour.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is not so.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Government programme is the most miserable, threadbare policy of which I have ever heard.

Mr. ISAACS.—They have none.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Prime Minister is said to have referred to the programme of a certain Government as a "crawling" one, but the policy which he has put forward cannot be described even in that way, except in the sense that the one dominant idea in the minds of the Government is to crawl into recess. The Prime Minister occupied considerable time in dealing with the alleged tactics of the Labour Party, and statements have been made by him, as well as by the other head of the Government, that are not correct. I am somewhat surprised that these honorable members who have occupied high and important positions for many years, and who have been more or less in close touch with the Labour Party, should have made such assertions in regard to the methods of the party. They have either been asleep, so far as the Labour Party and its work are concerned, or they have designedly misrepresented the true position of affairs. I should be sorry to say that they would wilfully misrepresent the methods of the party, but I have no hesitation in asserting that those methods have been misrepresented, both inside and outside this House, with the deliberate intention, if possible, to discount the influence, and to check the growing power of the great labour movement. It is worthy of note that the Prime Minister occupied more time in dealing with the planks in the Government platform, with which they do not propose to do anything this session, than with those on which they are solid. They may be said to be solid so far as the introduction of the Papua Bill and the Trades Marks Bill—both measures left over by previous Governments—are concerned; but there appears to be nothing else on which they are united. We are told that Parliament is to go into recess before dealing with the High Commissioner Bill, and that the members of the Government are to be allowed to vote as they please in regard to the Manufactures Encouragement Bill. We are not told how it will be possible to secure the passing of that measure, unless some one takes charge of it. Is it to be left, with the consent of this double-barrelled Government, in the care of a private member, or is some member of the Ministry to have a free hand in introducing that contentious measure? Almost every question of importance is in the same position. We tried to induce the Minister of Trade and Customs to say how it was possible to carry on business in connexion with matters about which he was speaking, such as preferential trade, but the honorable gentleman declined to reply. The Prime Minister also declines to say how it is possible for Parliament to deal with those questions, unless the Cabinet has some definite opinion upon them, and provides some method for dealing with them. If the members of the present Administration have any hope that they will last, and if they are to be the great Government they are claiming to be, which is going to set up the constitutional system, restore responsible government, and give effect to all the ideals put before us by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, as a justification for bringing about a coalition, they must expect to retain a sufficient majority to enable them to carry on until the Imperial Government sends out some proposal in connexion with preferential trade. But they decline to tell us what they will do when it comes. They decline to say whether the question will be dealt with on free-trade or protectionist lines? What has been disclosed shows that the coalition on the other side has been formed for certain objects, ulterior to the questions now before the country; and that the principal object has been to put out the Labour Government and to keep them out, because they were a Labour Government, and not because of anything they had done, or of anything they proposed to do. The chief object was to take their places—in whose interests I shall presently show. Apart from that object, they do not seem to care whether they have a programme or not. They do not propose to make any issue vital except that of holding on to the Treasury benches. That has been the one issue in their minds, and for which they have been scrambling in a way which, to say the least of it, has been a little bit tricky.

Mr. Spence.

MR. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is very rough.

MR. SPENCE.—I am not as rough as I feel inclined to be, nor as I think the circumstances warrant; but I am not given to saying extremely strong or hard things, because I have some sensitiveness with respect to people's feelings. Considering the general interests of the community, I take up the position that an unholy combination now holds office, that it is a menace to the welfare of the Commonwealth, and should not be permitted to remain in power a day longer than we can help. That is a somewhat new position for members of the Labour Party to take up.

MR. JOHNSON.—What about the unholy combination on the other side?

MR. SPENCE.—Hitherto in the various States we have been satisfied that legislation of which we approved should be passed by other parties. We have endeavoured to take a hand in the moulding of legislation, that it might be fair to all classes of the community. We have here, however, a Government in power who are going to represent the minority, who are organizing deliberately outside to secure as a power behind them all the most reactionary influences that exist. It is therefore not in the interests of the Commonwealth that this Administration should exist at all —that it should be tolerated for even a day. I propose in a few words to show what has led up to the present situation, and I desire particularly to deal with the right honorable gentleman at the head of the Government.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—The honorable member now admits that the right honorable member for East Sydney is the head of the Government.

Mr. SPENCE.—During the last contest in New South Wales the right honorable member for East Sydney is reported to have made these remarks—

It is my proud boast that when I got power in New South Wales I compelled the men of wealth to pay their share of the taxation of the country. There had been some at the head of the liberal and free-trade parties for fifty years who shirked their plain duty, but the moment I got power I used it to take £800,000 worth of burdens off the masses of the people, and to shift them on to the land-owners and wealthy people of the country.

Mr. JOHNSON.—And yet the Labour Party turned the right honorable gentleman out of office.

Mr. SPENCE.—In doing that, the right honorable gentleman was helped by the members of the Labour Party. He has quite recognised that, and has always borne testimony to the fact. But what does the right honorable gentleman who made that boast do now? Does he propose now to relieve the masses of taxation which he said it was his proud boast to have done in New South Wales? Now the Commonwealth Government has charge of taxation, of the raising of revenue for the States, yet we hear no word from the right honorable gentleman about lifting any burdens from the masses of the people.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Some honorable members opposite claim now that more should be put on.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable member supports those who insist upon increasing the burdens.

Mr. SPENCE.—I am aware that the honorable members for Lang and Parramatta are very uncomfortable, and I do not wonder at it, when I find the honorable member for Lang sitting behind a protectionist.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member is himself sitting behind one now.

Mr. SPENCE.—I was not returned on a fiscal policy. I am carrying out my pledges whilst the right honorable gentleman is not carrying out his pledges.

Mr. REID.—I did my best.

Mr. SPENCE.—The right honorable gentleman said that it was his proud boast that he was able to take £800,000 worth of burdens off the masses of the people, and whilst he certainly did so, I wish to know from him whether the present Minister of Trade and Customs has agreed to join him in relieving the masses of the people of the burdens of customs taxation? Has that honorable gentleman agreed to do so by introducing the same method of taxation on land values as that adopted by the Prime Minister, or has the right honorable member for East Sydney given up his policy and deserted his principles in that respect? I desire to direct the attention of honorable members and of the people outside to the change in the attitude of the right honorable member for East Sydney. In New South Wales he was a straight-out free-trader, who believed in an absolutely free port, and in raising revenue by direct taxation.

Mr. JOHNSON.—What does the honorable member for Darling propose to do?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What are the honorable member's fiscal opinions? He has been here four years, and we do not know what they are.

Mr. SPENCE.—If the honorable member for Parramatta expects to throw me off the track by his interjections he makes a mistake. If the honorable member does not keep quiet I shall have a shot at him presently.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not mind a bit. The honorable member's little pea-rifle will not hurt anybody.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member for Parramatta knows that what I am stating is correct. He is aware that the present Prime Minister was in New South Wales a believer in absolute free-trade, apart from duties upon stimulants and narcotics.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What has the honorable member to do with fiscalism?

Mr. SPENCE.—I should like some degree of attention from the honorable member who, although he has now become a chronic interjector, sat very quiet while a member of the Reid Ministry in New South Wales. The honorable member, while in that position, never said a word for five years.

Mr. FISHER.—The position in which the honorable member is now requires a lot of explanation.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member was a member of the Government who, in New South Wales, took the action to which I have referred. I am proposing to show what kind of a Government we have now in the Federal Parliament, and to show that the present Prime Minister is not a man who should be intrusted with the welfare of the Commonwealth. When he carried direct taxation in New South Wales, the right honorable gentleman was a believer in absolute free-trade, but when he entered Federal politics, he became from the very start associated with those who in Victoria have been recognised as the most conservative body in the politics of the State. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat is aware that the revenue tariffists of Victoria, the men who used to be called the "Flinders-lane crowd," were dead opposed to land value taxation, or any other form of direct taxation. The right honorable member for East Sydney, who did such noble and creditable work in New South Wales, has become associated in Federal politics with those who have been notoriously the class of men who have formed the Legislative Council of Victoria, and who have consistently blocked every democratic measure that came before them. In New South Wales, the men with whom the right honorable gentleman was associated, were real free-traders, men of the Single Tax League, and of the school to which the honorable member for Lang belongs, and I recognise that there are democrats amongst them. I am aware, from the active part I have taken in political life, that the class of men with whom the right honorable gentleman has been associated in Federal politics are amongst the most ultra-conservative politicians to be found in Victoria. He has been associated with them in connexion with the fiscal faith he set up as the only policy upon which the country should be run. From my point of view, it is but natural that the bad company which he has kept should have led him away from the progressive and liberal faith disclosed by his political action in his State.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The right honorable gentleman is on a missionary tour.

Mr. SPENCE.—I shall be able to show from quotations from the public prints what his missionary tour is. I wish to show the peculiar combination which is now ranged behind the right honorable gentleman. In speaking in Sydney he prefaced one of his addresses by some remarks applied to the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, which I think would be more appropriate if applied to himself. He is reported by the Daily Telegraph to have said—

Mr. Deakin, who was all things one time or another, and nothing very long, except an eloquent and courteous gentleman, had given them a few ingenious catch-cries with which it would be interesting to deal.

Mr. THOMAS.—Who said that?

Mr. SPENCE.—The present Prime Minister. That shows the kind of friendly feeling there was between the two honorable gentlemen. The reference to being all things at one time and another is, in my opinion, much more applicable to the Prime Minister than to the honorable and learned member for Ballarat.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—From what is the honorable member quoting?

Mr. SPENCE.—From the official organ of the right honorable gentleman's party—the Daily Telegraph of 3rd September, 1903—during the recent electoral contest.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Will the honorable member vouch for the accuracy of the report?

Mr. SPENCE.—I vouch for the fact that the report appeared in the Sydney Daily Telegraph, but I never vouch for the accuracy of anything that is published in the press. I shall not deal very lengthily with the changes of opinion, and the various arguments which have been expressed in regard to fiscal peace, but I think that it is important to know what sort of Government we have in power. Before we support the Government, we should be satisfied that we can place faith in them. Now, the Sydney Daily Telegraph reports the right honorable member for East Sydney as saying, prior to the elections—

Regarding the question of fiscal peace and free-trade, the protectionists had all the fight taken out of them. He had challenged Mr. Deakin and his colleagues to fight the battle of free-trade and protection to a finish, and, although they had accepted his challenge, they now came along with the flag of fiscal peace. Well, they would get no fiscal peace from him until he pulled them out.

Can honorable members recollect any occasion when the right honorable gentleman tested the question in this chamber, and tried to find out how many others held his views? As a matter of fact, he has left the question untested. Then the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, speaking of the present Prime Minister, was reported to have said—

He has played round the question of contract labour and employment of white seamen upon mail boats, but has formulated no distinct policy in these regards. Of course, foreign traders fight for foreign ships as well as the goods they bring. The Government prefers a preference to British ships. Foreign traders would leave our coasting trade open to all commerce without conditions. The Government aim at protection of Australian seamen; but on none of these points does the Opposition challenge us.

The right honorable member for East Sydney, in every speech on the subject that I remember to have read, has raised great objection to the provisions of our laws which prohibit the immigration of labour under contract and the employment of coloured labour on mail boats, as well as to fiscal peace and preferential trade unless it meant a lowering of the fiscal barriers in favour of England, even if they were left up against the foreigner; but his keynote has always been the treatment meted out to the six hatters. I am therefore astonished that, now that he has had an opportunity to present a policy to this Parliament, he has not asserted his intention to alter the law which affected them. If the matter was so important as to warrant the fighting of an election upon it, surely it might be expected to appear in the Government programme. The right honorable member, however, said not a word about it. Then I should like to know how the honorable member for Eden-Monaro squares his present position with the following statement to the electors of Surrey Hills:—

When they talked about free-trade, and the so-called glorious change that would be wrought by putting Mr. Reid into power, they must have sufficient common sense to look at Mr. Reid's political past. The elector who did not support the present Government was simply working against Australia, and proposed to send all the money to the foreigner.

I wish to know if the honorable member has lost his common sense. Surely he should follow his own advice, and not support in power a dangerous man who will send all the money to the foreigner. No doubt he at the time believed what he said, and I should like to know what has influenced him to change his position. These are the surprises, the unique circumstances of the present state of affairs, and I should like to know how government is to be carried on under them. The combination which has been brought about has been arrived at in a somewhat peculiar way. Both the original parties—that led by the right honorable member for East Sydney, and that lead by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat—were holding secret meetings and attending caucuses day after day. Then we saw some proposals put into black and white. Very nice complimentary letters passed from one party to another, and we were given to understand that the party led by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat declined to join a coalition unless their leader was made leader of the coalition. The moment this Parliament met, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat stated that one of his aims was to bring about a union of parties, so that there would be only two parties in the House. To carry that out, the secret meetings to which I have referred, were held. I do not know that they took place in the vaults. I have been told that they were held in one of the suburbs. At any rate, we read interesting stories about the honorable member for Macquarie taking out children for a walk to mislead the general public, and even the kind of hat in which the right honorable member for Balaclava was going away was mentioned. Other statements were made which were calculated to bring both parties into ridicule. Then, notwithstanding the manner in which honorable members opposite have denounced the caucus as a wicked thing, both parties sat in caucus daily. I would like to be informed by the supporters of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat how the decision of their caucus, that there should be no coalition with the Reid party, stands now.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Why not tell us about the negotiations of parties opposite?

Mr. SPENCE.—We have no negotiations. We are not a secret party. All that we do is done openly, and we are not ashamed of it. It is those who are associated with underground engineering who measure others' corn with their own bushel. We are now told that those who have broken away from the resolution of their caucus not to support the Reid party are the only true protectionists, and that the others are secessionists. That is a most extraordinary statement. It appears to me that the protectionists who have remained loyal to their fiscal faith are those who sit on this side of the Chamber, not those who have been swallowed up by the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. McDONALD.—That is Socialism. The Government have half, and we have the other half.

Mr. SPENCE.—I shall show presently what kind of Socialism it is that honorable members opposite are supporting. They are going in for minority rule red hot.

Mr. McLEAN.—The late Government left office as a protest against majority rule.

Mr. SPENCE.—There is no truth in that statement. They set an example which other Governments would do well to follow, but which this Government does not seem likely to follow. They walked out of office rather than abandon their principles, and they did not crawl into office, or take advantage of a side wind. I should like to see how the following paragraph from the election speech of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat fits in with the present position :—

A White Australia goes further than the preservation of the complexion of the people whose homes are here. It means the multiplying of those homes, so that we shall be strong enough to use and defend the whole of this Commonwealth. It means the maintenance of conditions of life fit for a white man and a white woman. It means equal laws and equal opportunities for all, and protection against the under-paid labour of other lands. It means social justice, so far as we can establish it, and the payment of fair wages. A White Australia means a civilization whose foundations are built in healthy lives, lived in honest toil, under circumstances that do not imply degradation. A White Australia means protection. We protect ourselves from armed aggression. Why not protect ourselves from aggression by commercial means? (Cheers.) We protect ourselves against undesirable aliens; why not protect ourselves against the productions of the undesirable aliens' labour? (Loud cheers.) Unless a White Australia is to have more than a surface complexion, it must represent a policy which goes down to the roots of the national life from which the whole of our social system and political organization must spring.

We know how strongly the honorable and learned member, and his predecessor in the office of Prime Minister, were in favour of a white Australia, and we know, further, that the first Parliament of the Commonwealth was almost unanimous on the subject. We have had from the honorable and learned member for Ballarat a definition of the meaning of a White Australia policy, and now we find that honorable and learned member allying himself with the Prime Minister, who has denounced the White Australia policy, and the measure passed into law to give effect to it. We may now pertinently ask whether the Prime Minister will remain true to his election pledges, and endeavour by means of his administration to defeat the object of the Immigration Restriction Act. Is contract labour to be admitted?

Mr. McLEAN.—The administration will be in accordance with the law.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Minister must know very well that the question of adhering to the law is very much a matter of opinion. When the Immigration Restriction Bill was before us, it was pointed out that the question whether it would prove effective or otherwise would very largely depend upon the administration, because so much reliance would have to be placed in the discretion of the Minister and the officers under him. Furthermore, we have had evidence that the object of the Act has been defeated to a large extent in Western Australia, because officers who were unfavourable to the law had winked at the admission of Chinese.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I never heard of that before.

Mr. SPENCE.—It has been admitted, and certain officers have been removed in consequence.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is true that officers have been removed, but the reasons for their removal have not been published or submitted to this House.

Mr. MAHON.—The removals took place whilst the right honorable gentleman was in office.

Mr. SPENCE.—I am not making charges against the officials generally in connexion with the administration of the Act, but it is admitted that the effectiveness of the law depends very largely upon the wise exercise of their discretion. I have no faith in the present Government as administrators of such a law. The Prime Minister has turned somersaults upon nearly every subject upon which he has declared himself, and he may perform a similar acrobatic feat in this matter. I complain, however, that he has not sufficiently taken the House into his confidence as to his intentions with regard to the administration of the Immigration Restriction Act. He has given us practically no information, but has contented himself with abusing and misrepresenting the Labour Party, and I think that I am fully justified in entertaining suspicions as to his intentions. The Government have no policy, except that of clinging to office. I leave it to honorable members now sitting on the Government benches, who believe in the earnestness and sincerity of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, to explain how it is that they are supporting the Government, led by a declared opponent of the White Australia policy.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member forgets that the Government which he supported proposed to alter the white mail service.

Mr. MAHON.—In what way?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—In regard to the land service.

Mr. MAHON.—That is a mare's nest.

Mr. SPENCE.—I know nothing of any departure from the White Australia policy on the part of the late Government. Since the last election, the Prime Minister has been very active. He was never noted for his constant attendance at Parliament; but he has been prompted to give very close attention to public business by his ambition to secure the position of Prime Minister of the Commonwealth. He has been active outside the House, as well as here, and has apparently been paving the way for the situation which he has at last succeeded in bringing about. When he addressed a meeting of farmers at Kyneton recently, he said—

If they asked him what was the thing upon which the Labour Party was to be most heartily congratulated, he would say, it was that the members of that party, though they came from every State in the Commonwealth, found some bond of union strong enough to enable them to sink all their State and provincial jealousies and hatred, and to work together upon a broad basis of Australian brotherhood.

It would appear from this that the Labour Party was one which the right honorable gentleman might very well support, unless there was something very wrong with their policy. He said further—

He had never denounced the labour leagues. He cherished esteem for members of any organization which endeavoured to advance the intellectual and political welfare of the country in which they lived. The great labour agitation had its root in a sound cause. It aimed at bringing about a political ideal in which the manhood and womanhood of the land would have equal power; but the time had come when it devolved upon him to stand right across the path of the Labour Party.

At a later stage he also said—

The Labour Party was a selfish, formidable organization, which strove to terrorize the workers of Australia into their ranks or drive them into the gutter.

In the first part of his speech the right honorable gentleman made the most kindly references to the Labour Party, but he ended by denouncing them. He stated what was absolutely untrue with regard to the aims and objects of the party. He advanced no arguments in support of his assertions, and has said nothing whatever to justify his statements that the party was a "selfish, formidable organization which strove to terrorize the workers of Australia into their ranks, or drive them into the gutter." No greater slander could have been uttered. The statement has no foundation in fact. If the Labour Party had any such aim as that which he has indicated, it should not have been spoken of in the terms used by the right honorable member at an earlier stage of his address. I do not propose to deal with the methods adopted to bring about the defeat of the Watson Government. I entertain very strong feelings with regard, not to the defeat of the Government, but to the way in which a measure of vast importance, involving very large interests, including those of the most valuable industry in the Commonwealth, has been sacrificed in order to gratify the ambition of those who wanted office. History tells us that the great Napoleon, as he was called, in order to gratify his ambition, sacrificed the lives of 2,000,000 persons who had no interest in his quarrels. So in the present case the interests of a very large and important section of the community were sacrificed in order to gratify the ambition of the Prime Minister. If the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill had first been launched on its way I should not have had any grave cause for complaint; but the course adopted by the right honorable gentleman and his supporters was such as to indicate that they had no regard whatever for the interests of the masses. They were actuated to a far greater extent by consideration for the classes who are behind them. After the defeat of the late Government some statements were made by different party leaders, and I desire to call special attention to some remarks which fell from the Prime Minister. He said—

I think this division marks a line of cleavage which will dominate the politics of the immediate future. The crisis which brought into line men like Mr. Deakin and myself points to some great national emergency. It cannot be said that this is one of those old time combinations in order to secure the distinctions of office. It is notorious that Mr. Deakin's one anxiety throughout the present crisis has been to avoid office. I think the public of Australia will give us credit for having in our minds some higher purpose.

The system of government under which we live has been outraged by this new form of caucus Cabinet and caucus Executive. Then we have the network which surrounds the present Government in relation to despotic outside bodies, which are the masters of the Ministries, and all the time hold their political destinies in the hollow of their hands. All this has come to an end.

Then, again, the honorable member for Gippsland, speaking in reference to the caucus machine, said—

They were told that all parties had caucus meetings. He well knew that all parties went into caucus for the election of a Speaker or Chairman of Committees, but they never heard of other parties going into caucus to compel a minority to change their views and support the views of the majority. That process, in his opinion, was destructive of the wholesome principle of government by majority. The Labour Party numbered twenty-five in the House of Representatives. Suppose on an important question, thirteen held one view and twelve another view. They went into caucus; the twelve men might fight hard for their views and try to induce their comrades to accept them. If they were finally outvoted, they would have to come out of the caucus meeting a solid vote, and be prepared to vote against their own convictions. Twelve votes taken from one side and put on the other meant twenty-four votes in the House of Representatives, out of a total of seventy-five.

That statement was cheered. I do not say that the Minister of Trade and Customs would wilfully make an incorrect statement in regard to the Labour Party, and the fact that, unlike the Prime Minister, he has not been in close touch with the party and its methods, is some excuse for the mistake that he made in the speech which I have just quoted. No such practice is adopted as that to which he referred. We do not compel members of the party to change their views in caucus. The only questions that are discussed by the caucus are those dealt with in our platform, and even those are discussed only in relation to any Bill that is introduced, the desire being to see whether that Bill is designed to give effect to the principles which we favour. The reference made by the Minister of Trade and Customs to machine politics, is entirely incorrect.

Mr. WILKS.—But the Labour Party can change their platform by conference?

Mr. SPENCE.—Misrepresentations of this kind are undoubtedly made with some ulterior object in view. The Minister of Trade and Customs probably did not know better—

Mr. HUTCHISON.—He repeated the same statements after he had been put right in this House.

Mr. SPENCE.—The same remark applies to that section of the press which is opposed to the Labour Party. If I mistake not, the copy of the pledge from which the Minister of Trade and Customs quoted, was taken from the Argus. That newspaper, in setting the pledge before the people, deliberately caused an alteration to be made in regard to one word, so that it would appear that we met in caucus to deal with every question. The position is entirely different. Our platform for the last election provided for the maintenance of a White Australia, compulsory arbitration, old-age pensions, the nationalization of monopolies, a citizen defence force, the restriction of public borrowing, and navigation laws. The caucus can deal only with those questions, and I repeat that the Argus deliberately misled its readers. The Minister of Trade and Customs was probably misled in this way, and he will find that the caucus deals only with questions relating to the platform of the party.

Mr. McLEAN.—That was stated in the pledge which I read.

Mr. SPENCE.—Then, how does the honorable gentleman justify the statement which he made? We have constantly to fight against misrepresentation of this kind from quarters whence it ought not to come. Whatever difference of opinion there may be between honorable members, that difference should be honestly based on facts, and when a distinct statement is made, and is just as distinctly denied, it should not be repeated. If the Minister of Trade and Customs knew that the labour pledge was that which I have mentioned, he certainly misled the public by inferring that the Labour Party was bound in regard to all matters, by the caucus. As a matter of fact, we meet every week and transact business. It is because we are an active, militant party that other sections view us with a jealous eye. We transact a great deal of business, but a reference to records of divisions taken in this House will show that on questions of detail the members of the party are frequently at variance. Our opponents do not seek to enlighten themselves by reference to such facts; they wish to continue to misrepresent our position. I can find no excuse for the misrepresentation of which the Prime Minister has been guilty, for he had the support of the State Labour Party of New South Wales for a period of five years. If after so intimate an acquaintance with the methods of the party as that support must have afforded him, he does not know what are the true facts in regard to the caucus, he certainly is not fit to hold office as Prime Minister of the Commonwealth. The caucus of the Labour Party did not interfere in any way with the late Government. I can support the statements made by the leader of the Opposition, that no attempt was made by the caucus to interfere with his Ministry, and that it had no hand in the framing of its policy. The Prime Minister appeared very anxious a little time ago to know what was transacted at the labour caucus, but now that I am prepared to enlighten him, I find that he is not in the chamber.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Labour Party, from first to last, supported the late Ministry.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—That was because the Government did not go beyond our platform.

Mr. SPENCE.—Let me refer to one incident which will show that the Labour Party, as a whole, was careful not to interfere in any way with the late Government. During the life of the Barton Administration the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill was referred to a sub-committee of the Labour Party, in order that it might be considered clause by clause, the desire being that it should be as perfect as possible. That work was carried out, and the sub-committee, in its report, which was adopted by the caucus, suggested certain slight alterations. One important principle—that relating to the appointment of permanent Judges, in addition to the Justices of the High Court—was discussed, and some members of the party held very decided views upon it. The caucus adopted the recommendation of the sub-committee, that that portion of the Bill which dealt with the matter should be allowed to pass as it stood; but when the Labour Government came into power, it was found that its members held a different opinion. Without consulting the party, the Cabinet made an amendment, providing for assessors to be appointed in respect of each dispute that came before the Court. That action was taken contrary to the decision of the labour caucus, and yet no exception was taken to it by the party. Honorable members opposite praise the work performed by the late Government. They say that each Minister left an absolutely clean sheet behind him in his Department, and that no fault can be found with their administration. Nothing can be said against their policy, or in opposition to the planks on which the members of the Labour Party generally were elected.

We have nothing whatever to do with what some labour newspapers may advocate, or with that which Mr. Tom Mann may say. The present Government has snatched a temporary victory, and taken advantage of a Ministry which had the courage to stand by a principle in which it believed. The present Government find themselves in office, not because of any fault that could be discovered against the Administration which they displaced. They are unable to denounce the Labour Party because of anything which it has done, or proposes to do, but they set up a bogey, and appeal to the country by means of misrepresentation and slander. A Government which has at its head a right honorable gentleman who is capable of such tactics, is unworthy of the confidence of the Parliament. I have to make another quotation from a speech made by the Prime Minister, in which he said—

It is not for us to dictate to the electors of Australia what the issues of an election, on perhaps a distant date, should be. That is a matter entirely within their own province; but I feel bound to say that the war with the Labour Party upon which we have entered to-night would lead to absolute disaster, to utter failure, if we were to begin by a division upon fiscal matters in this great fight before the people of Australia. The evils of split voting have been painfully in evidence in the Victorian and New South Wales State elections. We must not give a triumph to our opponents by divisions amongst ourselves.

I look upon the vote of to-night as one which must be followed up by determined organization, not only within the walls of Parliament, but throughout the whole of the Australian States. We must strive to emulate, if not the cast-iron and despotic methods of the Labour Party, their personal unselfishness and unflinching zeal. It is the absence of these characteristics, one or the other, which has brought upon Australia all the miseries of minority Government and minority rule. We must endeavour to adjust the difficulties of the great fight which is bound to come, so that the voice of the great majority of the people will be heard, and can be translated into the proper exercise of the powers of Government and of the Legislature.

The point I wish to emphasize very strongly is that when proposals for a coalition were first submitted, a time limit was fixed to the life of that coalition. In speaking at a conference of farmers held recently at Kyneton, the right honorable member for East Sydney said that each party was to keep its powder dry, and that, although they were going to reduce the three parties in the Parliament to two, and to abolish minority rule—he did not explain how that was to be carried out—each party to the coalition was to maintain its separate organization until the next election. Honorable members will see from a later statement made by the Prime Minister that his present intention is that the coalition shall be a permanent one, and that the anti-Labour plank is to occupy a permanent place in its platform. The desire is to keep the Labour Party out of power. The original proposals made for coalition between the followers of the right honorable member for East Sydney and the honorable and learned member for Ballarat failed only because some of the followers of the last-named honorable member declined to accept them. Those proposals have gone by the board; and certain honorable members of the Protectionist Party, having been trapped into following the leadership of the right honorable member for East Sydney, are to continue to permanently occupy that position. I am pleased that the House is now divided into two parties. We have at last the Conservatives on the one side—unfortunately they are in power—and the Democrats on the other.

Mr. McCAY.—The only point is that the honorable member makes a mistake as to the sides on which the two parties are ranged.

Mr. SPENCE. — We have a Government "by the grace of Watson." I hope that the Ministry will have such a heading printed on their note-paper. I have to make another quotation which, I think, is rather important as showing the position taken up by the Prime Minister, who apparently admits that an apology is necessary for his coming into office. The speech made by him yesterday certainly seemed to me to be very much in the nature of an apology. Without consulting the other head of the Government, the Prime Minister issued three manifestoes, and thought that it would be quite sufficient to deal with Western Australia and Tasmania in a postscript. What has the right honorable member for Swan done that the great country from which he comes should be dealt with in that way? I certainly do not think that two States should be dealt with in a mere postscript to a Ministerial manifesto.

Mr. WILKS.—The postscript is the best part of a love letter.

Mr. SPENCE.—It is considered the best part of a lady's letter, and it generally has reference to something that has been forgotten. The Prime Minister was so absorbed in welding together the two great States of Victoria and New South Wales that he altogether forgot there were other States in the Commonwealth. The postscript was written when he remembered that there was the State of Western Australia and the little island State of Tasmania. I propose now to quote something which the right honorable gentleman said in his official manifesto, which was his first utterance to the public, and his apology for being the leader of the Commonwealth Government. He says—

Under the guise of a noble desire for "industrial peace," we are beginning to suspect the existence of a gigantic conspiring against the freedom of the general worker, and an organized desire to make the trades unions, instead of a body of artisans concerning themselves, as they used to do, with their own industrial interests, a series of political agencies, forcing men to join their ranks, or forcing an Australian Council of Justice, known as a "Conciliation and Arbitration Court," to place a barrier between non-unionist and his means of subsistence. The trades unions, the political labour leagues, the central executives, the "labour" members of Parliament, the "labour" caucus in Parliament, and the Judge of the Arbitration Court—these are the intended instruments of a dangerous selfish movement, which seeks to assert political domination in order to trample under foot not only political equality, but far more—the industrial equalities and opportunities of the working classes of Australia.

There is again a statement without foundation. I challenge the right honorable gentleman to give any evidence that it is true. The whole of his statements are mere assertions. I challenge the honorable member for Gippsland to give one instance in support of his contention. Members of the present Government make statements for which there is no foundation, and they are repeated as a parrot repeats the lesson it is taught in a press which has always been antagonistic to the labour movement.

Mr. FISHER.—Having no policy, they must abuse their opponents.

Mr. SPENCE.—I have already said that they have no policy but that of opposition to the Labour Party. They have termed the labour platform a socialistic platform, and I shall show honorable members what kind of Socialists they are. I make another quotation, in which the right honorable gentleman speaks strongly of organizations, because I have an object in view. The right honorable gentleman is reported to have said at a meeting of the Farmers', Property-owners', and Producers' Association—

As men of intelligence, you must have noticed how a minority has for years exercised a tremendous unconstitutional influence upon the Parliaments of Australia. How is it that twenty-three or twenty-five men in a House of 100 a House of seventy-five, should have absolute power? It is that, although their avocations are humble, yet they all learned one or two lessons well. The first is organization. The organization of the Labour Party would do credit to the most intelligent body of political wire-pullers that ever existed in any country. If you would break that down, you must show yourself loyal and unselfish too. They do this in the labour ranks, can't we do it too? I had five years experience of the Labour Party in the New South Wales Parliament. During most of the time I was practically in the hollow of their hands. They will tell you that the result was I got my free-trade tariff passed with the help of protectionist labour men. They can always call on me in a deal of that sort. "I may not admire the principles of your caucus," I say to them, "but the direction of your vote meets with my entire approval." To those who say I have just discovered the wrong position which the labour leagues occupy, I will say, "Look at the Sydney newspapers of 1894 and you will find as strong a denunciation of the principle of the labour caucus as if I spoke for twenty years." It is no new thing with me. They gave me what I wanted, and then I was too slow for them, so they cried to Sir William Lyne, and they got more out of him in twelve months than they would have got out of me in 200 years.

Then he went on to speak of their tyranny, but I need not quote his references to that. I wish to show that the right honorable gentleman has been doing something outside of Parliament which he has given us no account of in this chamber. He has been attending the meetings of the various bodies which are not labour organizations, and what I have quoted is an instance of the kind of thing he tells them. I invite honorable members to consider the extraordinary logic of the right honorable gentleman. It was quite right for the Labour Party to support him. He said that they had him in the hollow of their hands. That was all right, so long as he got their votes, but it suddenly becomes a wonderfully wicked thing that they should support some body else. If their support was bad, why did the right honorable gentleman put up with it for five years, in order that he might hold office? If it was the wicked thing which he is now inviting the country to believe, what honorable man would have availed himself of its support, and would have thus shared in the wickedness? The right honorable gentleman contends that the power of the Labour Party is a wicked thing in Federal politics, because we do not now hold the balance of power in his favour, as we did in the State Parliament of New South Wales. It is true that we got more out of the honorable member for Hume than we should have got out of the right honorable gentleman in 200 years. What did we get from the honorable member for Hume? We got measures abolishing sweating and giving the employes in the work shops some chance of a life worth living, by securing for them reasonable hours of labour.

Mr. WILKS.—With the assistance of the votes of Reid supporters.

Mr. SPENCE.—We secured the Arbitration Act and Female Suffrage. We are now told at this late stage, because the right honorable gentleman desires to please the Federated Employers' Union, that we should not have got these things from him in 200 years. That is an extraordinary confession for a right honorable gentleman to make, who has posed as a democrat, who talks democracy, and who calls himself a liberal. I am astonished that the honorable member for Dalley, who is a democrat, should sit for an hour behind a leader who has so evidently surrendered all his democratic principles. The right honorable gentleman hit the right nail on the head when he said that we got more from the honorable member for Hume than we should have got from him in 200 years. He admits now that we should never have had the four or five important measures, including Female Suffrage, to which I have referred if he had remained in power. The right honorable gentleman has by his own confession shown that the Labour Party in New South Wales did the right thing when they exercised their votes to turn him out of office, and I say that they will be even more decidedly right if they now turn him out of office in the Federal Parliament, because he is adopting principles which he did not profess to hold then. A number of meetings of the Farmers, Property-Owners, and Producers Association, and the Victorian Reform League have recently been held. I suppose that the Victorian Reform League can hardly be called a democratic body. We have never looked upon it in that light. I have not heard that its special interest is to look after the masses who most need protection. At the meetings of these bodies the chairmen and all the speakers have joined in denouncing Socialism. It would appear that their whole object now is anti-socialistic. These meetings have been addressed not only by the Prime Minister, but also by Senator Drake, the Vice-President of the Executive Council, who said at one meeting—

The new Government, for the first time in the history of the Commonwealth, was supported by a majority of members of the House. It was a small majority, it was true, but it would be carefully looked after, and he hoped that it would continue.

It is very suggestive to say that the majority would be carefully looked after. I have understood that honorable members now occupying the Government benches are so unanimous in their desire for majority rule, and in getting a coalition to secure responsible Government, that they would not need to be carefully looked after, as though they were a number of sheep who might stray away. It appears that the Vice-President of the Executive Council is satisfied that they require to be carefully looked after. He continued—

What they wanted was unity. It was a feature of the opposing force that they were always in their places in Parliament.

A Mr. Felstead interjected "They have nothing else to do," and the report announces that there was laughter at the suggestion. To these people to whom the Government are looking for support, it would appear to be some sort of offence that members of Parliament should attend to their duties. It is a somewhat new feature, I admit. The old political idea was that politics were something to which a man might give the fag end of his brains, after he had attended to his private business. People who have so much to say about private enterprise, are astonished that members of Parliament should stick to their work. One of the best characteristics of the Labour Party is, that its members have always done that. I take it as a high compliment to them, and I believe that the electors generally look at the matter in the same light. One reason why the Party is gaining ground at every State and every Federal election is, that the electors have found that the members of the party consider the welfare of the country, and devote themselves to carrying out the duties they are elected to perform. The Farmers, Property Owners, and Producers Association held a convention quite recently, and over the report of the proceedings, there are a number of cross headings, "Fighting the Trades Hall," "Proposed National Organization," and so on. No less than 120 delegates were present, and it was stated that they represented 100 branches. They passed some very decided resolutions, all strongly anti-labour. This body, and representatives of the Reform League subsequently met together.

Mr. CHANTER.—They are only free-trade organizations under another name.

Mr. Spence.

Mr. SPENCE.—No, these bodies are not free-trade organizations. I wish now to read a portion of a newspaper report of a meeting of the Farmers', Property Owners', and Producers' Association. The first paragraph will make the honorable member for Gippsland feel comfortable—

The secretary read a report in which it was stated that, although the association had only been in existence a few months, it had already made it impossible for a socialistic labour candidate to be elected for a Gippsland constituency.

After debate, it was resolved—"That it is advisable to take steps to confer with the Chamber of Agriculture, with a view to settling a modus vivendi, whereby the sympathy and co-operation of the chamber may be secured without any sinking of our individuality, or alteration of our constitution."

The following motion was then moved by a delegate:—

That, in the opinion of this meeting of delegates, it is desirable that each and all now assembled do unite with the Farmers', Property Owners', and Producers' Association, thus forming a strong organization to oppose to the utmost all socialistic or aggressive legislation affecting country interests, and to uphold the rights of property owners and producers of all kinds.

He said that the—Convention should take a leaf out of the book of the Labour Party and fight them with their own weapons. (Applause.)

Mr. J. WILLIS (Geelong), in seconding the motion, read the pledge of labour candidates for Parliament, and said that a man who allowed such a chain to be put around his neck should have something else put round his neck, and be strung up to the yardarm of a ship.

I suppose that loud cheers would have followed that proposition if there had been any chance of carrying it into effect. I shall now quote again from the newspaper which so strongly supports the movement—the Sydney Daily Telegraph. This is a portion of a report, which shows how the work is going on in New South Wales—

MOVEMENT IN NEW SOUTH WALES.—CONFERENCE TO BE HELD.—A WIDE BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

Something has been done in New South Wales with a view to the ranging of forces into line against a menacing Socialism, but it has not been of a very definite character. Mr. Deakin's now famous speech helped to stir people up to the necessity for some action, and now Mr. Reid's speech to the Farmers' League of Victoria will give a further stimulus to the movement. The initiative has been taken by the Employers' Federation, and at a meeting of the council of that body yesterday it was decided to take definite steps to organize a conference, or large public meeting, representative of the stable interests of the country generally, to consider a plan of organization. To this end every agricultural, horticultural, and pastoral body, every creamery and butter factory, the Farmers' and Settlers' Association, every country municipal council—in short, every country interest, is to be asked to send delegates to meet those representing town interests. Provision will also be made for the extensive representation of all wage-earners who are not in sympathy with the socialistic party's platform. The date of the meeting or conference has yet to be settled. It is desired that the time fixed should be as widely convenient as possible to the country people. The co-operation of women will very probably also be invited.

I think that I have now produced evidence sufficient to show the work which is being done by the Government and those upon whom they are depending for support. If the organizations which have been created do what it is said that the labour organizations do, the Government will be controlled and dictated to by a body outside Parliament. Active work is now going on to bring about the organization of what we term the reactionary forces—forces that no one can term democratic, their whole object being anti-socialistic and anti-labour. The Government represents such organizations, and the Prime Minister is taking an active part in their creation. He is assisting their paid organizers. I am not finding fault with these bodies for organizing, because I have always been a preacher of unionism and have advocated the organizing of all classes of the community. But it cannot be denied that this Government represents a particular section of the community, which it is assisting to organize. No doubt we all of us share the desire for a reasonable recess; but, in my opinion, the real object of the long recess which has been advocated, on a plea of peace, is, not to bring about harmony, because no other Federation has been established with so little friction between the federating States and the Federal Government, but to organize forces. The object of the organization which the Government support is declared and open. I find no fault with that, because it is of advantage to us. We have always looked upon Mr. Walpole as a helper, since his statements have been so candid at times that people have been prevented by them from joining his organizations. It is impossible for those who have heard him speak to be foolish enough to imagine that the class amongst whom sweaters have been found, and whose members do not consider it their business to pay decent wages if they can get employes to work for less, is to be regarded as representative of the workers, or as likely to advance the interests of labour. The first and chief plank in the platform of the Farmers', Property Owners', and Producers' Association is this—

That at all elections, whether Federal or State, where a socialistic candidate nominates for a constituency, the members of this association sink all political differences and go solidly in support of a candidate to be selected by the association in opposition to such socialistic candidate.

We have heard the Prime Minister denounce the labour method of selecting candidates; but he is assisting in the creation of an association whose first plank is to follow labour methods. He has, indeed, advised them to follow the methods of the labour leagues. The first plank of their platform is to sink all political differences. The Government, too, have done that. Nothing is vital to them, but to continue in office, to get into recess, and then to vigorously organize.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—To keep in the tart shop at all hazards.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member for Parramatta knows what hard work is. He knows the sufferings which strikes entail, because he has been in close touch with them, and he has represented men who have had to work in coal mines. Now he is assisting to organize the Federated Employers.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is talking at random.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member for Parramatta has followed his chief in every movement, erratic or otherwise, and must follow him again. It is a new thing to find one of whose conduct I have not previously had cause to complain, associating with a movement which is so distinctly opposed to his past history. I have no fault to find with those who have always belonged to the class of whom I am speaking; but those whose associations and professions have been different should open their eyes to what this movement means. Plank 3 of the Association is—

To watch over all measures proposed by the Federal or State Parliaments affecting the association, and guarding the interests of the same. I have nothing to say against that plank; but I find that those who are opposed to anything socialistic, who believe in the individual fighting his own battle and would put no restriction upon private enterprise, are asking for a good many things from the State. Here are a few of their requests: They want the State Government to give them water conservation, land on deferred payments, a Manure Protection Bill, reduced grain freights, wire netting on deferred payments, a bonus on foxes' scalps, help in time of bush fires, starving stock rates, cold storage for produce, a credit foncier, to enable them to borrow money; grants for shows, a market for fruit, instructors in the growing of tobacco, and subsidies for agricultural colleges. They also seriously discussed the advisability of asking the Government for assistance to pay for reapers and binders, though, I believe, that they did not finally agree to do so. Yet these are the anti-Socialists, the persons who are opposed to State interference. In reality, they wish to get all they can out of the Government. They are the chief scramblers for Government aid. The Kyabram district, from which the movement originated, has borrowed large sums from the State, which it has not paid back, and is now asking for another £1,000. Their impudence is beyond description.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member does not mean to say that the farmers are asking for those things?

Mr. SPENCE.—Yes, I do. I have mentioned fourteen items; but those are not all. This association, which the Prime Minister is organizing upon declared anti-socialistic lines, is asking for these concessions. I should like to know whether any honorable member can point to an instance in which the labour organizations have sent deputations to the Government asking for subsidies, or for concessions such as these I have indicated?

Mr. WILSON.—They have asked for a lot more than that.

Mr. SPENCE.—Honorable members cannot point to any case in which the labour organizations have gone to the Government and asked for favours of any kind, or in which they have sought to dip their hands into the public Treasury.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—What about relief works?

Mr. SPENCE.—Surely a man is entitled to ask for work? If a man works, he produces more in value than that which is paid for his labour. It is the man who lives on rentals, and who draws interest without giving anything in return who is a burden upon the community. Would not the honorable member apply for work if his wife and family were starving? The organization to which I have referred is one for political purposes which have been openly declared, and I have indicated how its members propose to protect their interests. I am not condemning their proposals as such. The Labour Party have supported many of them, and are still in favour of granting certain concessions to farmers. I desire, however, to direct attention to the political hypocrisy of these people who, whilst stating that they are opposed to Socialism, declare themselves by their policy to be equally as socialistic in their ideas as any section in the community. They say that they are opposed to State interference, and yet they want the State to do more for them than has ever been asked for by the wage-earning class. We have heard a great deal about minority rule, and I wish to show the direction in which the Government is now trending. I will confine my attention to the condition of affairs in the two larger States, because Western Australia and Tasmania are now apparently regarded as mere postscripts. The only two States in the Commonwealth that are worthy of consideration, according to the view of the Prime Minister, are Victoria and New South Wales, and the mission of the Government is to establish brotherly feelings between those States. In New South Wales there are 110,000 land-owners, of whom 66,000 hold under 1,000 acres each, embracing a total of 10,800,000 acres in the country districts. There are 1,314 land-owners who hold 27,000,000 acres in the country districts, and there are 738 owners who hold half of the total area of private lands in New South Wales. I am quoting from Coghlan.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Is the honorable member quoting figures as to value or as to area?

Mr. SPENCE.—I am dealing now with acres.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Those afford no criterion.

Mr. SPENCE.—My object is to show the small number of persons who would be represented in organizations such as those now being formed. These persons would represent a very small minority of the people in the State. The employers number 53,000 in New South Wales, and 48,000 in Victoria; whereas the wage-earners in New South Wales number 362,000, and in Victoria 321,000. Those who are working on their own account in New South Wales number 82,000, and in Victoria 94,000. Assuming for the sake of argument that the statement of the Minister of Trade and Customs is correct, and that the Labour Party represents only the wage-earning classes—

Mr. McLEAN.—The Labour Party represents only a section of the wage-earning classes.

Mr. SPENCE.—I am assuming for the sake of argument that we represent the wage-earning classes of the community only. I contend that we represent others as well. We should still represent a majority of the electors, whereas the Prime Minister, and those who are organizing the employers, would represent a minority. It is idle for honorable members to prate about the representation of minorities when they are actively organizing for political purposes a section which constitutes a very small minority, and are hoping for a long recess in order that they may bring together in one association the most conservative classes in the community. These people are the best able to assist themselves, and I should be ashamed to assist in organizing them. I should give them fair play, and fair play only. Notwithstanding all that has been said with regard to the organization of the Labour Party, we can come here only through the same door as that which is available to other honorable members. We, like them, are dependent upon the will of the electors. Many labour members in the States Parliaments, and more than one in the Federal Parliament, have been elected by constituencies in which there has been no labour league, or other organization of that kind. Why should our organizations be objected to because they insist upon shunting out of political life those who fail to adhere to their principles? Does the Prime Minister defend traitors? If a man breaks his pledges, is he to be lauded to the skies? When a man dishonorably breaks his pledges, is he entitled to be trusted again? Our organizations have been denounced because they have discarded men who have been recreant to their trust. The labour movement has not been built up by traitors, but by those who have worked zealously and unselfishly, in order to forward the cause of labour, men who have not gone to the Government to ask for any favour, but who have always been prepared to work for their living under reasonable conditions. The Minister of Trade and Customs has stated that members of the Labour Party are under the necessity of passing through the ordeal of selection by the Labour leagues. That is not correct, so far as New South Wales is concerned. I was not asked to submit myself for selection at the last election. I had the right, according to our rules, to offer myself for re-election, unless I had misconducted myself by breaking my pledges.

If there was any charge of that kind to be brought against me, I should have to be notified three months beforehand. In the absence of any such call, I was entitled to re-submit myself as a representative of the Labour Party for the constituency for which I was formerly returned. The labour organizations are not the only ones which discard their representatives. Mr. Hawthorne, who formerly represented Leichhardt in the New South Wales Assembly, was "bumped out" by his party after having worked very hard for its leaders, including the present Prime Minister. No consideration was shown to him, and it does not lie in the mouths of those who were parties to the treatment accorded to Mr. Hawthorne to find fault with the methods adopted by the labour organizations. Honorable members talk about our representing a minority, but I would ask them how we could get here unless we could successfully appeal to the electors? How can that statement be made in the face of the experience of the last twelve years? The Labour Party has gained ground in every State, not because of its organization, but because of the proposals which it has put forward. We have submitted humanitarian and other proposals of importance to the community generally. None of our planks refer merely to the interests of the wage-earners. How is it that many of the country districts return labour representatives? There are not a sufficient number of wage-earners in the district which I represent to return me without the assistance of others. I represent a district in which the pastoral and mining industries are very largely carried on, whereas the honorable member for Bland represents a purely farming district. If we are such enemies to the employers and to the land-owning class, how is it that we find such favour in their eyes? Is it because we carry out our platform, and because we do not, as the Prime Minister has done, surrender our policy for considerations of expediency? He fought for free-trade, and the honorable and learned member for Ballarat opposed him. In the old days in Victoria many of us fought with the late Sir Graham Berry against the very forces which are now being brought into prominence by the Prime Minister. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat and the Minister of Trade and Customs have allied themselves with a party whose main design is to bring about class rule. The trades unions are naturally formed for the purpose of protecting the interests of the trades with which they are connected; but the membership of the labour leagues embraces many persons other than unionists or wage-earners. We have a large number of employers in our ranks, who believe in our aims and principles. The Prime Minister has told honorable members that at one time the Labour Party held him in the hollow of its hand. Why did he submit to that? Because his platform and that of the Labour Party were brought into agreement. We had to accept some things which we did not like, because we knew that the alternative was worse. We supported the right honorable gentleman in fighting for free-trade—for an absolutely free port. That was something very different from free-trade as it is understood in Federal politics. Will the representatives of the large landholders who sit in the Government corner support a tax on land values? Will the honorable member for Corangamite and the honorable and learned member for Wannon support a tax on land values similar to that for which the right honorable member fought? He said that the members of the protectionist party gave him free-trade, but he overlooked the fact that they regarded a tax on land values and other forms of direct taxation as being of the utmost importance, and considered that even if a prohibitive Tariff were imposed it would still be necessary to resort to direct taxation. We were not satisfied that he would go fast enough to suit us, and we therefore put another honorable gentleman into office. That honorable gentleman gave us great measures, which conduced to the well-being of society. I am surprised to learn that the right honorable gentleman, who is now at the head of the Government, has said that he would not have given us these measures. That statement shows that we were right in turning him out of office. I have endeavoured to show that the Prime Minister is out of touch with the great mass of public feeling in the Commonwealth, that he is out of touch with democracy in any form, and that he is in league with all the reactionary forces that are now so militant. At the last general election he received the support of the Employers' Union, which devotes its attention to the interests of employers, as employers only, and does not do or pretend to do anything for labour generally. That organization and many others of the same kind were behind the Prime Minister and his party.

Mr. Spence.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—The honorable member is wrong; they were behind the protectionist party.

Mr. SPENCE.—They were not behind the protectionists as a party. The Reform League and the Employers' Federation of New South Wales have united to denounce what they term "Socialism." They do not understand the true meaning of the word, and they know that many people are ready to adopt their definition of it. In the same way they are making use of the word "reform," and thus a party has been brought together to support what is distinctly a class movement. It has been created to protect the interests of a class that is strong enough to look after itself, and it is surprising to me that such a democratic assembly as the Federal Parliament is generally admitted to be, should be expected to allow a small minority to control the majority. I wish to show that the Government are opposed to democracy. I do not know how far the remarks which I am about to make will apply to the second leader of the Ministry, and to that section of the Government supporters which follow him. I believe that they will apply mainly to the old free-trade section of the party. That party, so far as economic principles are concerned, are consistent in their support of anti-labour movements.

Mr. LONSDALE.—No.

Mr. SPENCE.—Then they are in favour of anarchy. They are in favour of the "let-alone" policy. They believe in a political economy that was in full play nearly 100 years ago. At that time the key-note of social reform was the cry of "natural rights," while, so far as economics were concerned, we had the policy of laissez faire.

Mr. FULLER.—Who was responsible for all the liberal legislation which is to-day in force in New South Wales?

Mr. SPENCE.—I am not now dealing with that point, although I should not hesitate to give credit to the man responsible for that legislation if he were present. The policy of the Government is not in keeping with the modern trend of public thought. We cannot expect such a Government to be in keeping with it. To-day "co-operation" is the key-note of social reform, but it does not necessarily mean that we are ready to make every industry a State-owned one. The Labour Party have to be judged according to the direct proposals that we put forward. No one has a right to charge us with some supposititious policy which we have never advocated. In social reform we find that the watch-word is "co-operation," while in economics it is "character." In the old days, a man was merely considered to be a money-making animal, but to-day we have regard to his all-round capacity. We consider the well-being of individuals as such; we regard man not as a mere commodity to be bought and sold in the market, as is held by many in that economic school with which the Prime Minister has been associated. We consider man from the stand-point of everything that makes for his well-being. The reason why I quoted the very excellent remarks made recently by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat was because they showed a recognition of modern economic thought. Matthew Arnold defined civilization as—

The humanizing, the bringing into one harmonious and truly humane life the whole body of society.

Actions to-day are regarded as moral only when they contribute to the well-being of our fellow-men. The unionist movement and everything else that has an influence in developing human character, and in improving the race is of the right kind. Legislation with that object in view may be an interference with the liberty of the individual, but it is not the fact of interference, but the effect of interference, that we have to consider. Mazzini said long ago that every political question is becoming a social question, and every social question is rapidly becoming a religious question. That is the problem of to-day, which is responsible for the activity of the Labour Party. I may perhaps be pardoned for quoting Arnold Toynbee, who puts the exact position in the following words:—

Two conceptions are woven into every argument of the "wealth of nations"—the belief in the supremacy of individual liberty, and the conviction that man's self love is God's Providence, so that the individual in pursuit of his own interests is promoting the interests of all.

Mr. KELLY.—Hear, hear.

Mr. SPENCE.—I hear an honorable member say, "Hear, hear." If a man understood his true self-interest his pursuit of it would make for the welfare of all. It is said that true self-interest lies in the recognition of the fact that we are dependent and inter-dependent one upon the other. The position from the point of view of wealth production has altered. The old idea was that the wealth of a nation was to be determined from the stand-point of its material production, man being considered as a mere producing animal, to be hired and treated as his employer might think fit. But that is not the position to-day. At the present time production, distribution, and the good of man, all receive consideration. I believe, with Ruskin, that—

Wealth means well living. Life is more than meat. Man should own property, not property own man.

I should like to quote a very clear and comprehensive statement made by Dr. Findlay, a barrister-at-law, who was formerly in partnership with Sir Robert Stout. In commenting recently on the New Zealand Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, Dr. Findlay said—

The tendency of the age is to make that compulsory which is desirable; to discredit free contract, to foster fair contract, between employer and employé; to fix the status of all workmen by regulation as far as possible, and to assess the worker's share at the lowest resort on his needs rather than on the employer's greeds. It is all nonsense to talk of liberty and freedom of conscience in this connexion. As a matter of fact, social man has no natural inalienable and irrevocable rights. He only owns those things with which society is content to clothe him, and no more.

That is the economic foundation on which Conciliation and Arbitration Bills, and other like measures, are based. The views of several members of the present Government are in opposition to all modern principles of political economy. Is it reasonable for us to expect democratic legislation from a Government, which, by a peculiar combination of circumstances, has secured the support of those who hold views contrary to those of the Prime Minister? It is difficult to understand how professed Liberals have allowed themselves to be associated with men who are opposed to interference in any way with freedom of action, who are opposed to any form of restriction, and would allow every man to transact his business as he pleased. These men endeavour to justify their position by the mere use of words. We want to measure a Government, not by mere words, but by the effect of the legislation which it introduces upon the lives, the actions, and the character of men. I maintain that we are justified in fighting against a Government that holds such views as I have mentioned. There has been much misrepresentation in reference to the Labour Party, and but for this we should have achieved a still greater measure of success. It is always difficult to overtake slander, more particularly at election time, and the Labour Party may justly complain that it has been continually misrepresented, both by the press and by other means. There are honorable members of this House whom no one could accuse of desiring to deliberately misrepresent the Labour Party, yet they have been guilty of misrepresenting us. The increase in the membership of the Labour Party is due, in a large measure, to the effect of their propaganda and platform work, in correcting misrepresentations and supplying the electors with the truth, and also because our platform and aims appeal to the people. There are amongst the electors men and women who study economic questions, and who can recognise the difference between the lines of thought which characterize various parties. They recognise at once that their interest lies with those who are considering the well-being of the people as such, instead of mere material wealth-production, irrespective of any consideration as to who owns, controls, or secures the larger share of it. They are looking now to the distribution of wealth in such a way that the standard of living may be generally improved, and the mental standard may be improved side by side with the increased production of wealth. In connexion with the system of misrepresentation which has been followed, I think I shall be justified in quoting some remarks which Mr. Justice Cohen felt himself called upon to make in New South Wales a short time ago, in connexion with some misstatements respecting the operation of a measure similar to one of great importance, which has been before the Federal Parliament, and which has wrecked a couple of Governments, and will probably wreck another.

Mr. TUDOR.—When it is found that they have swallowed the inclusion of the States servants.

Mr. SPENCE.—I may deal with that presently. Mr. Justice Cohen said recently in New South Wales, in dealing with certain misrepresentations concerning the effect of the clause in the New South Wales Arbitration Act, giving preference to unionists:—

I have no leaning one way or the other, but in the public interest it would be far better, if the preference clause is being unduly used as a means of oppressing or harassing employers, that the Court should be assisted by evidence of that. I am not saying in this particular case, because I do not know—but from general statements, I see in the press that this preference clause is the means of harassing the employer, and placing him in an unfair position of working his business. I say it would be much better if the Court were enlightened by evidence of these things. We read in the press of general statements being made—one person takes it up from another person at the corner of the street—and I see general assertions made with regard to what the Court has done, which will not bear any test—they are absolutely without foundation. Therefore, what I say is, in the public interest, in the interests of the Arbitration Act—which, after all, is a most important experiment—it would be much better if people, instead of expressing their grievances in the way in which I have stated, would come to the Court and point out preference has been given in certain cases, and the result is so and so. This is not done. I am not going to be guided in my decisions by what I see in the press. I am guided in my decisions by the sworn evidence in the Court, and that is the only evidence I will be guided by in arriving at my decisions; we are sworn here to decide, in accordance with the evidence placed before us, and that is the only evidence by which I intend to be guided.

Mr. WADE.—I would not for a moment pretend to suggest to the Court that they should be guided by outside opinions.

The PRESIDENT.—I know, from my own knowledge what I read, time after time, of actions attributed to this Court which the Court has never performed. Almost daily in the press you see that. Mind you, I am not saying one way or the other, as to whether this preference clause is or is not worked duly. I have no evidence one way or the other. I will not be guided by what I see in the public press. These general statements are made, and if you put the statements to the proof, in almost all cases they will fail. I do not expect any clause we lay down will work with perfect harmony and satisfaction to every one. All the wisdom of the legislature has not formulated a law to which some objection could not be taken.

A member of the Court said: I would like to say, to show there cannot be very much in these general statements, in every industrial agreement that has been filed in this Court preference has been given. We had an instance of it yesterday in the Shipwrights' dispute, and, in fact, the Court pointed out, in making the common rule, they might have to make some slight qualification in that preference clause. I would like to encourage the parties to make agreements, and I have no hesitation in saying, if all the employers in the State made agreements, they would all grant preference as has been done in the past. I have no doubt, if the two parties in the catering dispute came together at a later stage, and tried to frame an agreement, the employers would grant preference.

That, coming from so high an authority, is a proof that statements were being made which were absolutely untrue, and it should be remembered that the statements were not brought before the Court in order that they might be inquired into with a view to ascertain whether injury had been done by the preference granted, which might be remedied. In view of the discussion which we have had here concerning the granting of preference to unionists, that statement by Mr. Justice Cohen will probably be considered important. In this connexion also, I desire to quote from a leading article appearing in a newspaper published in my electorate. The quotation will show the kind of men who are in some places educating the public mind—journalists, employers of labour, men engaged in the great reform movement now being backed up by the Reid-McLean Administration, the anti-labour, anti-union, and anti-socialistic movement.

Mr. FULLER.—Not anti-labour.

Mr. SPENCE.—It is anti-labour straight out, and if the honorable and learned member for Illawarra does not believe in that, he has no right to sit behind the present Government. In any case, the honorable and learned member is not in his proper place behind the present Government, because I am aware that he has democratic ideas. In the recent State election in New South Wales, for an electorate which is included in my own, and which is also known as the Darling electorate, the electors did a terribly wicked thing, in the eyes of some persons by selecting a labour man by a majority more than equal to the votes polled by his two opponents.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Who was he?

Mr. SPENCE.—Mr. J. C. Mehan, the secretary of the local branch of the Australian Workers' Union. I may add that he defeated the retiring member, Mr. W. N. Willis, of whom some honorable members present have knowledge. This is the advice given in a leading article by the Bourke Banner, in dealing with the election:—

We now advise a course which may seem drastic, but which alone can be effective. No employer should give employment to a member of the Australian Workers' Union. . . . Let the hundreds of union men, to whom the union is their God, look to the union and not to the capitalist for work and wages—for food and clothes for themselves and their families.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That must be a black banner.

Mr. HUGHES.—Do they support the present Coalition Government?

Mr. SPENCE.—Of course they are of the party to which the Coalition Government belongs. We know that the Prime Minister has quoted the remarks of Mr. Tom Mann, as reported in the press, and has charged them to the members of this party, and if I followed the right honorable gentleman's example, I should be justified in charging him and his party with supporting the view of the Bourke Banner.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The Victorian members of the Labour Party in this Parliament subscribe to Mr. Tom Mann's salary, and the honorable member knows it.

Mr. HUGHES.—That is absolutely untrue.

Mr. SPENCE.—The question as to who pays Mr. Tom Mann's salary has nothing to do with the matter.

Mr. HUGHES.—I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call your attention to an interjection made by the honorable and learned member for Wannon, in which he declared that the members of the Labour Party—

Mr. ROBINSON.—Victorian members.

Mr. HUGHES.—That the salary of some person outside was chargeable to the members of this party.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I did not state what the honorable and learned member for West Sydney has said. What I said was that the Victorian labour members contributed to the expenses of Mr. Tom Mann's propaganda.

Mr. TUDOR.—That also is absolutely wrong.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am sorry to have to call attention for the second time in one day to the fact that conversations carried on across the chamber, and especially in a loud tone of voice, are very disorderly and must be discontinued.

Mr. SPENCE.—If this is only one of those attempts to shunt an old hand off the track, honorable members opposite ought to know by this time that it cannot be successful. I unhesitatingly say that, adopting the same form of logic, I should be justified in charging honorable members, who are associated with the movement to which I have referred, and which is not a new movement, but is only specially active just now, with supporting the advice of the Bourke Banner—which I have quoted. I am sure that not one of them would do so.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—We never heard of it until the honorable member quoted it.

Mr. SPENCE.—The advice given is that, because a man has chosen to exercise the franchise in a certain way, he should be prevented from earning a living. I make the quotation that honorable members opposite may know the company they are in. There is an old Spanish proverb which says, "Show me whom you are with, and I will tell you what you are."

Mr. LONSDALE.—Chinese.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—What does the honorable member know about it.

Mr. SPENCE.—I have read the quotation to show honorable members the organizations which are behind them outside of Parliament, and what they are prepared to do.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the honorable member for New England spoke about Chinese, and I wish the honorable member to say what he meant by it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—An honorable member has a perfect right to make the remark "Chinese," and I do not know that any honorable member has any right to require that he should explain his meaning.

Mr. SPENCE.—I feel sure that no member of the House would advocate this on the public platform; but what is proposed has been done in that district. What is set out in black type was acted upon in Victoria in the last State election. I have had experience of the influence of employers. I have known them to try to coerce men to vote in certain directions.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Every one has had that experience more or less.

Mr. SPENCE.—Has similar influence ever been used by the Labour Party, or the labour organizations? Has it not always come from the class which is now being organized? The views which are put forward are held by large numbers of these persons, though not by all of them. Why is it that the masses were denied voting power, and that the right to vote was given only to the classes? Why was preference given to the classes?

Mr. LONSDALE.—That was wrong.

Mr. SPENCE.—Honorable members who have opposed the granting of preference to unionists have been associated with those who have opposed the giving of a vote to every adult. The members of the Legislative Council of Victoria are the backbone of the Employers' Union. They not only oppose the granting of the suffrage to women in the State elections, but tried to prevent the effective exercise of the women's vote in the Federal elections. I have hitherto let the honorable and learned member for Ballarat off very lightly; but I cannot help making a reference to some rather characteristic remarks in the speech with which he started the National Organization at Ballarat. Formerly there used to be a National Association, but as it used to be termed the National Ass. for short, it fell into disrepute. Speaking at Ballarat, the honorable and learned member seemed to think that organization was a good thing so long as it was not too effective. While it was only a half-and-half sort of measure, it appeared all right; but immediately an organization became effective, it was to be denounced. That seems an illogical position. If it is good to have an organization, surely the more influential and perfect that organization can be made, the better it will be. In dealing with organizations, what has first to be considered is their objects, the class of people who control them, and what they are likely to do. I believe in organizations in the interests of all classes. But the organization of which I am speaking is one to weld together those who are antagonistic to a certain section of the community, not because of anything it has done or proposes to do, but because of something it is alleged to be likely to do. These persons belong to a class which is necessarily in a minority everywhere, yet they wish to take charge of public affairs, and to shut labour men out of Parliament. Still, honorable members who are helping the movement have the want of conscience to tell us that they are democrats, and to charge us with being class representatives. We could not obtain election as the representatives of a class. We can get here only by securing the votes of a majority of our constituents. There is no minority representation about us. Is it likely that the members of this or of any other Parliament would allow a small section to dictate to them, if they did not believe in the principles of that section? The legislation which has been passed at the instance of the Labour Party has been passed because the members of the other parties in the House believed in it. The present Government, however, is reactionary. Its only object is to keep the Labour Party out, not for anything we have done, or are likely to do, but merely to retain possession of office. We hear a great deal about minority rule, but the majority of the present Government, if it exists at all, will have to be very tenderly nursed, to use the expression of Senator Drake. Even the supporters of the Government will hardly claim that the honorable and learned member for Parkes is an advanced radical, or an extreme democrat; but the difference between the two parties in the House now is so small that he can control the destinies of this two-headed Government. If he chooses to vote against them, where will they be? A section of the conglomerate party which supports the Ministry is totally opposed to certain important measures of which a majority is in favour. How can the Government carry out a programme under such circumstances? The House has fortunately been divided into two parties, the democrats on this side, and a mixed party on the other. For some of the supporters of the Government there may be salvation even yet. We have heard before of the open door. Well, the new party, the progressive, go-ahead, radical coalition, has an open door.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—With a crimson carpet leading to it.

Mr. SPENCE.—If honorable members come to us we will give them liberty of speech, which they are now denied. The difference between the two parties is that the methods of the leader of the Government are the methods of the autocrats, while our methods are those of democracy.

Mr. LONSDALE.—What is in a name?

Mr. SPENCE.—There may not be much in a name, but there is something in actions. We have heard a denunciation of caucuses; but honorable members opposite are ruled by one man. They must do what they are told. That accounts for their silence at the time of the crisis, when they could not be stirred up even by the admittedly powerful invective of the honorable and learned member for West Sydney. All that they were allowed to do was to make personal explanations. They may boast of freedom, but they have no conception of what the word means. They do not enjoy freedom themselves, and will not give it to others. On the occasion to which I refer, the honorable and learned member for Werriwa got up to speak, and was pulled down by his coat-tails, while the honorable members for Parramatta and Robertson were allowed only to make personal observations. Although our party is governed by caucus, we have proved that it did not interfere with the late Administration. We recognised the older methods, which are supposed to be constitutional; but, even if we had interfered, our action would have been more democratic than that of the leader of the Government, whom honorable members follow so blindly. Now they are going to follow two leaders, and they have no policy upon which they are solid. How the Government could carry on legislation under existing circumstances is a mystery which will never be made known, because they will not remain long enough in office to pass any. Honorable members opposite who speak of freedom and liberty are associated with men against whom I have been fighting for the last thirty-five years. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat will admit that the free-traders, the revenue tariffists of Victoria, were the Conservative body in the State, even in the days of Sir Graham Berry. Yet they are the men with whom the supporters of the Government have been associated ever since the right honorable member for East Sydney entered Federal politics. The men I speak of are not like the free-traders of the New South Wales school. They believe in direct taxation. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat was associated with Sir Graham Berry in fighting these men; but now he has led his followers into the meshes of an entanglement, so that they are associated with one who is the champion of those whom we have fought in the past, and who have "cruelled" Victoria. I have the greatest admiration for the honorable and learned gentleman, and I regret that he has not seen the danger of a coalition with reactionaries. The people of New South Wales do not fully understand what class of persons they are who in Victoria call themselves free-traders. What does the Minister of Trade and Customs expect from such a following? The honorable member for Moira is now supporting the construction of the Transcontinental Railway, although he at one time threatened to stone-wall all night the proposed authorization of a survey of the line.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Did not the honorable member once serve under the present Prime Minister?

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable gentleman has now joined a party which is going to carry out that railway.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Who says so?

Mr. SPENCE.—If the honorable member does not say so, why is he sitting on that side of the chamber? What is this party? We had three parties in the House previously, but how many parties are there now? I am inclined to think that every honorable member on the other side is a party in himself. The Government have introduced a condition of pure anarchy. We shall now have an opportunity of seeing how it will work. We have not yet had anything like anarchy in Australia, and it will be interesting to see how it will operate in Parliament. According to the statement of the Prime Minister, it would appear that every one of his supporters is free to introduce any Bill he likes, and to vote as he pleases. This is the grand result of the operations which have been proceeding for the last six months with the object of re-establishing constitutional government, and forming a solid party. Fortunately, there is one solid party in this House, and it is to be found on this side of the chamber. I hope that honorable members like the honorable member for Moira, the honorable member for Dalley, the honorable and learned member for Illawarra, and the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, whom we do not class with the Conservatives, will come to the conclusion that they are not in proper company. They must already be feeling very uncomfortable. They should leave the ultra-Conservatives to themselves, and take their proper positions in the House. We are going to do our best to bring about the truest form of responsible government—in fact, we shall insist upon it. We have not accomplished very much this session, but the Watson Government succeeded in settling within three months a question with which the previous Government could not successfully deal in three years. We may as well devote the rest of the session to an endeavour to place members in their proper positions in the House. I would commend that object to the very serious consideration of honorable members opposite whom we still class as democrats. If present conditions are allowed to exist much longer the bad company in which they now find themselves may have an unfortunate effect upon them. There has been a great deal of misrepresentation and misunderstanding with regard to the pledge which labour representatives in this House are required to sign. I have here a copy of that document, and I may as well read it in order to show the Minister of Trade and Customs how the Argus sometimes misleads the people. That newspaper has made it appear that every question is dealt with by the caucus, whereas the only questions upon which we are pledged to our constituents are embraced within what is called the fighting platform. Many of the platforms that are adopted in the States differ materially from the fighting platform adopted for the purpose of the Federal election. The former embrace proposals, some of which are admittedly socialistic.

Mr. McDONALD.—Ours is a socialistic movement, anyhow.

Mr. SPENCE.—Yes; but what I wish to emphasize is that, in relation to the pledge signed by members of the Labour Party, we go to the country upon what is called a fighting platform. There were seven items in the last platform, and we were called upon to subscribe to those. Anything that may be done by outside bodies can have no effect upon representatives in this Parliament, who are pledged to their constituents upon the basis of the fighting platform. The pledge signed by members of the Labour Party refers only to the matters included in that platform. The fate of the Ministry is not included in that pledge. We can vote as we like upon matters affecting the fate of a Government, and we are very careful to act according to our constitutional powers. The pledge is as follows:—

I hereby pledge myself not to oppose any selected labour candidate. I also pledge myself, if returned to the Commonwealth Parliament, to do my utmost to ensure the carrying out of the principles embodied in the Federal labour platform, and on all such questions to vote as a majority of the Federal Labour Party may decide at a duly constituted caucus meeting comprised of members signing this or a similar pledge.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is pretty wide.

Mr. SPENCE.—The pledge is confined wholly and solely to the questions upon the printed platform, upon which we run our elections, and we are not affected by anything which Tom Mann may say or which may appear in a labour newspaper.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Will the honorable member say whether the fate of a Ministry would not be remitted to the caucus and decided there?

Mr. SPENCE.—It might or might not. Our meetings are held for the transaction of business, and we can discuss anything we like.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—What is wrong with that, anyhow?

Mr. SPENCE.—There is nothing wrong about the caucus, so long as the truth is told. In fact, our system is so good that other sections of the community have been urged to adopt similar methods. I have been astonished to hear some men praise our methods in one breath, and denounce our organizations in another. We adhere strictly to our policy and principles. We are not like the Prime Minister, who did everything he could, at the last elections, to smash up the protectionist party, and afterwards gave way. Our party fights on—it never stops fighting. It does not matter whether we have one representative, or twenty, in Parliament, we stand or fall by our policy. The Labour Party in the New South Wales Parliament has not a majority at present, but it has not given up its principles. It is because we have stood to our principles that we have gained ground. What is to be said in defence of parties like the protectionists and the free-traders who, under certain circumstances, do not carry on their fight. In cases where coalitions involve the giving up of principles, they must eventually result in the ruin of the parties concerned. The present Government will certainly go down before very long, and the reactionary forces behind them will fall to pieces, because public feeling will declare itself against them. The time has gone by for one-man rule, or class rule. As Harrison says, the day has come when the only class that is not a class is the working class. We are, in fact, all workers, and yet we are told that the Labour Party represents only a small section of the community. Many sneers have been directed against members of the Labour Party, but I would point out that those men who have received their practical training in connexion with trades organizations are called upon to exercise the highest abilities. They are required to work for others, and that in itself is calculated to widen their sympathies. The management of some of our organizations would tax the best abilities of some of those honorable members who apparently think little of our qualifications to take part in national affairs. Some of the most difficult problems of life have to be dealt with in the trades unions, questions involving the means of livelihood of thousands of men and women. The men who grapple with these subjects receive a training which fits them to deal with the larger questions of State in Parliament, and we can afford to ignore the taunts and jeers of honorable members who have not by any means shown themselves to be heaven-born statesmen. It has been persistently represented that one of the effects of labour legislation has been to drive capital out of the country. The honorable and learned member for Parkes, and other supporters of the Government, are never tired of making assertions of this kind. I now wish to present some facts which bear upon this question, and as I always prefer to select an opponent as an authority, I propose to quote certain figures given by the financial editor of the Sydney Daily Telegraph, who is a recognised authority, and who, when he does not happen to think of labour, which is a bugbear to him, may be relied upon. The financial statistics for the year 1903 show that only three of the Australian banks were not on the dividend list. For the first time since 1892 the London Bank of Australia paid a dividend at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The Australian life offices did increased business to the extent of £3,163,117. During the March quarter, the amounts held by the banks of New South Wales at current account increased by £950,000, and the coin and bullion by £675,000. There was a decrease in the advances of £850,000, which showed that the public did not require to draw upon the banks as much as formerly. The June quarter showed some slight change. A considerable amount of money was transferred from current account to fixed deposit. The reports of the annual and half-yearly meetings of the various companies are also instructive. Tooth and Co. Ltd. declared a dividend of 8 per cent., the total amount being £61,942 for the half-year. The North Coast Steam Navigation Company paid a dividend of 6 per cent. for the half-year. The Wellington Meat Export Co. paid a dividend of 8 per cent.; the Australian Gaslight Co., 9s. per share. The A.A. Co. showed a profit for the year of £61,022, and paid a dividend of 25s. per share. The Hetton Coal Co. paid a dividend of 6 per cent. for the half-year; and the Colonial Sugar Refining Co., about which we have heard a great deal, paid a dividend of 10 per cent. It is interesting to note that at the meeting of the last-named company the chairman could not resist having a fling at the Labour Party, and saying something about Socialism. He said that it was not proposed, in the present unsettled state of politics, to lay out any more money; but when he came to give details with regard to the working of the company, he said that they had sufficient machinery for all their requirements. It therefore appeared that there was no necessity to spend any more money. Messrs. Elder, Smith and Co., of Adelaide, declared a dividend and bonus amounting to 9 per cent. The Australian Joint Stock Companies' year-book for 1903 shows the amount of capital invested in New Zealand and the Commonwealth to be £585,000,000. This was a smaller amount than was invested two years ago by about £6,300,000. The reductions in mining investments amounted to £12,300,000, in bank shares to £4,000,000, and in debenture issues of trading and other companies to £4,900,000, making a total of £21,000,000. The writing down of the capital of the Midland Company of

New Zealand, and the dulness in the mining industry, accounted for a great proportion of the reduction. The live capital of the whole of the investors of Australia increased by £3,900,000. Mr. Nash points out that it is very satisfactory to find that the dividends exceeded £23,000,000, irrespective of the £1,750,000 distributed by the banks on their interest-bearing deposits. The dividends paid were £1,267,000 more than those for the previous year, although they were declared in respect of a smaller capital. Apart from State debts, there is a clear average of 5 per cent. These figures show how ruinous progressive legislation must be to capital! The figures relating to the transactions of the very class which make an outcry against democratic legislation are a sufficient answer to their allegations. They prove that, in spite of the abnormal drought from which we suffered in 1903, capitalists found in the Commonwealth the best investments in the world. Every one knows what a very low rate of interest is paid in other parts of the world, so that all the talk of industry being ruined by labour legislation—by such measures as a Conciliation and Arbitration Act—is without foundation. The position is much the same in regard to the outcry against the granting of preference to unionists. Mr. Justice Cohen has shown that there is no foundation for the statement made from time to time that the preference section in the Conciliation and Arbitration Act of New South Wales has worked injuriously; and he has pointed out that in some of the agreements voluntarily arrived at between employers and employes, provision is actually made for preference to unionists. I do not intend to stop at this point. Let me give the House the following figures, showing the land tax and income tax returns for New South Wales—

LAND TAX.			INCOME TAX.
£			£
1895-6	27,658
1896-7	141,022	...	305,316
1897-8	371,870	...	180,103
1898-9	272,028	...	182,220
1899-00	295,604	...	194,246
1900-01	202,188	...	222,453
1901-02	306,208	...	211,871
1902-03	320,654	...	224,306

If the people were not receiving dividends on their investments, and if land values were not increasing, there would be no such increase as is shown by these figures. Let me take another test, which is admittedly a very sound one, in determining the general prosperity of the community. I refer to the Savings Banks returns. I shall quote those relating to the Savings Banks of New South Wales, and I may add that a similar state of affairs is shown by the returns relating to the Savings Banks in other States. In 1893 there were 179,727 depositors in the Savings Banks of New South Wales, while the deposits amounted to £6,535,758, or an average of £36 7s. 4d. per depositor. In 1902—the latest year for which a return is available—the number of depositors had increased to 323,312, and the deposits to £12,425,464, or an average of £38 8s. 10d. per depositor. These figures do not show that those who lodge deposits with the Savings Banks are being ruined by labour legislation.

Mr. Spence.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Was not the limit to deposits increased between the periods named by the honorable member?

Mr. SPENCE.—That does not alter the facts.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It certainly does.

Mr. SPENCE.—I recognise that it is a factor which must be considered; but these figures show that the people of New South Wales have money to place on deposit. The figures which I have quoted have been taken by me either from Coghlan, or from articles written by Mr. Nash, of the Sydney Daily Telegraph, who is admittedly a sound financial authority.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The increase of the limit allowed persons of larger means to become depositors.

Mr. SPENCE.—That does not alter the fact that this large sum of money exists in the country, and that the people are not being ruined, as has been urged, by democratic legislation. The number of dividend-paying banks has gradually increased, until there are now only three in Australia that are not on the dividend list.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The fact that the limit as to the amount of deposit has been increased throws out the honorable member's average per head.

Mr. SPENCE.—That is so; but I simply wish to get at the facts. The Labour Party has been constantly misrepresented purely because of political considerations, and I may say that Australia as a whole has been subjected to the same treatment. If we wish to ascertain one of the main reasons why many persons are not induced to come to Australia, we have only to turn to the lying statements published by the great daily newspapers of Australia, as well as the false statements made by members of their staffs, who act as correspondents for the English press. It is our duty to put forward any facts which controvert the false statements to which I have referred. I have been carefully noting Mr. Nash's recent comments on finance and trade, but have no desire to quote the increase which has taken place in land settlement, or the immense increase in the shipping trade of New South Wales.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Or the big increase in the public debt, which has given us much of the capital to which the honorable member has referred.

Mr. SPENCE.—That increase is not, after all, so very great. In any case, it is included in the investments to which I have referred. Full details are to be found in the Investor's Year Book. On referring to the Sydney Morning Herald's review of the operations for the year 1903, I find that within a radius of fifteen miles of Sydney a total of £3,020,793 was expended on buildings. Let me give honorable members the items which make up that total. Private enterprise—which the present Government specially represents—accounted for a sum of £2,489,500; the Public Works Department spent £257,871; the Harbor Trust, £141,715; the Tramways Department, £60,646; the City Council, £42,482; the Public Schools Department, £27,759; and the Fire Brigades Board, £822. These figures are in themselves a sufficient indication of the extent to which private enterprise has been influenced by recent legislation, and show that the assertions which have been made from time to time against the Labour Party have no foundation. They certainly prove that remarkable progress has been made, within a fifteen miles radius of a long established city, during a time of exceptional drought, and notwithstanding the operation of a Conciliation and Arbitration Act. Fortunately, the people are beginning to realize that the statements made from time to time against the Labour Party are put forward only to serve political purposes, and that they are not true. I cannot refrain, however, from quoting an article which appeared, some little time ago, in the Sydney Daily Telegraph. In one of those rare lapses from its ordinary line of policy, during which the truth slips into its columns, it published, in July, 1903, the following comments on a cablegram stating that capital had been frightened out of France by the socialistic tendency of legislation in that country:—

Owing to the socialistic tendency of legislation in France, the cable excitedly informs us that "capital is leaving the country." Parbleu! As if we were likely to go into hysterics about it. We are not going to scare over the alleged migration of capital from any country. We have heard about it too often. Never in the memory of the oldest inhabitant has any rational legislative proposal been made in this State without capital girding up its fat loins and threatening to leave by the next boat. In England, in America, in France, everywhere, it is the same. Capital is perpetually on the wing. The mystery is where it goes to when it leaves the country. Should French capital go to England, if current stories are true, it will meet on the way English capital in a similarly terror-stricken state fleeing from enfranchised democracy, which is suspected of lurking round the political corner waiting for a chance to bludgeon it with some objectionable law. Should it make for America, or Australia, or Germany, or Russia, it will be met by the same kind of outrush, due to the same cause. Of course it might go to one of the South American republics, which capital never seems to leave, it being all used up in the form of ammunition for the different parties who abstain from obnoxious legislation to shoot each other with. Capital, therefore, keeps away from those places, but, as it is always represented as bolting incontinently from everywhere else, where it goes to is quite impossible to guess. An equally perplexing conundrum is what it lives on when it gets there.

This article neatly summarises the position in regard to the boggy, which is from time to time trotted out in Australia. I have not much more to say. I have urged that, in the interests of Australia, and having regard to the well-being of all classes, the present Government should not be allowed to remain in office. I have referred to the attitude taken up by it outside this chamber; but we have not yet heard members of the Government say in this chamber what they have said outside. No explanation has been made of the charges levelled against the Labour Party. Nothing has been said of the assertion that the Labour Party is a gigantic conspiracy against the welfare of the community. That was a very serious statement, coming, as it did, from the Prime Minister of United Australia, and as persons charged with conspiring against the common weal, we are entitled to have a fuller explanation than we have yet had from him. I have proved that the right honorable gentleman is associated with outside organizations which, as representing a class, are dangerous to the welfare of the community.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—That is where the real danger lies.

Mr. SPENCE.—Undoubtedly. I have shown that the Government are not in touch with the people, and that on these, among other grounds, we are justified in desiring to oust them from office. I might have commented more fully on the fact that we have in the Prime Minister a right honorable gentleman who has made so many political somersaults that one is inclined to inquire whether, like one of the characters of which the late Robert Louis Stevenson wrote in so interesting a manner, he has a dual personality. One feels tempted to ask whether “Dr. Jekyll” or “Mr. Hyde” is to rule. Then we ought also to have some clear intimation as to who is to be the mouthpiece of the Government, in regard to all communications to His Excellency the Governor-General. I remember the late Sir Henry Parkes referring on more than one occasion to the importance of having but one head to a Government—one who will be the mouthpiece of the Cabinet, and consequently of Parliament, in all representations to the Governor, and through him to the British Crown. We have here a Federation of all Australia. I could make a quotation showing that there was a certain sensitiveness on the part of the Minister of Trade and Customs as to what his colleague, in the leadership of the Government, should be saying or doing without his authority or consent. In the circumstances, we ought to know exactly what the members of the Government propose to do, and on what principles they are going. They have told us that every one of their number is to do as he likes on everything but the Trades Marks Bill.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—They are solid on the Trades Marks Bill.

Mr. SPENCE.—They hope to gratify their ambition by putting the Trades Marks Bill through with their imprint—to show that they were in office for, at any rate, a short time. We have, however, yet to learn that they are solid on the Trades Marks Bill. I am prepared to prophecy that they are not solid on anything but what I have emphasized throughout my address, and that is on being anti-labour. “Socialism” is only a bogey. There is no more in it than there is in the statement we often hear about driving out capital. What we have a right to be judged by is what we do, and what we propose to do in our platform, and not by what certain people choose to say we propose to do. We do not go to a man's enemy to get his character, or to find out his views. If we desire to know what his views are, we go to him direct, and it is unfair to the Labour Party, as a party, as it would be unfair to the Government, to ask our opponents what are our views. All that the members of the present Government have done so far has been to set up a bogey and then throw stones at it. The speeches which have been made by both heads of the Government, whether they are called half, or double Prime Ministers, have been devoted to an attack, not upon what the Labour Government had done, or proposed to do as a Government, but upon something founded upon misrepresentations which have been made outside Parliament, and, in some instances, in Parliament—something that has no existence, except in the imagination of some honorable gentlemen opposite, or of those outside who are attempting just now to prevent an accession to the numbers of the Labour Party in the event of a dissolution. They may as well attempt to stop the tide with a broom, as a celebrated character in fiction is supposed to have attempted to do, as to try to stem the tide of democracy in the Commonwealth. People are daily becoming more educated, and largely through the propaganda work of the Walpoles and Tom Manns, who are all doing some good.

Mr. McDONALD.—Tom Mann has been one of the best organizers we have ever had.

Mr. SPENCE.—That is so. We stand, however, on the economic basis, which I have quoted, and on that we shall score every time. Honorable members opposite are joined to the reactionary forces that are economically a hundred years behind the age—in the Imperialistic period, the period of the autocrat, of slavery, and of sweating. I by no means charge every honorable member opposite with being of these classes, but I speak of the organizations which are the mouthpieces of these classes. Between a Government representing a minority and people who believe in Imperialism, the difference is only one of degree, and not of principle. Government by a second Chamber, elected by a minority of the community, is Imperialistic and autocratic. It is only a question of degree. We in this Parliament have laid down a broad franchise for both Chambers, and it is wrong that any Government favouring class representation should be in power in this Parliament for a day. Those who vote against labour men, honestly believing that they represent a class, do right; but we say that, since the Labour Party took an active part in politics, we have denounced class legislation, and we came into existence mainly because of class legislation, and for the purpose of abolishing it. We give intelligent and close study to these questions, and we are not likely to fall into the error of setting up something which we became organized to knock down. I may have spoken somewhat warmly, but honorable members will know that I have spoken politically, and that, personally, I have a great respect for all honorable members, and for all honest differences of opinion. I have felt that we have reached a time when serious developments external to this Chamber, and influencing the policy of Parliament within, are moving with great rapidity. I feel that the Labour Party are in duty bound now to make the departure which we are making, and that we should no longer say to the present Government, as we have said to past Governments—"If you put proper legislation through, it will be all right, and we shall not care by what name you are labelled." We contend that the present is an altogether exceptional case. The manner by which the present Government secured office, as well as the work they are doing, the people with whom they are associated, and their whole surroundings, must be taken into consideration. In our opinion, it must be detrimental to the best interests of the Commonwealth to allow them to retain office for one day longer than we can help, and chiefly because they propose to set up class rule and class domination, and to bring us back to past ideals from which we hoped we had for ever escaped.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—According to all laws of compensation, after the very able and exhaustive speech delivered by the honorable member for Darling, covering, I suppose, nearly all the ground that could possibly be covered at the present juncture, it ought to be my duty to limit my remarks as much as possible. I shall not venture to traverse the very extensive field the honorable member has so ably covered. I shall endeavour to confine my observations to matters not less far-reaching perhaps in their eventual results, but perhaps a little closer to our present circumstances. I feel that we are standing at a point of momentous importance to the whole continent of Australia. Not so very long ago there was one man who, not out of any love for the Empire, and not out of any good-will towards its future, was yet, with a great amount of justice, said to be the man who did more to create and promote a manifestation of the sense of unity within it than any other man—I refer to the late President Kruger. In the same way, I think, the democracy of Australia can look in a certain sense with gratitude to the Prime Minister as being the man who has been indirectly at all events, the means of initiating a movement which I trust will eventually consolidate all the progressive forces of the Commonwealth. That right honorable gentleman told us yesterday that he claimed to have attained office legitimately. I venture to dispute that. I venture to repeat what I said not so long ago, when the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella was before the Chamber, that there was no moral justification whatever for the way in which the late Government was turned out. I say, too, that the gloss that was put upon that transaction last evening by the Prime Minister is not justified by the circumstances as they actually occurred in this House. We know perfectly well that the Watson Government assumed office, not by its own desire, and not of its own choice. We know well that the Labour Party, led by the honorable member for Bland, gave most effective assistance to the Government I had the honour to support, and which was led by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. I say that, throughout the whole course of this Commonwealth Parliament, the Liberals of this House and of this country must have observed with gratitude the great assistance that the Labour Party gave to us time after time, when we sat on the other side, and when we faced the Opposition that now comprises most of the Ministerialists in their antagonism, partly avowed and partly concealed, to the liberal measures we brought forward.

Mr. McCAY.—Honorable members have got their quid pro quo now.

Mr. McCOLL.—They lost us our duties.

Mr. PAGE.—Only on glue pots.

Mr. ISAACS.—From the laughter with which it has been received, I should say that that joke appears likely to stick. But on the merits of the observation, I do not agree with the honorable member for Echuca. I feel sure that my memory serves me aright when I say that without the assistance of the Labour Party, we should never have been able to make the Tariff as protective as it is. I therefore say that on that question of the Tariff, as well as on other matters, we have a right to acknowledge with gratitude the assistance which the Labour Party gave to the Liberal Party in this House. I desire to say that shortly, because it leads to what I was saying before, that the amendment moved, not by the leader of the Labour Party, but by the honorable member for Wide Bay, and moved by that honorable gentleman so as to signify to the then Government that it was not a hostile motion by the Labour Party, was moved and carried—and I voted against it—merely because there was a conscientious belief in it, and not because the Labour Party wished to displace the Deakin Government.

Mr. FISHER.—We stated so at the time.

Mr. ISAACS.—The Government of the day, of course, had a perfect right to take the action they did take. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat, who was then leader of the Government, announced previously that he would retire if the amendment proposed by the honorable member for Wide Bay were carried, and the honorable and learned gentleman honorably kept his promise. I did not agree with him about the making of that promise, but, of course, we know that he always keeps his word, and he kept it honorably on that occasion. The honorable member for Bland was sent for. He assumed office gallantly and well, and he and his Government ought to have been judged by their policy and their work. But they were not. The present Prime Minister has asked that he shall be judged by his policy and his work. By his policy, such as it is, he may be easily judged, and I intend to devote a few words to it a little later on. The Labour Government was not fairly treated. They did not receive the fair opportunity which they were promised. They were not faced with a direct motion of want of confidence. They were not defeated upon a motion upon which they were openly challenged, and upon which they and their defenders could place before the country their merits. They succumbed to a side thrust.

Mr. LONSDALE.—They chose their own battle-ground.

Mr. ISAACS.—A motion was moved which has been said to have been a challenge upon the battle-field selected by the Government, but it was not. I was not here to-day when the leader of the Opposition made his speech, but I understand that he has denied that assertion, and I venture to support what he said. The test of the matter is this: If he had never staked the official existence of his Government upon a particular question, the effect would have been the same. It is of no use to tell us, in the endeavour to throw dust in the eyes of the country, though that cannot be done successfully, that the late Government was defeated upon a battle-ground selected by the gentleman at the head of it. What he said was unmistakable: "I will ask that this question be reconsidered by the House." meaning, of course, that it should be dealt with in Committee on its merits. He did not for a moment anticipate, and we none of us anticipated, that a gross insult would be hurled at his Government, under which no Administration could maintain office. The late Government was defeated, not upon a field of battle selected by its Prime Minister, but upon a field of battle selected by those who acted irrespective of the Government and of the merits of the question at issue, and were moved only by the determination to turn out of office men whom they thought were usurpers of the Treasury benches, and almost interlopers in this House.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not think it troubled the honorable and learned member much.

Mr. ISAACS.—The Postmaster-General feels the prickings of conscience, and cannot keep quiet. His uneasiness shows the justice of what I am saying—that the Government was defeated because of the stern determination to eject at all hazards and at any cost what some honorable members contemptuously termed the Labour Government. That is unmistakably the whole truth of the matter. It has not been proved that the present Government came into office in a legitimate fashion. I say more than that. When the right honorable gentleman for East Sydney asserted that his Government came into office in ordinary legitimate fashion, he immediately proceeded to recognise the weakness of his position. He had not then disclosed how weak the internal position of the Government was, but he recognised that the House is evenly divided, and he threatened it with a dissolution.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—He did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. ISAACS.—That was a very bad way to begin. Those on this side of the chamber do not fear a dissolution. The present leader of the Opposition asked for one, and we should have been only too pleased to allow the country to speak on the subject.

Mr. ROBINSON.—We know better than that.

Mr. ISAACS.—I venture to say that it was a source of intense relief to many of my honorable friends opposite when the Governor-General refused to grant a dissolution. Not only was the observation of the Prime Minister a weak one, but it may turn out to be a very fallacious one.

Mr. JOHNSON.—What about the telegram which was produced in the train?

Mr. ISAACS.—I understand that my honorable friend was very glad that that telegram was not true. It was a great relief to him.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—So it was to the Labour members.

Mr. LONSDALE.—And to the Liberal Protectionists.

Mr. ISAACS.—I do not wish to interrupt the speeches of other honorable members; but at the same time I should like to continue my own. Not only was the observation of the right honorable member for East Sydney a weak one, but it may prove to be a fallacious one, because I believe that before many days have passed it will be found that not only are there but two parties in the House, but that one of them has become much larger than it now is. I believe that before very long some of those with whom I have been proud to be associated will see that their proper place is on this side of the chamber, and will not longer remain away from those with whom they have worked for years. I have no word to say against them, but I believe they must feel, as was said by the honorable member who preceded me, that they are now in bad company, and are associated with a party against whom they have fought well and valiantly ever since the Federal Parliament came into existence. They must see that they cannot remain where they are without going back on their principles. I do not blame the Prime Minister for what he did. It was perfectly legitimate to him and for some of his colleagues, to attempt to gain office. From the moment that they first entered this Chamber, they have displayed in the most open and candid manner their intention to displace any Government exhibiting any tendency to liberal principles, and they have twice succeeded in doing so. I very much regret that they have been assisted by some of my friends.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is not a correct statement of the facts.

Mr. ISAACS.—It is a perfectly correct statement, and will be indorsed by the vast majority of the electors.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Time will tell.

Mr. ISAACS.—If any proof is needed, we know the course which they adopted during the Tariff discussions, the attitude they assumed in regard to the lascars, and, lately, in spite of the extraordinary and almost impossible explanation of the Minister of Trade and Customs, in regard to the Chinamen.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That is not worthy of the honorable and learned member.

Mr. McLEAN.—Does the honorable and learned member doubt the explanation given to-day?

Mr. ISAACS.—No; I do not doubt it.

Mr. McCOLL.—He did not hear it.

Mr. ISAACS.—I understand that the explanation was that nothing will be done without the approval of, and consultation with, the Queensland Government. Am I right in stating that that was the explanation?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Certainly not.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable and learned member is entirely wrong.

Mr. ISAACS.—I have stated what I understood to be the explanation, and I say that it was improbable and almost impossible.

Mr. McLEAN.—Does not the honorable and learned member know that the Commonwealth Government has nothing whatever to do with the movements of Chinese from one State to another?

Mr. ISAACS.—I know that my honorable friend, who is a distinguished member of the present Government, made a very strong statement about the matter.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—This is small.

Mr. ISAACS.—I am anxious not to do an injustice to my honorable friend; but I asked an honorable member what the explanation was, and I was informed that it was that nothing would be done without consultation with, and the consent of, the Queensland Government.

Mr. McLEAN.—Whoever told the honorable and learned member that was playing with him.

Mr. ISAACS.—My observation was made on the basis of that statement being correct. But while I do not blame the right honorable member for East Sydney for his objects, I blame him for his methods. The mode by which he obtained office, as honorable members know well, is a matter of exultation to all the Tories in Australia. That in itself should be a sufficient indication to those of my liberal friends who are unfortunate enough to be sitting on the other side of the Chamber, of the need for mistrusting the right honorable gentleman. The explanation which he has given we do not and cannot believe to be the true one. We were told that this is to be a Government of equality, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Customs being equal; but we do not and cannot understand it. If the fiscal question is dead and buried, what is the necessity for a double-headed Government?

Mr. KELLY.—Or a double-headed Opposition.

Mr. ISAACS.—There are more than two or three in the Opposition. If the fiscal question is dead and buried, why this selection of free-traders and protectionists as such, with an alleged equality? Why are the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Customs acting like the two Dromios?

Mr. FRAZER.—And why has a sop been thrown to the people of Australia by giving a protectionist the portfolio of Trade and Customs?

Mr. ISAACS.—When we come to deal with this farce of a fiscal truce, we wish for an explanation of this supposed equality between two Ministers, an equality which we have evidence does not exist. Like the two Dromios, in the Comedy of Errors, they say—

We came into this world like brother and brother.

And now let's go hand in hand, not one before another.

And yet the first official act of one of these brothers was to issue a manifesto that the other brother said he knew nothing about. The least we could have had was a counter manifesto from the Minister of Trade and Customs. Why did we not have that?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Why did we not have three manifestoes from the three leaders opposite?

Mr. ISAACS.—We have had one manifesto, which I think will suffice for the people of Australia. If the leaders of the Government are equal in all things, are they equal in their opinions? They are equal in one respect. My honorable friend, the Minister of Trade and Customs, referred to night to the subject of land taxation. Let me remind him that his leader—no, his equal—the Prime Minister, introduced a land tax into the New South Wales Parliament, and that he, whilst a member of the Government, to which I had the honour to belong, and which was led by the present Treasurer, made a very powerful and eloquent speech in favour of a land tax.

Mr. McLEAN.—A land tax may be justified for legitimate revenue purposes.

Mr. ISAACS.—Of course; undoubtedly.

Mr. McLEAN.—But not for confiscation.

Mr. ISAACS.—Certainly not. Orthodoxy is our doxy, heterodoxy is some one else's. Undoubtedly. When I heard my honorable friend reproach the Labour Party with wanting to impose a land tax, it struck me as remarkable that he should be associated with a free-trade league, one of whose planks is to impose a single tax upon the people of this country—upon the land-owners of this country. My surprise was the greater when I remembered also that my honorable friend almost electrified the Victorian Assembly in this very chamber by his eloquent support of the land tax—

Mr. McCOLL.—The honorable and learned member's Government introduced a land tax into the Victorian Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS.—I have just said so; and I think my honorable friend supported it. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Customs are, therefore, equals in so far as land taxation is concerned. Are they equals in Socialism also? I am not going to accuse my honorable friend, the Minister of Customs, of that. I propose to read the words of the Prime Minister with regard to Socialism. I quote from the Argus of a few days ago, 31st August, containing a report of a speech of the right honorable gentleman, addressed to farmers in the Assembly Hall in Collins-street. That was a typical "Yes-No" speech. But if he says he is opposed to Socialism I must refer him to this speech. This is what he said—

My belief contains two ideals. I believe that it is a true ideal of politics to use national power in every conceivable way to advance the happiness and wealth of the community.

What Socialist ever said more? That is ideal No. 1. Now I come to ideal No. 2, which is divided into two parts—Yes and No.

But I have another, and that is to leave individual energies and powers of the community—He did not say the word "free."

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is what he meant, though.

Mr. ISAACS.—I shall read what he said—

To leave individual energies and powers of the community as free as you can consistent with proper national legislation.

I should like to ask if any member in this House has ever said anything worse, or anything better than that?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then why are the Tories jubilating, as the honorable and learned member said just now?

Mr. ISAACS.—I did not say they were jubilating over that. They may be jubilating over the "Yes" part of it, but not over the "No" part of it. We were told by my honorable friend that the desire for national legislation marked the Labour Party, and I want to ask what on earth the Prime Minister meant when he addressed the farmers of the country in those terms. Having achieved his object by turning out the Government, the Prime Minister in his anxiety to go on with the business, after having wasted the time of the country, asked for three weeks' respite, which was granted, in order to enable him to frame a policy. And what a statesman-like pronouncement we had yesterday. Surely, we expected something better. I venture to say that there was not a gleam of originality in it, and not a gleam of hope for this great continent.

Mr. HUGHES.—Except for a recess.

Mr. ISAACS.—Of course, we knew perfectly well beforehand that protection was sacrificed.

Mr. MCCOLL.—The honorable and learned member has done that.

Mr. ISAACS.—We have done that? We have heard of the fable of the wolf and the lamb, and on the Government side of the chamber we see the exemplification of it. We know perfectly well that the one great principle for which the honorable member for Echuca has stood up in this House and outside of it has been surrendered by him. We know perfectly well that the great principle which held the Liberal-Protectionist Party together was surrendered—to whom? To a defeated foe, to a leader, able, eloquent, and strategic—a man for whose power of overcoming difficult situations we must all have the greatest admiration. We all know perfectly well that he has acknowledged himself in this House to have been beaten on the fiscal question. Where was the necessity to enter into a truce with a beaten foe?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable and learned gentleman went to the country on the truce.

Mr. ISAACS.—And we came back triumphant.

Mr. MCLEAN.—And then the honorable and learned member abandoned the question upon which he went to the country.

Mr. ISAACS.—I shall show my honorable friend who abandoned the question.

Mr. MCLEAN.—Those who went to the country, and advocated fiscal peace, and came back and advocated fiscal strife.

Mr. ISAACS.—I should like to know in what way I ever pledged myself to fiscal peace or fiscal strife. I am perfectly willing, although I am in no way pledged on the subject, to stand by my honorable friends of the protectionist party, and say that there was a proposal of fiscal peace. But I want to know what is the meaning of fiscal peace. I shall tell honorable members what that fiscal peace meant. It meant this, that the contest in Australia between the policy of free-trade on the one side, and the policy of protection on the other, was decided. There was to be no more struggling as to which policy was to be triumphant. We had erected the standard of protection, and that flag was to fly all over Australia. When the Prime Minister, in Sydney, taunted the protectionists of Australia, and said that they had that "tired feeling," and that they dared not raise the protectionist flag before the people of Australia, we dared to do so, and the people supported us. They declared that there should be a pause in the great struggle between the protectionists and the free-traders, and that the protectionist flag should still continue to wave. But they never said that in this declaration of peace between two warring camps any details of protection should remain unattended to. They never said that in this protectionist domain if wrong were done in any case it should not be righted.

Mr. MCLEAN.—The honorable and learned member should turn to the galleries, and not to the House, with that story.

Mr. ISAACS.—The Minister feels the pinch. He sees how thin is the covering over himself in this regard, and feels that this is cutting very close to him. I venture to say that in his calm moments he will admit that no one on the whole of this continent dreamt that any protectionist was sent here with a mandate to allow industries to bleed to death, machinery to remain idle and rust, and people to starve. There was no such mandate as that, and I am going to prove it out of the mouths of the Prime Minister and our esteemed friend—for he is esteemed wherever he may sit—the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. I propose to prove out of their joint mouths that there was no mandate such as we have heard of.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable and learned member's name appears in the list, published in the Age, of supporters of fiscal peace.

Mr. ISAACS.—In the sense I have mentioned, I agree to that. We were told by the Prime Minister and the Postmaster-General—who, no doubt, helped to frame that famous suggested convention between the Prime Minister and the honorable and learned member for Ballarat—that there was a mandate from the country that the protectionists were to ground their arms, and I shall prove from their own words that there was nothing of the kind. I shall read the terms of the proposed alliance between the protectionist and free-trade parties. They will be found in the journals of May 19th. One of the terms was a proposal for two years' fiscal truce. If the constituencies of Australia had ordered a fiscal truce, how could the two parties suggest an agreement for such a truce? How could the members of this House come forward and say, "True it is that the constituencies have commanded peace, but we shall deliberate whether or not there shall be peace." Now what was the proposal? It was—

The Tariff not to be altered in any respect during the present Parliament without the consent of both parties in the Ministry.

Mr. McLEAN.—What was the verdict in our room when this was announced?

Mr. ISAACS.—I shall answer that.

Mr. McLEAN.—The verdict was that the country had already decided the question.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! The Minister of Trade and Customs has already spoken. If he has been misrepresented he will have an opportunity to explain later on. I must ask him to refrain from interrupting the speaker in possession of the Chair.

Mr. ISAACS.—I shall answer the Minister's question. The verdict was that the protectionists had nothing to gain by such an agreement—that we had won the day.

Mr. McCAY.—Oh, no!

Mr. ISAACS. — I say unhesitatingly, that it was pointed out that we should gain nothing by it, but that the free-traders would.

Mr. McCAY.—Because the country had already decided that the Tariff should not be touched for three years. Every member at that party meeting said so.

Mr. ISAACS.—We said, undoubtedly, that we had nothing to gain, and that a beaten party was proposing terms. We refused to accept them.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Some members said that, but not every one.

Mr. ISAACS.—The decision was that the protectionist party should stand together in its full integrity, that it should not ally itself with one side or the other. That was the decision that was arrived at unanimously, and which ought never to have been departed from. I have no doubt that the Minister of Trade and Customs has stated what was in his mind. I am only mentioning what was in mine. At a meeting such as that various views are expressed, and one can only give his own impression as to what took place. But I have here something in writing. It shows the views of the two leaders.

Mr. FISHER.—Was it drawn up subsequently?

Mr. ISAACS.—No, it was made at the time of the proposed compact. It is remarkable that the words "fiscal truce" appear in this as well as in the present programme. Before I part from this question, I should like to refer to one matter that was provided for in the proposed programme, but which is not mentioned in the programme of this Liberal Government. I refer to the paragraph stating that—

It is highly desirable that a uniform system of old-age pensions throughout Australia should be adopted as soon as possible, and that steps should be taken to accomplish this in co-operation with the States.

It is remarkable that that very important question, which formed a prominent part of the proposed alliance, has been suddenly dropped.

Mr. KELLY.—It was not even touched during the régime of the Labour Government.

Mr. ISAACS.—I should like to ask a question in regard to a matter on which the country is entitled to have a declaration from the Government, although up to the present time we have not had one. If there is to be a fiscal truce between the protectionists and the free-traders, how long is it to last? Is it to last during the life of the present Parliament, or over the next Parliament? Is it to last for ever, or is it to last until the Ministry has been beaten? Are we then to find the two equal sections of the Cabinet flying, like tigers, at each other's throats? Does this "fiscal truce" mean a truce to bury protection?

Mr. McCOLL.—How long is the Liberal-Labour alliance to last?

Mr. ISAACS.—There appears on the face of our agreement a statement as to how long it is to last. There has been no concealment on our part. We have placed the whole matter fairly before the country. We wish to meet the Government openly. We ask the same frankness from the other side. The question I have put has been asked before, but we can obtain no answer. Language apparently is made to conceal thoughts; but we wish to know from the Government, and especially from my protectionist friends, for how long they have consented to stifle protection.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable and learned member assumes that he will be in the next Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS.—I should be sorry to assume that the honorable member will be a member of it. I repeat that the protectionists of Australia have a right to know from the protectionist members of the Government how long they have consented to bind themselves hand and foot, and to attempt to bind the people whom they represent, to the crushing down of protection. The free-trade baby was dead; the protectionist baby was alive. There was no reason, therefore, why they should combine their forces. How long are they going to "farm" the protectionist baby?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member is making a babyish speech.

Mr. ISAACS.—Then I have reached the level of the honorable member. Before proceeding to consider the two items, and the only two, apart from colourless matters, that the Government have deigned to put before the country, I wish to emphasize the fact that there is no mistaking the society in which the protectionist members of the Government find themselves. There is no mistaking the desire and the designs of the leader of the Government and of his free-trade friends. We know that Australia has a great future; we know that its resources are great. Every one dreams of Australia becoming a great country, and developing not merely as a sheep-walk or as the abode of herds and flocks, and not merely in the matter of primary production, although we all should do our utmost to promote that end. While we desire that it shall develop in this way, we wish at the same time to see a diversification of employment in Australia. It ought to be one of the highest aims of this Parliament, and of those who lead it, to make Australia an industrial country, and, if possible, an industrial centre of the world. We must have great manufactures here. We have all the materials to support them. We have been endowed with the fullest natural possessions necessary to build up these manufactures, and we have a right to look forward to a time when we shall be a great manufacturing community with a large output and a prosperous exchange between our primary and secondary producers. There is an outlook, according to the leader of the Government; there is a panacea for the great manufactures of Australia. What is the remedy? Let me read the right honorable gentleman's own words. In dealing with the matter, he himself asked a question. He said—

What is the hope of the great manufactures of Australia? How are we to manufacture cheaply, or to compete with the cheap labour of other countries?

He then proceeded to point out that we could not have a monopoly of mechanical appliances; that we could not have better machinery than the British or German manufacturers have. He pointed out, too, that the manufacturers of Germany and England could buy raw material all over the world, and then he added this strange commentary on free-trade England, although he linked Germany with it—

How are we going to compete with these underpaid sweated countries until our own labour is underpaid and sweated too?

That was his answer to the great question of how and when Australia is to be raised to the position of a great manufacturing country, and the means by which we can attain that eminence. This is the panacea which he offers, and I commend it to my honorable friends opposite—

In the plenitude of time, when our millions become tens of millions, we shall have a crop of misery which will solve the difficulty in regard to cheap manufactures.

In other words, when our men and women are reduced to starvation point, with no Tariff, no labour laws, no Conciliation and Arbitration Acts, nothing which will conserve the interests of the worker—when we have a poverty-stricken race madly competing with each other to obtain a crust of bread—then, and then only, shall we solve the problem. We shall then have that “crop of misery” which will make Australia a great manufacturing country. That is the policy to which my honorable protectionist friends opposite have become linked, and from which, I trust, they will detach themselves.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member dare not read the context of the speech to which he has just referred.

Mr. ISAACS.—What is the context?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Let the honorable and learned member read it.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member makes what he considers a very wise assertion, but I ask him whether he knows what the context is.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I know that it is something which the honorable and learned member dare not read.

Mr. ISAACS.—It is a long tirade against protection; and the remedy which I have mentioned is the only one the speaker could put forward as being consistent with free-trade.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Will the honorable and learned member inform us what was the speech from which he has quoted?

Mr. ISAACS.—With pleasure. It is to be found in Vol. V. of Hansard, Session 1901-2, page 6800. What is the great policy of this great Government? They have told us that they are not going to bring in a Manufactures Encouragement Bill. The time has not arrived for the crop of misery that is to start Australian manufactures. The Government are not going to support preferential trade, or they are—I do not know what is the position they take up.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—They do not know themselves.

Mr. ISAACS.—Are they going to support a policy of preferential trade? If so, I presume they will provide for it on a free-trade basis.

Mr. WATSON.—No; the Prime Minister stated yesterday that it would be on the basis proposed by the Deakin Government.

Mr. ISAACS.—Then it will be on a protectionist basis, or is one half of the Cabinet to have it on a free-trade basis, and the other half on a protectionist foundation?

Mr. THOMAS.—They are to have it turn about; six months each.

Mr. ISAACS.—Are the two sections to be equal in all things? If the Prime Minister's statement be correct, that the Government are going to provide for preferential trade on the basis proposed by the Deakin Government, it will be brought about by means of an increase of duties. If it is to be established on a free-trade basis, I wonder how my honorable friends—and especially the Minister of Trade and Customs—will be able to support it. I do not believe that the Minister of Trade and Customs will do so. I honestly think that he will revolt against it. But this is not a Government measure. The Prime Minister stated yesterday, in effect, that the Government is going to take up preferential trade—that is “yes”—provided the British Government asks for it—that is midway—“but” he added, “we know the British Government never will”—that means “no.” When I heard that statement I began to wonder what was the position of the Government.

Mr. McLEAN.—We should have had this speech from the honorable and learned member when he was supporting the late Government. What was their attitude in regard to preferential trade?

Mr. ISAACS.—We never reached their attitude on that subject.

Mr. ROBINSON.—We waited four months to reach it.

Mr. ISAACS.—But whatever Government were in office—

Mr. McLEAN.—The late Government were in office longer than we have been.

Mr. ISAACS.—If the question had arisen on a declaration of policy on the part of that Government I should have said the same if they had made the same statement as the present Administration have done. I believe that whatever the late Ministry might have said on the subject, it would have said it plainly. Then, again, the Government have said nothing about the great question of old-age pensions.

Mr. McLEAN.—Has the honorable and learned member obtained a promise from the Labour Party on the question of preferential trade? He has sold himself to that party, and I wish to know whether he has obtained a pledge from them in regard to that question.

Mr. ISAACS.—I presume that my honorable friend reads the newspapers. He can read for himself in to-day's newspapers what we have done on this question.

Mr. McLEAN.—I have not read the statement to which the honorable and learned member refers.

Mr. McCOLL.—There is nothing in it.

Mr. ISAACS.—Let me deal with the other items in the Government programme.

Mr. McLEAN.—All I have seen in the newspapers is a statement which shows that the honorable and learned member has been absorbed by the Labour Party.

Mr. PAGE.—What about the Minister himself?

Mr. ISAACS.—I am afraid that I prove a very indigestible morsel.

Mr. McLEAN.—I would not barter my principles for the sake of not being opposed at the coming elections.

Mr. ISAACS.—Would the Minister do so for the sake of office? The Government have three colourless proposals in their programme—and I speak of them as being colourless, because they are of a non-party character—a Bill to amend the Electoral Act, the two measures relating to Trades Marks, and the Papua Bill. They are common to all of us, and no difficulty is associated with them. But the Government have also come out with two magnificent items—the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, and a measure providing for the Transcontinental Railway survey. There are members of the present Government who were members of the Deakin Administration, which resigned rather than have anything to do with a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill that contained a clause extending its operations to States servants. Yet we now find them supporting that Bill, and taking all the responsibilities of the Government.

Mr. GROOM.—The present Prime Minister said that they were quite right in the attitude which they previously took up.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is so. Three members of the present Government have stultified themselves in regard to that measure. Although the Government say that they are going on with the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, they do not condescend to tell the House which of the proposed amendments they are going to accept, and which of them they intend to reject.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The quotation which the honorable and learned member made a few minutes ago from a speech delivered by the Prime Minister is an outrageous one. I say that with the full report of the speech before me.

Mr. ISAACS.—Then, my honorable friend is capable of saying anything.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do say it, emphatically.

Mr. ISAACS.—I say that it is a fair and honest quotation. It has been quoted by me before in public in the Melbourne Town Hall, and never contradicted.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I say that it is an unfair and a dishonest quotation.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It is torn from its context.

Mr. ISAACS.—There is nothing in the context which qualifies it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The man who would make that quotation, would say anything.

Mr. ISAACS.—I might read the words again, but I shall be satisfied if the honorable member for Parramatta will now read any words which he claims will show that I have not quoted the right honorable gentleman fairly. I challenge him to do it now, while I am here.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It will be read later on.

Mr. ISAACS.—Then the honorable member refuses to do it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member cannot do such a thing as the honorable member for Indi has suggested.

Mr. ISAACS.—The honorable member was not aware of that, because he refused my challenge before you rose, Mr. Speaker. Now, with respect to the Transcontinental Railway. That is a project which the Minister for Trade and Customs has designated as the "desert railway." How did the honorable gentleman come to give his assent to that?

Mr. McLEAN.—To what?

Mr. ISAACS.—To the survey of the Transcontinental Railway?

Mr. McLEAN.—Is the honorable and learned member opposed to ascertaining the facts?

Mr. PAGE.—They soon made a yes-no politician of the honorable member for Gippsland.

Mr. ISAACS.—We have been trying to ascertain the facts for some considerable time. We have ascertained this fact, that the honorable member for Gippsland, who when sitting on this side strongly opposed the proposal, is now, as a member of the Government, as strongly supporting it; and having equal power with the Prime Minister, the honorable gentleman ought certainly to have vetoed it.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member for Moira stonewalled even the proposal to make the survey.

Mr. ISAACS.—I think that before very long there may be an opportunity to again address ourselves to this question. I have no doubt that the alliance which we all know has been happily consummated between two great bodies in this Parliament will have an effect, and a beneficial effect, on the future of Australia. We have set up a standard under which I believe all the progressive forces of this continent may find a rallying point. I do not despair of some of my honorable friends opposite before very long agreeing with us to this extent. We have said as plainly as language can say it, that the door is open.

Mr. McCAY.—Yes, honorable members opposite have said that plainly enough.

Mr. ISAACS.—If they agree to a platform, as to which they can find no reasonable objection; if they can agree to leave a coalition which is not a coalition; if they at any time find that it is to the best interests of this community that they should return to the pledges and principles which they came into this House to profess and support, I believe it will be well for this country—I do not bring their personal position into the matter. I invite, and we all invite them, to support in the future the principles which they have supported in the past. But whatever they may do, it is our bounden duty to continue to adhere to the principles we were returned to support. As protectionists, we were returned to support protection, and we do not intend to desert that principle. We have resolved that, although no action can possibly be taken this session, such action shall be taken next session, and I say that we desire, and we intend, by all legitimate means, to enforce our desire to have an inquiry into such operations of the Tariff as we see are not merely in danger of doing, but are actually doing, damage to the industries of Australia.

Mr. McCOLL.—That inquiry has already been suggested. It was suggested last week.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Honorable members opposite will now claim that as their policy.

Mr. ISAACS.—Suggested with a view to action?

Mr. McCOLL.—Yes.

Mr. ISAACS.—Then what has become of the fiscal truce?

Mr. McCOLL.—The inquiry will not disturb that.

Mr. ISAACS.—Either this fiscal truce is a farce, or it is not. If there is a fiscal truce, all we have heard is simply humbug; if there is not a fiscal truce, what are honorable members opposite going to do? What we say is that, whether it is true or not, we intend to see that the verdict of the country is adhered to.

Mr. McCOLL.—Who are "we"?

Mr. ISAACS.—The Liberal Labour Party, and the people behind them. That is who "we" are. I say that we intend to see that no evasion of duty on the part of the Government, and no simulation of a fiscal truce, will avail them to disregard the duty they owe to Australia. I say this also, that I trust that before very long there will be such steps taken as will evince to the people of this country that we cannot longer tolerate upon the Treasury benches such a politically sexless combination as we find there to-day.

Debate (on motion by Mr. ROBINSON) adjourned.

House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

Senate.

Friday, 9 September, 1904.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m., and read prayers.

TRANS-AUSTRALIAN RAILWAY.

Senator PEARCE.—I desire to ask the Attorney-General, without notice, the following question:—

Will the Government procure from the Government of Western Australia copies of a report by the engineer in charge of the party sent out to bore for water on the proposed route of the Trans-Australian Railway, with a view to distributing them among the members of the Commonwealth Parliament, and for their information?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I think I can promise that we shall communicate with the Government of Western Australia, and that any information which can be obtained in respect of this matter will be communicated to the members of both Houses.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

Debate resumed from 8th September (vide page 4401), on motion by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON—

That the despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with regard to the adoption of the metric system of weights and measures, within the Empire, be printed.

Senator MATHESON (Western Australia).—I am reluctant to take up the time of the Senate on a Friday in discussing the features of the Government policy, but it is impossible to allow one or two matters to pass without comment, and I hope that I shall be able to deal with them fairly briefly. The utterances of the Government in regard to the transcontinental railway have really astonished me. I gather that it is their intention to pass a Bill for a survey of the line. If it were being introduced with a view to incurring further expenditure on the construction of the line, after the survey had been completed, I could perfectly understand the position of the Government, because in the past we have been led to understand that the Prime Minister was heartily in accord with its construction. My authority for the statement is Sir John Forrest, who, when he was a member of the Deakin Government, had occasion to attend a meeting of the Protectionist Society, held somewhere in this city. At that meeting he complained bitterly that his own Government were only prepared to say that they would see about the construction of the railway, and he said "Mr. George Reid will build the line." I quote from the newspaper reports of that meeting, and from an electoral "dodger" which was freely circulated in Western Australia at the time of the recent election. I do not understand that the statements made in the circular were ever contradicted. The people of that State were asked in the circular to vote for those who would support Mr. George Reid's policy. They were shown clearly that it was their only chance of getting this railway, because the Deakin Government were not prepared to support its construction.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Whose dodger is that?

Senator MATHESON.—Well, I prepared the dodger, and from the best material available—the speech of Sir John Forrest.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator did not mention the authorship of the dodger.

Senator MATHESON.—I had no intention of mentioning the authorship of the dodger, as I am not bringing it forward as an advertisement. We always understood that we had only to look for Mr. Reid's advent to power to make a certainty of the construction of this line. But what do we find? We find that he advocates a survey, in order that he may discover whether the project is practicable or not. Nobody can know better than Mr. George Reid, and the members of his Government, that it is perfectly practicable. A flying survey has already been made.

Senator FRASER.—That does not give much evidence.

Senator MATHESON.—It gives every necessary evidence of the possibility of constructing the line.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is of very little value.

Senator MATHESON.—It is very likely that the Attorney-General has not read the report.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I have, for in South Australia we are all deeply interested in the project.

Senator MATHESON.—If the honorable and learned senator has read the report, he will know that the route proposed to be traversed was described as being almost a flat prairie, and presenting no difficulty of construction, and that the only difficulty was in regard to the water.

Senator HIGGS.—Is not that a stupendous obstacle?

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator would have been right in making that remark prior to the result of certain exploratory work which has been carried on, and to which Senator Pearce has referred this morning. When Senator Higgs receives the report of that work, he will find that the water trouble has been solved, and that there will be no difficulty in constructing the line if the Commonwealth Government are prepared to find the necessary funds. In that case what is the good of talking of a survey to discover whether the project is practicable or not? What we want is a working survey on which a contractor might tender. What is the good of getting a flying survey unless the Government are prepared to go on with the work?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Will the honorable senator tell us how they can go on with the work without the consent of South Australia?

Senator MATHESON.—I understand that the consent of South Australia has practically been promised.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Where does the honorable senator find that statement?

Senator MATHESON.—I cannot quote an authority for the statement. Am I to understand from the Attorney-General that South Australia objects to the construction of the line?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Government of South Australia has objected; it is prepared to approve of a survey being made, but it pledges itself to no more at present.

Senator MATHESON.—Then I understand that it is not Mr. George Reid who is responsible for the difficulty, but the Government of South Australia.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The Constitution gives the Commonwealth power to construct a railway if it is considered necessary for the purposes of defence.

Senator MATHESON.—Unfortunately, the Constitution gives the Commonwealth no power to construct a railway without the consent of the State. I called attention to that unfortunate position when the draft Constitution Bill was being debated in the Legislative Council of Western Australia. I had only just been returned for the gold-fields, and I regret to say that I could not get any support in the Legislative Council, to an amendment I suggested, to make it feasible for the Commonwealth to build a railway, if it was considered necessary in its own interests. The amendment was poo-pooed, because the people on the coast were afraid that it might be applied to the Esperance railway, and the result was that the Constitution was left in its present shape. Do I understand, from the Attorney-General, that the Government of South Australia make the preparation of this survey a condition precedent to their discussing the question of authorizing the construction of the railway?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—They do not pledge themselves, I understand, to anything except that they are prepared to facilitate the making of the survey.

Senator MATHESON.—That is a most extraordinary and most un-Federal attitude for the Government of South Australia to take up. It is just as well that the country should know that that is their attitude.

Senator MCGREGOR.—That is the attitude of the Government of South Australia, not of the people of the State.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator cannot draw any distinction between the Government and the people of the State. With its most liberal franchise it is fair to imagine that the Government represent the people.

Senator DOBSON.—Can the honorable senator say what guarantee the Government of Western Australia are prepared to give against any loss?

Senator MATHESON.—The late Premier of Western Australia intimated his views on that subject to the Government of South Australia. I am not in a position to quote his communication, but I understand that he undertook to make up the loss.

Senator DOBSON.—Has he ever mentioned any amount that he would make up?

Senator MATHESON.—How can any person mention a specific amount when he undertakes to make up the loss?

Senator DOBSON.—He can mention a share of an amount.

Senator MATHESON.—The late Premier of Western Australia, I understand, undertook to make up any loss accrued during a certain number of years. I believe that the report of the State experts who were asked to look into the question indicated that for a certain number of years a loss was probable, and I understand that the late Premier, James, offered to make good the loss during that term of years.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Was it not Western Australia's share of the loss?

Senator DE LARGIE.—And South Australia's share, too.

Senator MATHESON.—I know that the loss far exceeded the amount for which Western Australia would have been responsible. I propose to leave that topic, and express my regret that the Government have not decided, in their programme, to make any provision to a Council of Defence. Some time ago, when the Attorney-General first addressed the Senate, as a member of the Government, I very shortly expressed the hope that he would be able to definitely state when he met us yesterday, what the policy of the Government would be on this question, but I regret to say that he has not seen his way to throw any light on the subject. I propose to deal with the question at some little length, because it is a subject which is most important, and does not seem to be very clearly understood by a number of honorable senators. When the Labor Party came into power, Senator Dawson, the Minister of Defence, looked into the whole question. To put it shortly, pointed a committee of experts, who were trusted to report. We do not know at they actually did report, but the Melburn Argus apparently obtained some information on the subject. Whether it was gained officially or not, I cannot say, but appears from the Argus that the Committee recommended the appointment of a Board of Advice, a Council of Defence, an Inspector-General. According to this recommendation, the Board of Advice apparently corresponds with a body in England, which is called the Army Council. A local Committee followed up to this in the lines laid down by Lord Esher's Committee, which has lately sat in England, and made a very voluminous report in three chapters. I wish to explain the difference between the Board of Advice and the Council of Defence, because in what I have heard, both here and abroad, a considerable amount of ignorance exists as to the duties of the two bodies. They are entirely distinct. The Board of Advice, as recommended by a local committee, appears to be a rather fortunate substitute for the Army Council. In the Army Council, as recommended by Lord Esher's committee, consists of a board, which takes the place of the General Officer Commanding; in fact it is the General Officer Commanding, in committee. In a few remarks I intend to make I shall use the term "Army Council," because that conveys the exact meaning of what the word is, and the phrase "Board of Advice" does not.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does the honorable senator propose something in the nature of the Army Council now under suggestion in England?

Senator MATHESON.—I do for that specific purpose; but I propose now to deal with the Council of Defence, and to touch the Army Council incidentally. The Council of Defence, as recommended by a local committee, appears to be a consultative body to act as an advisory committee to the Minister. It is very much, in fact, the sort of council that I advocated in the end of last session, but with nothing like as ample powers. My suggestion was embodied in the following propositions:—

The Council shall receive and review all recommendations of the General Officer Commanding and Naval Commandant in respect to the organization, administration, and financial policy of their respective branches of the Defence Forces, and shall, if thought necessary, obtain expert advice on any questions arising under such recommendations.

It shall be the duty of the Council, from time to time, to make such recommendations to Parliament as it may think desirable for most effectually securing the efficiency of the defences and Defence Forces of the Commonwealth, and to take such steps as may be necessary to secure effective compliance with the directions of Parliament in respect to all such matters.

The Council of Defence suggested by the committee of experts is not to have any powers of that nature. The proposal was set out in the Argus of 16th August in these terms—

The expert committee in its report suggested that two bodies should be constituted—one a Board of Advice, and the other the actual Council of Defence. The Board of Advice, it was recommended, should consist of the Minister, the Secretary for Defence, the Chief Staff Officer at head-quarters, and representatives of the Militia and Volunteer Forces and the Rifle Clubs. The duty of this board would be to secure uniformity of administration throughout the Commonwealth, and supervise the working of the Department in each State. Its meetings should be at least monthly. The Council of Defence, it was suggested, should consist of the same officers, with the addition of the Inspector-General and the Naval Commandant. This Council would be of the nature of an advisory committee to the Minister, who would preside over its deliberations. He would not, however, part with his prerogative to initiate the defence policy of the Commonwealth, although he would look to the Council for advice regarding any scheme he might put forward from time to time.

This council, constituted in that way, would be on an entirely wrong basis, that is, according to Lord Esher's Committee. I do not wish any members of the Senate to suppose that I set up as an expert. I have simply studied the report of Lord Esher's Committee, and applied the principles which it lays down as far as possible to the circumstances prevailing in the Commonwealth. I do not think that one could have a safer guide than the advice embodied in Lord Esher's report. Lord Esher's Committee point out that the Army Council should consist entirely of executive officers for the higher administration of the Defence Force, plus the Minister of Defence; but that the Council of Defence, being a deliberative and consulting body, should not include any of the officers who are charged with the administration of affairs. They are, in fact, like managing directors. They have the sole responsibility for carrying out effectively the decisions of the Council of Defence, and as such they ought not to be able to sit in the Council of Defence and frame suggestions for the control of the Army. Their duties are simply executive, and their members should be renewed from time to time. Now I come to what the Council of Defence should consist of. I am dealing with this matter very briefly, because I understand it is desired to bring this debate to a determination this afternoon. The Council of Defence, as laid down by the Esher Committee, should consist of the Prime Minister, the Treasurer, and the Minister of Defence. Then we have to make a divergence, because the Esher Committee deals with a set of circumstances entirely different from the circumstances here. The Esher Committee suggest the appointment of the head of the Intelligence Department of the Navy and the head of the Intelligence Department of the Army. We have no equivalent officers in the Commonwealth. Therefore I would suggest that the technical members should be the Chief of the Staff, the Inspector-General and the Chief Naval Officer. The Esher Committee lays special stress upon the desirability of having a certain number of permanent technical advisers on the Council of Defence, because they point out that in no other way could continuity be secured in carrying out the defence programme of Great Britain. The same consideration would obviously apply to the defence programme of this Commonwealth. But, in addition, I propose, as I proposed last year, to have on the Council a certain number of members of both Houses of the Commonwealth Parliament—say, one from each House. And for this reason: As things stand at present in the Commonwealth, we get no parliamentary responsibility of any sort or kind in connexion with defence matters. We get a nominal responsibility on the part of the Minister, but when Ministers are changing, say, every six months or so, I put it to the Senate—what responsibility of any sort or kind can we get in connexion with the defence of the Commonwealth?

Senator HIGGS.—Ministers do not take any.

Senator MATHESON.—One Minister succeeds another. First we had Sir John Forrest; then we had Sir William Lyne; then we had Senator Drake; then we had Mr. Chapman; then we had Senator Dawson; now we have Mr. McCay. Under these circumstances, what can we expect from the defence system of the Commonwealth? The control practically drifts into the hands of the permanent officers of the Military Department.

Senator HIGGS.—Do not these remarks apply to all the Departments under the circumstances?

Senator MATHESON.—They do apply, as the honorable senator has said, to all the Departments to some extent, but in the Defence Department the difficulty is accentuated.

Senator PEARCE.—The policy of defence depends more upon the Minister than is the case in the other Departments.

Senator MATHESON.—The control of the Defence Department is more a matter of policy, whereas the control of a Department like the Post-office is more a matter of routine. When once the lines of policy are laid down in the Customs Department, or the Post-office, the Departments run perfectly smoothly. But in the Defence Department circumstances are changing from day to day, and the policy has to be changed to suit the ever-varying needs of the Commonwealth, and all the changes which necessarily take place in defence policy throughout the world. Under these circumstances it is absolutely necessary, to my mind, to bring Parliament more in touch with its actual responsibility. It is impossible to see how this can be secured unless the question of defence is entirely separated from party politics. That has been the trouble with the defence question from the very commencement. Whenever the party in power were attacked on any defence question they gave in sooner than force matters to an issue on a question about which members knew extremely little. Therefore the defence of the Commonwealth suffered more and more, every time an attack was made upon the Government, from the apathy of Ministers.

Senator HIGGS.—We ought to make every member of Parliament join some regiment.

Senator MATHESON.—I think it would do a good deal of good, but of course it is impossible. Now, I come to the Inspector-General. He can be left off the Council of Defence, or not, as the Parliament thinks fit. There are many advantages in including the Inspector-General in the Council of Defence. But the one place where he ought not to be is upon the Army Council. Because his duty is to report upon how the members of the Army Council carry out the instructions of the Defence Committee. That is his raison d'être. And though his advice would probably be extremely useful to the Council of Defence, I do not know that it is absolutely essential that he should be a member of that body. The important point that I want again to emphasize is that the Council of Defence should arrange the policy of the Defence Forces, and should consist partly of Members of Parliament, and partly of experts, and that it should report to Parliament direct. That is where another trouble has arisen in connexion with this Department. Reports go in to the Defence Department, and unless they happen to please or suit the views of the Minister in charge of the Department, they get pigeon-holed, and it is impossible for Members of Parliament to ascertain what they contain. We want to know the truth, and the only way in which we can get the truth is to have this Committee reporting to us direct. Now I come to the question of the Army Council. I think I have made sufficiently clear to the Senate the difference that exists between the Council of Defence and the Army Council. What Lord Esher's Committee says of the Army Council is that it is not, and cannot be, a representative body as regards the several arms and departments. I want the Committee clearly to appreciate that, because according to the Argus report, it seems to be proposed that the Army Council or executive body should consist of the Minister of Defence, the Secretary of Defence, the Chief Staff Officer at Head-Quarters, and representatives of the militia, volunteers, and rifle clubs. This is absolutely at variance with fundamental principles. I have already stated that this Council ought simply to be a board of officers for carrying into effect the schemes approved by Parliament and by the Defence Committee. I do not wish to be entirely destructive in my criticism. I wish to be constructive as well. Because criticism is extremely easy. It is easy to say, "So-and-so is wrong"; but not always so easy to suggest what would be right. I have taken some trouble therefore to avoid that criticism being applied to myself. I have taken the trouble to analyze Lord Esher's scheme, and apply it as far as possible to the Commonwealth in connexion with this Army Council. Applying on a small scale the recommendations of Lord Esher's Committee to our needs, I would suggest that the Army Council should be constituted as follows:—First of all the Minister of Defence, the head of the Department; then four military men, who would be the executive chiefs of their various Departments, and upon whom I have conferred the titles given to them by Lord Esher's Committee. They consist of the Chief of Staff, the Adjutant-General, the Quartermaster-General, and the Master-General of Ordnance. In addition to those we require to have a finance member and a naval member. But on no account—and on this point Lord Esher's Committee is most emphatic—should the Secretary of the Minister of Defence be a member of the Army Council, as apparently he would be under the scheme which has been prepared for the Commonwealth. His duties are to be purely secretarial, as between the Minister and Parliament, the other Departments of the State, and the law officers of the Crown. He ought to be responsible—which, apparently, he is not at present, as far as I can gather—for the actuarial and statistical returns in connexion with the Defence Department. I have had occasion several times lately to criticise the statistical statements furnished in various reports, and I have been told that those were statements emanating from Major-General Hutton, and that the Department was not responsible for them. That is not a position of affairs which ought to prevail. The Secretary of the Department ought to be absolutely responsible for all the statistical information placed before Parliament, and the Department ought to be responsible through him for their accuracy. Each member of the board, plus the Minister, would have specific duties to perform, and a specific Department to control. In order to prove to the Senate and to the public that that is advisable, and that there is no difficulty in applying Lord Esher's recommendations to our circumstances, as far as defence is concerned, I have taken a very useful table, which will be found at the end of Major-General Hutton's report for 1902-3, and which is called Appendix A. It sets out the duties of the various officers under Major-General Hutton's control, and I have allocated those duties more or less in accordance with Lord Esher's recommendations to the officers whose titles I have mentioned. They are as follows:—The Chief Staff Officer would have the following duties:—

General supervision as Chief Staff Officer, administrative questions involving action in Parliament, and decision of Minister of Defence. military intelligence. Topography. Schemes of defence. Defence system of Australia, and all details in that connexion. Basis of military organization. Plans of concentration for war.

Then we have the Adjutant-General, who would have to deal with—

Discipline, practical instruction, and training. Returns and statistics connected with the personnel. Enlistment and discharge. Drafting and issuing of general orders and instructions. Drafting of regulations. Appointment and promotion of officers, and their qualifications. Peace organization of forces. Mobilization. Military education, instruction, training, drill and examinations, rifle ranges and rifle clubs, rifle shooting. Supervision and instruction of the instructional staff. Schools of instruction of all kinds, and staff rides.

Then we have the Quartermaster-General, who would deal with—

Occupation and appropriation of barracks, &c. Supply of food, forage, fuel, light, and quarters. Movement of troops, and distribution of their stores and equipment. Land and water transport. Remounts. Patterns of dress and uniform. Organization of and instruction of the Army Service Corps. Medical service. Sanitation. Administration and command of the Army Medical Corps. As a temporary expedient the organization of an Australian Army Veterinary Department. Patterns and inventions. Care, maintenance, and distribution of warlike stores, arms, accoutrements, equipment, and clothing not in charge of the troops. Questions of armament and equipment other than artillery and engineers.

Then we have the Master General of Ordnance, who would deal with—

All armament and equipment. Personnel of the permanent and militia artillery. Stores. Experimental equipment. Artillery ranges and practice. Technical instruction of the artillery, &c. Inspection of warlike stores. Repairing workshops, control of magazines and store-houses not in charge of troops. Administration of the Army Ordnance Corps. Contracts for guns, ammunition, artillery stores. Defence works. Construction, maintenance and repair of fortifications, barracks, and store buildings. Preparation of designs of all military works. Military telegraphs. Custody of plans of works. Custody of lands in occupation of troops. Questions of engineer and submarine mining stores and equipment. Personnel and stores. Technical instruction of engineers, submarine miners, &c.

Then we have the Finance member, who would deal with the—Preparation of annual estimates. Questions affecting pay of troops and allowances provided by regulations. Questions involving petty disbursements under the regulations. Minor questions of finance for recommendation to Minister. Collating data affecting annual estimates. Pay and allowances of the Head-Quarters Staff. Controlling and recording contracts, and obtaining stores from contractors. Custody of documents of all properties pertaining to the Department, and plans of all departmental properties not in occupation of the troops. Purchase and leases of the above. Custody of lands not in occupation of the troops.

Finance Department, supervision of all expenditure.

Senator Matheson.

Then we have one innovation of Lord Escher's recommendations. That is the Naval member. One has to bear in mind that there are only about 1,500 members of the Naval Forces of the Commonwealth, and it would be absolutely preposterous to have a full Naval Board, separate from the Army Council, to deal with the affairs of our extremely small Navy. Such a council might become necessary later on, when we increase our ships and increase the number of men enrolled. But at present it would be absolutely unnecessary. Therefore I suggest that a naval member should be included, who should be given general supervision as Chief Naval Staff Officer, equivalent to Chief of Military Staff. Control of entire Naval Force about 1,500 men. That practically embraces everything. As to the Inspector-General, I want to add a few words in connexion with Lord Escher's report. Lord Escher's Committee says—

The Inspector-General and his staff should have no executive or administrative functions. They are intended to provide the Secretary of State and the Army Council with eyes and ears, and their reports should deal only with existing facts, pointing out defects, commenting upon efficiency, and thus enabling the governing body of the army to know the practical results of the measures it adopts. . . . The Inspector-General should form an opinion, either personally or through his staff, as the Army Council may direct, on the efficiency of officers and men, on the handling of troops, on the standard and system of training, on the suitability of equipment, and generally on all that affects the readiness of the forces for war. He should act as an umpire at manœuvres, and have a small personal staff. He should prepare an annual report to the Army Council, and also send reports on matters requiring immediate attention to the Secretary of the War Office.

Under these circumstances I think it must be clear to the Senate that, as I said before, the Inspector-General ought on no account to be a member of the Army Council, as is suggested apparently by the report of the Committee with regard to the Commonwealth Forces. That completes what I have to say on the subject of the Army Council, and the Council of Defence. I have dealt with the question fairly briefly, but at the same time I hope that I have made the various duties of these bodies sufficiently clear to the members of the Senate. Now, I wish, as shortly as possible, to deal with the reasons why a Council of Defence, reporting direct to Parliament, is an absolute necessity. To do that I shall have to go back to a small extent over the history of the Defence Department.

Senator DAWSON.—Is it true that the honorable senator has been “slating” me in my absence?

Senator MATHESON.—No; I have nothing whatever to complain of so far as the honorable senator is concerned. On the contrary, it was not until Senator Dawson got into possession of what I may call an impregnable fortress like Port Arthur, that it was possible to get any information whatever. I was just about to come to that very point. The Senate will remember that in July, 1903, I had occasion to move for a report to be furnished on the deficiencies of armament and equipment. Major-General Hutton had made a speech in Adelaide, in which he pointed out that the defects in both respects were very great, and the Government were doing all in their power to prevent a disclosure of the absolute facts.

Senator DAWSON.—That was in regard to small arms.

Senator MATHESON.—It was in regard to all equipment—in regard to water bottles and other matters which I forget; it is not necessary to go into details.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator's complaint is about the heavy guns, and Major-General Hutton spoke about small arms. Major-General Hutton was entirely wrong, because it was just a matter of distribution.

Senator MATHESON.—On the 2nd July, 1903, I stated that there was, at any rate, one battery at Albany, which was a shell trap, and that the principal armament of that fort consisted of 6-inch guns. On the 8th July of that same year, Sir John Forrest, in a press interview, characterized my charges as romances, but I shall prove that they were absolute facts. Sir John Forrest in the same interview asked what experience or knowledge I had to justify me in posing as an authority, and in the Herald of the 7th of that month he is reported as saying—

I don't think the place is as bad as he makes out. I have not been furnished with any report that it is not all right. They would have said so if anything were wrong. Notwithstanding that, however, I have asked for a report.

On the 17th of the month, there appeared in the Age a telegram from the General Officer Commanding:—

I consider the danger suggested as relatively insignificant.

The Senate will notice that the General Officer Commanding could not deny that the facts were exactly as I had stated them; all he said was that the danger was “relatively insignificant.”

Senator DAWSON.—Contrast that with the last report of the General Officer Commanding.

Senator MATHESON.—The last report contains nothing about the state of the defences at Albany.

Senator DAWSON.—Yes, the General Officer Commanding refers to the great danger arising from the fort not being fully armed.

Senator MATHESON.—But on the occasion to which I refer, he was dealing with a specific statement that one of the batteries was a shell trap. There is a wall of rock behind, and any shell thrown must splinter and decimate the men in charge of the guns below. I wish the Senate to observe that Sir John Forrest, though head of the Defence Department, knew nothing whatever about the state of affairs at Albany. This is the more remarkable, in view of the fact that Sir John Forrest is a representative of Western Australia, and had, presumably, as Premier of that State, previously visited this battery. But the great point is that Sir John Forrest was in charge of this Department; and his want of knowledge in this instance emphasizes the necessity for the appointment of an intelligent Committee of Defence. When Senator Drake, as the representative of the Government, replied to me, he pooh-poohed my statements, which he said could do no harm, as they did not come from an authoritative source. Senator Drake further questioned the patriotism of my action, and said that no useful purpose could be served by bringing this matter up. In that I am quite willing to admit Senator Drake was quite right, for I certainly served no useful purpose, seeing that I got no satisfaction, and that matters to-day remain exactly as they were then. It will be remembered that my motion for a return was carried by the Senate; but, nevertheless, it was completely ignored by the Department. Month after month went by, and no attempt was made to furnish the information for which the Senate, and not, it must be observed, Senator Matheson, had called. Finally, on the 30th June, 1904, I received a note from the Secretary of the Department, stating that the annual report for 1903-4 would shortly be in the hands of the Minister, and would give all the information in regard to the deficiencies of equipment which, in the opinion of the General Officer Commanding, it was advisable to make public. That note I received nearly twelve months after the report had been called for by the Senate. I submit, again, that if there had been a Council of Defence, the Senate would, within a month, have received the information to which we were perfectly entitled, and we should have been able to deal with the report when the Estimates were under consideration. But there is something even more interesting to be said in connexion with the forts. Turning up some old papers a few days ago, I came across a communication sent by Sir William Lyne, when acting Minister of Defence, to the Age, on the 30th June, 1902. My statements, it ought to be observed, were made on the 2nd July, 1903, and the Senate will be amazed when I read what Sir William Lyne said, as follows:—

Without specifying Queenscliff or any other place where forts are employed, I may say that certain forts are described to me as so many shell traps.

When a man says "without specifying Queenscliff or any other place" he obviously means his readers to infer that Queenscliff is the place to which he alludes.

Senator DAWSON.—What does the honorable senator suggest? That the Queenscliff fort is a shell-trap?

Senator MATHESON.—That is apparently what Sir William Lyne intends the public to conclude, and he went on to say—

They may be retained in some form as a decoy, and will be manned with brave men whose lives may be sacrificed for the country's safety.

It will be seen that the Acting Minister of Defence was, on the 30th June, 1902, perfectly well aware that certain of our forts were shell-traps, in which it would be dangerous for men to stand in time of war, and yet to this day no steps have been taken to rectify the defects.

Senator DAWSON.—Has the honorable senator seen the Queenscliff fort?

Senator MATHESON.—I have never been inside the fort.

Senator DAWSON.—If the honorable senator had seen the fort he would realize the absurdity of his statements.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator speaks with the authority of an ex-Minister of Defence, whereas I am speaking simply as one of the public, of the public utterances of another ex-Minister of Defence, so that the Senate may place the views of one as against the views of the other, both probably being equally competent to form an opinion. This instance only shows the extent to which opinions may differ on any one subject. We have arrived at the fact that quite apart from being a shell-trap, Albany is not defended in any sense of the word. The 6-inch guns are absolutely useless to protect the mine-field, for which, if honorable senators read Major-General Hutton's report, they will see the guns were intended. Those guns would be out-ranged by guns on any modern cruisers sent to attack the forts. Then at Albany, there is no search-light apparatus, no plant for generating electric light, and no staff of submarine engineers.

Senator DAWSON.—About a month ago submarine engineers were sent to Albany.

Senator MATHESON.—Of course I accept the ex-Minister's explanation, but so far as the reports and the Army list are concerned, no submarine miners or engineers are stationed at Albany, or, in fact, in Western Australia. I am sure the ex-Minister of Defence deserves the thanks of the Commonwealth if he was the means of having these men sent to the fort as a very necessary complement to the defences of that State. This is what the Colonial Defence Committee, the great English authority, had to say on fixed defences in their report, dated 30th March, 1901:—

The object of fixed defences is to deter the enemy's vessels from approaching within the range at which his fire would be effective.

That is to say, the guns in the fixed defences or forts should be able to out-range any guns likely to be brought against them, or otherwise the former are absolutely useless. There is no use whatever in paying thirty-six men, as we do year after year, to play at the defence of Albany, unless the guns of which they have charge are able to out-range any guns likely to be brought against them. What the result of such weak defences is we have seen in connexion with the Japanese war. The ships or batteries containing long range guns are out of the range of the defending forces, and are able to shell and destroy the latter. There are no guns that would be of any use in the defence of the Commonwealth for long range purposes except a 9·2 inch gun—no gun of a lower calibre would be of any value. I know that Senator Dawson holds views different from my own on this subject.

Senator DAWSON.—I do not hold different views as to the efficiency of the gun, but it is a question of cost.

Senator MATHESON.—The question of cost cannot be considered in connexion with defences, but must be put on one side altogether. We must make our defences efficient, or it is not worth while having any defences.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is a large proposition.

Senator MATHESON.—What would be said of a manufacturer who, in the face of competition, was satisfied with inferior plant?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is another matter.

Senator MATHESON.—The positions are identical.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—If a manufacturer has not the money to get a new plant, what is to happen?

Senator MATHESON.—If we have not the means for adequate defences, why should we waste £700,000 per annum on plant which we know to be inferior?

Senator CLEMONS.—Must every manufacturer have the maximum of capital? Cannot a manufacturer get on with a little less?

Senator MATHESON.—Every manufacturer who is worth his salt throws out his old plant as soon as better plant is invented, as the honorable senator would know if he were a mercantile man.

Senator CLEMONS.—A manufacturer would have to be worth something more than "his salt" to do business in that way.

Senator MATHESON.—What is the alternative if a manufacturer cannot obtain the best plant? He must see his competitors beating him year after year, and ultimately he must become bankrupt.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does the honorable senator not think that some little consideration should be given to the element of cost.

Senator MATHESON.—I quite agree with the honorable and learned senator, but if we in Parliament consider that the cost is beyond us we ought to abandon the business altogether. Do not let us go on dragging £700,000 out of the Commonwealth each year for what we know to be a farce.

Senator CLEMONS.—Is it not possible to secure efficiency for that expenditure?

Senator DAWSON.—Cannot we secure efficiency without 9·2 guns, which cost about £30,000 each?

Senator MATHESON.—We cannot secure efficient defence without 9·2 guns in those places we wish to defend. We have to settle on what places we desire to defend, and if it be decided that Western Australia is not worth defending, well and good.

Senator CLEMONS.—No one would dare to say that.

Senator MATHESON.—I am glad to hear that remark, because I quite expected Senator Clemons to express a contrary opinion about Western Australia. If the Constitution is worth anything, and we desire to pay regard to that particular provision which makes this Parliament responsible for the defence of the States, those defences ought to be placed in an efficient condition.

Senator CLEMONS.—We cannot be asked to do that regardless of expense.

Senator MATHESON.—If proper defences cannot be provided, let us make no pretence at defences. Do not let us lead the British Government, the Admiral of the Station, and the people to suppose that Albany is defended, when it is defenceless. Even the 6-inch guns at Albany are not modern guns, and do not possess the penetrative power and other advantages which are possessed by guns of similar calibre turned out at the present day.

Senator DRAKE.—Has the honorable senator made any calculation of what would be the total cost of defending Australia on that basis?

Senator MATHESON.—I am not in a position to make any such calculation. That is why we want the Council of Defence. We are not in a position to arrive at a conclusion. The Minister will not make such a calculation, and, if the responsible adviser of the Minister does so, and the amount involved is larger than the Government care to spend, the Minister, as Sir George Turner did, takes his pen, and sweeps off half.

Senator DRAKE.—That was because he knew Parliament would not vote the money.

Senator MATHESON.—I speak subject to correction, but I think that last year Major-General Hutton stated that it was essential that £125,000 should be spent. Sir George Turner then took his pen, and reduced the estimate by 50 per cent.

Senator DRAKE.—That was because Parliament would not have voted the money.

Senator MATHESON.—Parliament never had the opportunity, and we all know that Parliament cannot increase a vote. Why blame Parliament when the blame lies with the Government?

Senator DRAKE.—Because a general pledge had been made to Parliament that expenditure would be cut down.

Senator MATHESON.—I do not wish to contradict the honorable and learned senator rudely, but there was no such general pledge. The pledge was that the money spent on the Head-Quarters Staff, and so on, would be reduced.

Senator CLEMONS.—Does the honorable senator think that we could afford 9'2 guns at every port and harbor in the Commonwealth?

Senator MATHESON.—We ought either to drop any pretensions at defences or place 9'2 guns at the places we wish to defend. It is a farce to spend money, year after year, in supporting garrisons and places which could not be defended with the armament provided.

Senator CLEMONS.—Some of us might modestly suggest that there were other ports to be defended besides Albany.

Senator MATHESON.—Yes; there is, of course, Hobart, and also Launceston. I do not, however, wish to raise State questions, but to deal with the matter on as broad a basis as possible.

Senator CLEMONS.—Could we have 9'2 guns at all those ports?

Senator MATHESON.—I really cannot answer the honorable senator; that is a matter for the Council of Defence.

Senator DAWSON.—Such armament is not required in all the States, because there are only two points of entrance into Australia—Queensland and Western Australia.

Senator MATHESON.—That is a possible argument, with which, however, I do not quite agree, though I understand the drift of the honorable senator's interjection. I wish to lay further stress on this question of the 9'2 guns. On the 29th August, of the present year, a telegram came from England to the effect that the British Admiralty are abolishing 4'7 and 6-inch guns in favour of 9'2 guns; and I may say that my notes for this address were put together before that telegram arrived. At the same time, I do not wish to be misunderstood. The duty of 9'2 guns is to keep the enemy out of range, and prevent them from shelling the forts, but 6-inch guns are also absolutely necessary for the protection of narrow channels, where the enemy must come within short range.

I do not wish to be understood for an instant to say that the 6-inch guns are not necessary. In those places where we had not 9'2 inch guns, the enemy, after having shelled their batteries, and destroyed the 6-inch guns, would be able to send in their torpedo boat destroyers, and destroy the mine-field. The protection of all these ports, I understand, is the mine-field, which is laid down under the immediate protection of the 6-inch guns. Now, the 6-inch gun is a quick firer. A certain number of shots can be fired extremely rapidly, because the cartridge can be put into it by a man. But anything above a 6-inch gun requires machinery for loading, and therefore a very much reduced number of shots can be fired in the same time. I hope that up to that point I have the Senate with me in proving the necessity for a Council of Defence. We now come to the 13th of July of the current year. On that occasion Senator Pearce wished to know how many obsolete guns were being used by the field artillery, and Senator Dawson said that of his personal knowledge he could say nothing on the subject, but that he had made it his business to inquire at the Department, and that the reply he got was that the Department was utterly unaware of any obsolete guns being used by the field artillery at the present time. On the 28th of July, 1904, I moved for a return, which was laid upon the table on the 11th of August. It is an analysis of the schedule of field guns in present service, as shown in Appendix K of the General Officer Commanding's report of the 1st May, 1904. Of eighty-two guns, sixteen are 15-pounder guns with the modern breech action, and to that extent up-to-date; twelve are 15-pounder guns, with the obsolete breech action; sixteen are 12-pounder guns, which have the obsolete breech action, and are going to be converted; thirty are muzzle-loaders, fit for nothing but the scrap heap, or for parks; four are breech-loading howitzers, with the obsolete breech action, and four are breech-loading 40-pounder siege guns, with the obsolete breech action.

Senator DAWSON.—But they can be sent home and converted.

Senator MATHESON.—It is quite true that they can be converted, but what would be the cost of converting these siege guns?

Senator DAWSON.—About £1,500.

Senator MATHESON.—It could be done at a cost of £1,500, to say nothing of the freight. I wish to explain why the obsolete breech action completely puts the guns out of account, as far as efficiency is concerned. At the barracks here a man is taught to work these guns on a one motion breech action. The object of the tuition is to teach the men to fire as many shots as possible in a given time, and to do that each man must become a mere machine in loading the gun. After he has become a mere automaton, he goes down to Queenscliff, where he finds himself placed in charge of a gun with the obsolete breech action, which requires three motions. What is the consequence? After he loads the gun, he slams the breech to, and does not give the handle the other two turns. When another man pulls a string, the cartridge goes off, the breech block is blown out behind, and if a man is there he is killed. It is reported in the press this morning that on one of His Majesty's ships of war a breech block blew out, and killed several men.

Senator DAWSON.—Is it the fault of the guns at Queenscliff, or the fault of the petty officer in not giving the requisite order?

Senator MATHESON.—It may be the fault of the officer, but it arises from the fact that after a man has been trained at the barracks here to the use of one gun he is put in charge of another gun, and he has become more or less of a machine in giving his orders, quite forgetting that three turns are necessary instead of one. These guns are more dangerous to people behind them than to people in front of them. I now come to another question, which the Council of Defence will have to deal with, and that is the cost of converting these obsolete guns. I question whether we are justified in spending a single penny in that direction. To begin with, the guns are absolutely obsolete from the point of view of the British Government. For their field artillery the British Government have now adopted the 18-pounder gun. Last year I called attention to that fact, and one would have imagined that in the interval some steps would have been taken by the Department of Defence to ascertain the cost of the new 18-pounder guns, which are described as being extremely efficient. and a great improvement on anything in use at present by Continental nations.

Senator DAWSON.—Only at long range.

Senator MATHESON.—The description reads as follows:—

The new guns throw 18-lb. and 12½-lb. projectiles, the former shell being the heaviest of the kind in Europe. Great rapidity of fire can be obtained. The guns ride close to the ground, the breech mechanism is of the single motion pattern, and fixed ammunition—that is to say, the cartridge and shell are combined—is used. These characteristics have enabled as many as twenty-eight rounds to be fired with one gun in a minute.

When the Government of Great Britain are discarding all their 15-pounder and 12-pounder guns in order to adopt the 18-pounder guns, I ask the Senate whether it is a wise policy on our part to spend £523 in converting a 12-pounder gun into a 15-pounder? It is impossible for a private senator to express an opinion on the point, but to most business men it would certainly seem a very doubtful line of policy. Here, again, I wish to point out the absolute want of business capacity shown in the Defence Department in connexion with the valuation of their property. In a report made on the 21st June, 1901, a committee of experts advised that a complete schedule and valuation should be made of all the transferred military stores and property. It will be remembered that only yesterday I received a reply from the Attorney-General, to the effect that no such valuation has ever been made. Although the States will have to be paid for all these stores and guns, still no steps of any sort have been taken to assess their value, or come to any arrangement with the States.

Senator DAWSON. — New South Wales has already been charged for some of its obsolete guns.

Senator MATHESON. — I think that the honorable senator is mistaken, because we have the word of the Attorney-General, and of the Department, that the contrary is the fact.

Senator DAWSON.—Well, the fact is the contrary.

Senator MATHESON.—There, again, we get a little evidence of the necessity for a Council of Defence. We get the ex-Minister of Defence and the Attorney-General absolutely at variance on a point on which there ought to be no doubt.

Senator DAWSON.—I know that certain obsolete guns were charged against the Commonwealth, and that when we asked the Government of New South Wales if they would undertake the cost of distributing them to municipal councils and to public gardens they agreed to do so. That was done before I left the office.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator is quite right. I can explain how it arose. The State Government agreed to distribute the guns, and not to make a charge against the Commonwealth; and no valuation has been made because none was necessary. I now come to the thirty muzzle-loaders in the schedule. Out of eighty-two apparently effective guns, thirty are obsolete muzzle-loaders, which, according to Major-General Hutton, are absolutely useless. At page 24 of his report of 1st May, 1903, he says—

The obsolete type of muzzle-loading guns now in existence in the various States is useless for service purposes.

When the municipalities in Western Australia applied the other day to have these guns distributed to them for ornamental purposes they received a reply to the effect that the guns could not be dispensed with.

Senator DAWSON.—Is that quite correct? Did not Mr. James absolutely refuse to bear the cost of the transfer of these guns from one place to another?

Senator MATHESON.—No; the honorable senator is mistaken there. The guns that were offered to Mr. James were two 7-inch muzzle-loaders—guns of position—which were sent out by the British Government in 1884, and have been lying in the sand at Karrakatta ever since, under a galvanized iron roof. The muzzle-loading field guns are absolutely useless for training or anything else, and are kept on the schedule of effective guns simply to deceive the public of Western Australia. We are told that the defence of that State consists of ten guns, when, as a matter of fact, only two of them are effective.

Senator DAWSON.—The fact remains that Mr. James refused to incur one penny of expenditure on the transfer of any obsolete guns to any garden or municipality.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable senator is mistaken there.

Senator DAWSON.—Well, I read the papers.

Senator MATHESON.—I have also seen the papers, which show that Mr. James, in reply to a communication from the Federal Government, wrote:—

The military authorities inform me that there are at present only two guns which could be granted to parks, &c., namely, those stored at Karrakatta; but these would entail a heavy cost in removal and mounting. As the guns referred to have little interest, I question if any public body would care to pay the cost of removal, &c. There are eight smaller guns which will be available when replaced by ones of more modern pattern. These guns would, no doubt, be suited for the purposes indicated in your letter.

In view of the above facts, I think it wise to deal with the question as it arises, and do not to commit the Government as to its future action.

The municipalities, I may say, are perfectly prepared to take eight muzzle-loading field guns; but the Defence Department wishes to swell the list of apparently effective guns in Western Australia. I am not quite sure about Victoria; but in several of the eastern States muzzle-loading field guns are still kept on the effective list, although they are absolutely useless. When I moved my motion last year for a return of the deficient stores, Sir John Forrest, as usual, went out of his way to have an interview with the premier. He said that there were ten modern efficient field guns in New South Wales, and pooh-poohed my statement. When we get this return, after very great difficulty, we find that New South Wales has only four modern efficient field guns with the up-to-date single breech action, and that the other six guns have the obsolete breech action, and are not, as he terms them, modern efficient field guns. So much for the information that gets placed at the disposal of the Minister of Defence in the Department.

Senator DAWSON.—What branch of the Department does the honorable senator mean?

Senator MATHESON.—I have not the Minister of Defence, and therefore I do not know.

Senator DAWSON.—But the honorable senator is making charges against three or four branches of the Department.

Senator MATHESON.—I absolve the Minister, whom I regard as simply a mouthpiece of the Department. On the 30th of August last, in the fort at Sea Head, Sydney, the men were firing 80-pound muzzle-loaders, which would be absolutely useless in time of war.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Is there some part of the training which might be carried on with even a dummy gun?

Senator MATHESON.—I do not know, as I am not an expert. Of course, the honorable and learned senator understands the distinction between a muzzle-loading and a breech-loading gun. It is perfectly obvious that the training of a man in the case must be different from the training of a man in the other case.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I should think that the drill as to position would be the same in the case of the muzzle-loading gun as in the case of the breech-loading gun.

Senator MATHESON.—The honorable and learned senator will find on investigation that that is not so.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There is no harm in a man knowing how to load an ordinary fowling piece; it does not injure him in learning how to load a rifle.

Senator MATHESON.—I never said there was any harm in it. I say that it is a complete waste of time and money. Even every breech-loading gun has a different throw of its projectile; and it is laid down in one of the reports of the Colonial Defence Committee, that it is extremely desirable that the captain of a gun should be attached to the gun he is going to use in time of war, in order that he may know its tricks, to such an extent do breech-loading guns differ. How useless must it be, therefore, to train artillerymen to use muzzle-loading guns! Now I come back to Western Australia, and in the position of that State with reference to defence I find one of my strongest arguments in favour of a Council of Defence. From the very commencement of the Commonwealth, we in Western Australia have suffered from systematic neglect.

Senator DAWSON.—Colonel Riccardo is there; what more does Western Australia want?

Senator MATHESON.—I find from the Estimates that in 1902, the Albany garrison figured at forty men; but as a matter of fact, they only had about 50 per cent. of the total number in the garrison. That is to say they had twenty. Senator O'Connor when Vice-President of the Executive Council, pooh-poohed my statement to that effect, and said that it was the imagination of a fevered brain. I passed over to Western Australia a fortnight later, and investigated the situation. I found that there were enrolled at Albany at that moment eight commissioned and non-commissioned officers, and thirteen men, that is to say, twenty-one men in all. So much for the imagination of my fevered brain! Of these men several were on leave. So that, as a matter of fact, on an average there were on the roll during one week in October, 1902, only five men per diem at that fort—not sufficient to clean the guns. The then Minister of Defence, Sir John Forrest, when the question was brought before him, was of course not aware of the position. Proving that I was thoroughly right, sixteen men were sent over in 1902, including a sergeant. Then what happened? There was a most ridiculous position of affairs. These men were enrolled under the Victorian Act. When they reached Western Australia they were under no Act whatever. The Officer Commanding in Western Australia had no legal power to enforce any penalty or any discipline on any one of these men. The ex-Minister of Defence can confirm that statement. Until we passed the Commonwealth Defence Act, members of the Defence Force in one State, who were sent into another State, were absolutely free of all control, owing to the fact that they were enrolled under a State Act, which was in force only in the State from which they had come.

Senator DAWSON.—That is right, but it must be remembered that they were under the regulations.

Senator MATHESON.—These men were sent over simply to avoid enrolling men in Western Australia. Now the Department has gone to the other extreme. At Albany they have thirty men and no staff.

Senator DAWSON.—In Melbourne they have all staff and no men!

Senator MATHESON.—I say nothing about Melbourne, because I do not know, but I want to make clear the position so far as Western Australia is concerned. I want to show that Western Australia has suffered from systematic neglect from the beginning. On the 30th June, 1902, provision was made on the Estimates for £5,600 for drill halls in Western Australia. We find from the Estimates, dated 30th June, 1903, that only £640 of that sum had been spent. The rest had been saved. Then, again, when we come to the Estimates dated 30th June, 1904, as I pointed out last year, £13,270 was voted. At least £9,000 of that was never spent.

Senator DAWSON.—Was not that to be put into small arms?

Senator MATHESON.—No; only £5,000 was put into small arms, a very small proportion of which went to Western Australia. This treatment of Western Australia is not confined to the Defence Department. It is part of a systematic course of neglect of Western Australia on the part of the Commonwealth Government. I find in the Estimates for 1902 that a sum of £2,300 was set aside for Customs buildings at Perth. In the Estimates for 1903 the same sum for the same buildings is set down. The buildings have not been erected. In the Estimates for 1904 we find the same sum over again; and, probably, when the Estimates for 1904-5 come along, we shall find the same sum upon them which we have had year after year. It seems to be nobody's interest to see that the money is spent. I went into the question of the defence of Fremantle on a previous occasion, so that it is of no use to deal with that again. I come to another point in connexion with the defence of Fremantle, and it is this: The present proposal, as I understand it, is to put 7½ inch guns into the Fremantle fortifications. I must insist that no arm is of any use for the defence of any of these forts and for keeping off an enemy but 9½-inch guns. That, again, is another question which a Defence Committee would go into and advise Parliament upon.

Senator DAWSON.—What time would elapse between the placing of an order and the delivery of the guns?

Senator MATHESON.—It is of no use to put such questions to me. What I am advocating is that our defences should be looked after in a business-like way. I say again that we shall have no satisfaction until we have a Council of Defence.

Senator DRAKE.—Where are we to get the money from?

Senator MATHESON.—If we cannot get the money we shall know our position. We shall know what it is necessary to spend when we have the money. But at present there is no responsibility of any sort. I insist that Parliament must take the responsibility.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator has told us what is wanted.

Senator MATHESON.—But I know what every one will say. They will say, "But Senator Matheson is not an expert." I am making these statements in order to call attention to what I believe to be the true facts of the case, but to call attention to them will be of no use until we have a body of experts whose duty it will be to advise Parliament.

Senator DRAKE.—We cannot do any good until we have the money.

Senator MATHESON.—Very well, but let us know what is wanted.

Senator HIGGS.—Would it not be cheaper in case of invasion to let the enemy destroy Fremantle and rebuild it afterwards?

Senator MATHESON.—A member of the Legislative Council of Western Australia said exactly the same thing some years ago.

Senator STYLES.—It has been said here also.

Senator MATHESON.—I am aware that Senator Styles has said that there are so few people in Western Australia—only 200,000 or so—that it would be more advisable to bring them over to Victoria in case of invasion. That is the way that questions affecting Western Australia are treated in the Senate. The representatives of the eastern States sit together and poohpoo every claim that Western Australia has for consideration from the Commonwealth Parliament.

Senator HIGGS.—And Mr. Reid gives that State no representation in the Cabinet.

Senator MATHESON.—Mr. Reid, according to common report, offered an honorary portfolio to an ex-Minister in another House, but he, to save his pride, would not take it. That is the current report; I do not know whether it is true. If the interests of the State suffer, Mr. George Reid is not to blame, but the gentleman who would not pocket his pride.

Senator STYLES.—He wanted to pocket the fees; he did not believe in working for nothing.

Senator MATHESON.—Is it supposed that the risk of invasion in the case of Western Australia is less than in the case of one of the eastern States?

Senator DAWSON.—It certainly is not.

Senator MATHESON.—Yet the representatives of the eastern States are prepared to vote money for the defence of Queenscliff and Sydney Heads, whilst the Government simply allocate 7-inch guns for the defence of Fremantle.

Senator GIVENS.—What are the eastern States to which the honorable senator refers?

Senator MATHESON.—Queensland, Victoria, and New South Wales.

Senator GIVENS.—The honorable senator must not include Queensland in that criticism.

Senator MATHESON.—Then I apologize to the honorable senator. I am glad that he takes a more Federal view of our interests than other senators do. But I am accustomed to hear such interjections from Senator Styles in connexion with the Western Australian railway, and every other claim that Western Australia has upon the Commonwealth. From a defence point of view, as showing the position which Western Australia occupies, let me quote what Major-General Hutton says—

The potential wealth of the gold-fields, and the vast extent of valuable and unoccupied land in the territories of Western Australia rendered the acquisition of that portion of the Australian Continent a most valuable prize to foreign nations. The strategical situation, moreover, of Western Australia, dominating, as it does, the southern side of the Indian Ocean, and the converging trade routes from the west, must be considered as of the greatest importance to British and Australian interests.

What have we to oppose to a well-equipped, well-trained, and well-organized expedition?

Senator GUTHRIE.—How are 20,000 men going to be brought here to invade Australia?

Senator MATHESON.—We have in Western Australia a field force of 107 officers, and 1,496 men. We have 2,704 men in all, who are charged with the defence of a State which is the most likely of all the States to be attacked, because it is a State from which gold can be taken at any moment.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Where is the attack coming from?

Senator MATHESON.—If there is not going to be any attack, why have we any defence whatever? We assume that an attack is likely at some time to be made when we make any arrangements for our defence.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Everybody admits that.

Senator MATHESON.—We have two modern field guns, but the men are suffering from want of instructors; and our artillery is trained to practice with muzzle-loaders. Major-General Hutton makes no pretence that we can defend ourselves. This is what he says—

Under the existing circumstances, Western Australia, for purposes of co-operative military assistance from the other States, is as far distant from direct means of reinforcement as New Zealand is from the eastern States of Australia.

That is what we in the west have got from Federation! We are denied the right to provide for our own defence, and the Commonwealth absolutely declines to provide for it. There can be no disputing that statement, because we have it on the authority of Major-General Hutton, who says that it is absolutely impossible under existing circumstances to defend Western Australia through the eastern States.

Senator HIGGS.—The honorable senator seems to have met with a similar reception in the Western Australian State Parliament.

Senator MATHESON.—I am not aware of that.

Senator GIVENS.—Who provided these obsolete guns in the first instance in Western Australia?

Senator MATHESON.—They were not obsolete when they were purchased. They have become obsolete.

Senator GIVENS.—Muzzle-loaders were obsolete thirty years ago.

Senator MATHESON.—But what do we find in the eastern States? We find that provision is made for 56,691 men in all, 28,000 of whom are in Victoria, and can be moved about by rail from one State to another. Honorable senators are agreeable to make adequate provision for the defence of their own States, but when it comes to the defence of Western Australia, the matter is of no importance.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable senator think that is done designedly?

Senator MATHESON.—I do not suppose that it has been done deliberately, but it seems to have been a matter of complete indifference to Ministers of Defence that Western Australia ought to be defended. That I do say without fear of contradiction, and the proof of it is seen in the remarkable disparity between the provision made for Western Australia and for the eastern States.

Senator DRAKE.—Has the honorable senator worked out the provision in proportion to the population?

Senator MATHESON.—What has population got to do with the necessity for defence? It is locality that matters. It is the wealth that can be taken out of the country. It is the danger to the whole of Australia if Western Australia were seized and held by a foe. What have those considerations got to do with the relative number of men in the various States? I suppose Senator Drake would say that, as there were so many hundreds of people in one State, and so many hundreds of thousands in another, therefore, there ought to be ten men and a captain in Western Australia, and tens of thousands in other States. The Commonwealth has not contracted to defend the States in proportion to population. The contract is to defend the States regardless of population. Honorable senators will find the provision in section 119 of the Constitution.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It does not use the words “regardless of population.”

Senator MATHESON.—Would Senator Sir Josiah Symon maintain that defence is to pay regard to population? The section to which I allude says—

The Commonwealth shall protect every State against invasion.

I quote that to emphasize the fact that Major-General Hutton says that it is impossible, under existing conditions, to defend Western Australia. And that is all the attention that the Commonwealth pays to our necessities in the West! The very scheme of defence that has been outlined, shows the absurdity of the whole business. When I came to look into this question, I found the following facts:—That our mounted infantry in Western Australia is brigaded for defence purposes with the mounted infantry of South Australia. That is to say, in time of war, they would be under one brigade staff. As a matter of fact, at the present moment, our infantry in Western Australia is brigaded with the infantry of Queensland, South Australia, and Tasmania. To have an effective field force under a mobilization scheme, you would have to bring all these regiments together under one commanding staff. I should like to ask how that is likely to be done effectually. That is another question that the Council of Defence would have to go into. The very basis of the Defence Forces of the Commonwealth would have to be reconsidered. The constitution of our defences is, as a matter of fact, based upon the idea of a force leaving Australia. It is based upon an offensive, not upon a defensive scheme. It is only under an offensive idea that the scheme becomes at all practicable, and then I question whether it could be carried out in an efficient way.

Senator DAWSON.—The proposal is that each State Commandant shall have representation on the Council of Defence.

Senator MATHESON.—It would be a difficult thing to have the States Commandants as members of the Council; though their advice should be asked for if necessary. I should like to read what Major-General Hutton had to say about organization, because then the Senate may judge how far he has been successful in carrying out his own schemes. In his report, dated the 1st of May, 1903, Major-General Hutton says—

The organization provides for the adequate local defence of the various States, and also for a sufficient field force for active operations in defence of the whole Commonwealth. The conditions governing the defence of Australia are thus satisfactorily dealt with so far as organization is concerned.

The invasion of Australia for purposes of territorial aggression is under certain possible circumstances a military undertaking of no serious difficulty, but it could, and would only be, undertaken by a large force of the most highly-trained and best equipped troops, which an enemy or combination of enemies could place in the field. Military operations against such a foe could only be successfully carried out by troops well organized, ably led, and thoroughly equipped.

Under the circumstances that I have shown in connexion with the defences of Western Australia, can it be, for one instant, held by any reasonable man that the organization provides for the adequate local defence of that State? The conclusion is inevitable, that there must be some body, apart from political parties, to deal with defence matters—some body responsible and reporting to Parliament direct. In no other way shall we ever get any efficient defence organization. There is a great deal more that I should like to say, but I observe that it is now after mid-day, and I shall draw my remarks to a conclusion. I hope that what I have said is sufficient to convince honorable senators that unless the Government are prepared to constitute a proper Council of Defence some steps should be taken to force their hands.

Senator O'KEEFE (Tasmania).—One of the matters mentioned in the statement of the Government policy unfolded to us by the Attorney-General the other day is of particular importance to representatives of other States beyond those of Western Australia and South Australia. We have heard a good deal about the proposed Transcontinental Railway, but until I know more as to the practicability of the scheme—of the total cost, and as to the possibility or probability of the railway paying working expenses, if not the interest on cost of construction—I shall certainly not feel justified in voting for even an expenditure of £20,000 for the proposed survey.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That was part of the policy of the late Government, and surely the honorable senator is not going to repudiate that policy now?

Senator O'KEEFE.—I did not say that I was in favour of the proposal when the late Government were in power. I was a supporter of the late Government in, I suppose, practically all their policy; and it does not lie well in the mouth of the Attorney-General to suggest inconsistency on my part, seeing that he himself does not swallow everything which the present Government proposes.

Senator FINDLEY.—And, at any rate, Senator O'Keefe's remarks show that the Labour Party are not a bound party.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is so. My position shows the hollowness of the charge that the Labour Party are a bound party.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—All they are bound to, is what they are bound to.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is so; and the terms of the bond are publicly stated, so that they may be known by all. This scheme for a Transcontinental Railway is of prime importance to the smaller States. I hope I am as true a federalist as any man in this or the other chamber, but in a matter involving immense expenditure, it is the duty of representatives of the smaller States to see that the interests of those States are properly conserved. Tasmania staggers under a national debt, not so large as that of other States, but still large enough, and most of it has been incurred in connexion with the building of railways. Then, again, half the annual revenue of Tasmania is required to pay the interest on that national debt, and it seems rather unfair to the taxpayers of the small States, that they should be called upon to contribute towards the cost of a railway, the most direct benefits of which will go to Western Australia and South Australia. I do not say for a moment that this great railway will not prove of considerable convenience to all the States in providing quicker transit for mails and passengers; but no one can deny that the two States I have mentioned will benefit more than any of the other States of the Commonwealth. I think we are quite justified in looking at the project from this point of view, without laying ourselves open to the charge of being anti-Federalists. I now understand from the speech of Senator Matheson, and from interjections by Senator Pearce, and other Western Australian representatives, that the Government of that State have made a magnanimous offer. I knew that some offer had been made, but I thought that all it amounted to was that the Western Australian Government would make up any loss in interest on the cost of construction, or take a fair share of any loss, as divided between that State and South Australia. However, I am glad to hear from Senator Matheson that the offer made by the late Premier of Western Australia is that all loss as between the earnings of the line and the working expenses, plus interest on the cost of construction, will be guaranteed by Western Australia for some period of years. If that be the case, no representative of any State need have much objection to supporting an expenditure of £20,000 for a survey.

Senator MATHESON.—What I said was that that is the offer, so far as I knew.

Senator GUTHRIE.—The only offer is that of Western Australia to indemnify South Australia for any loss.

Senator O'KEEFE.—But where would the other States "come in"?

Senator GUTHRIE. — The other States would pay.

Senator O'KEEFE.—We require some more information before we agree to the proposal for a survey of this line, and it has been suggested by Senator Pearce that we shall also have some details as to the water supply along the route. If the expenditure of £20,000 is undertaken for a survey, I presume that the construction of the line will follow. If the two States which are most directly concerned, and which will benefit most from the construction of the line, were willing to give to the taxpayers of other States some guarantee to make up even a portion of the loss, the representatives of those other States might be willing to come to some arrangement. Failing this guarantee, however, States with big public debts ought not to be asked to assist in building a railway to connect Western Australia and South Australia; and that is a view which I think cannot be regarded as anti-Federal. We have heard a great deal as to the reasons why the late Government were turned out of office. I do not wish to go into matters which might involve personalities, but I am justified in asking the reason for the delay there has been in Federal legislation for the last five or six months. Why is it that, although Parliament has been in session for six months, we have done so little business? I am sorry to say that, in my opinion, the whole of the blame must be laid at the door of Mr. Deakin. I admire that gentleman, not only for his charming personality, but his splendid abilities. I also admired Mr. Deakin for his statesmanship, but that admiration has ceased after what has recently occurred. Mr. Deakin likened the political position to three elevens in the cricket field, but I think his simile most unfortunate.

In the first place, it is impossible for three elevens to play together, and, in the second place, it is Mr. Deakin who has made legislation impossible during the last few months. What was the object of Mr. Deakin in taking the course he did, and how was his object achieved? His desire was to evolve two parties out of the three parties in Parliament; but surely Mr. Deakin was aware that for all practical purposes there were then only two parties in Parliament. He had known for three years that what was known as the third party had supported him and worked with him in the interests of the whole of Australia. What Mr. Deakin has succeeded in doing is to evolve four parties out of the three. It may be admitted that two of the parties sit on one side, and the other two on the other side, but each is a distinct party. Mr. Deakin has not been able to merge his protectionist followers in the free-traders; and the Labour Party, on the other hand, are certainly not merging their individuality in that of the Liberal or Radical Protectionists' wing. We have, however, formed an honorable working alliance, as the other two parties have done, for a term. On the part of Mr. Deakin there was a dream—or perhaps it had better be called a nightmare—as to the impossibility of carrying on constitutional government with three parties in the House of Representatives. He regarded the position as intolerable.

Senator PULSFORD.—So it was.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Is the position not as intolerable to-day, when there are four parties? As politicians, we must come down from the clouds to which Mr. Deakin has soared, and admit that for all practical purposes there were only two parties—that is, that the Labour Party and the Deakin Government were for all practical purposes one party. The alliance might not have been reduced to writing, but it was tacitly acknowledged by the people of Australia in the interests of progressive legislation. On the other hand, about one-third of the Parliament, representing, possibly, not one-third of the people of Australia, were banded together under Mr. Reid to stop progressive legislation.

Senator DRAKE.—It was the Labour Party which put out the Deakin Government.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Senator Drake knows very well that it was not the Labour Party which put out the Deakin Government. Had it not been for the most treacherous political act we have seen in the Federal Parliament—the act of the men behind Mr. Reid—the Government would not have gone out.

Senator PULSFORD.—What treacherous act?

Senator O'KEEFE.—I do not see why a representative of New South Wales should ask that question. Some of the honorable senator's colleagues in another place stood on the floor of the House and shamelessly announced to the country that they were going to break the pledges they had given to the electors, their only reason being that Mr. Deakin considered vital a certain clause in the Arbitration Bill.

Senator DRAKE.—What Mr. Deakin said was that he would not consent to an amendment.

Senator O'KEEFE.—But for this political treachery, would the Government have been turned out? Did not Mr. Reid stand on the floor of the House and say that he agreed with Mr. Deakin that the inclusion of State servants under the Bill was unconstitutional and an infringement of States' rights? The present Prime Minister on that occasion turned his portly form round and said, "I am not going to cast black looks at any of my followers if they think otherwise." A number of them thought as Mr. Reid did, but they voted differently, announcing that they would break their pledges in order to displace Mr. Deakin, and make Mr. Reid Prime Minister. It is with politicians of that class that he finds himself associated to-day, and no one is more sorry for the fact than I am. At the last general election the people deliberately returned three parties. What mandate did Mr. Deakin then get from the people of Australia to come into this Parliament only a few months later, and cause all this hubbub, which is almost certain to lead to another general election within a very short time, and at a cost of £60,000 to the taxpayers?

Senator DRAKE.—Then we shall get two parties.

Senator O'KEEFE.—We may not get two parties then. What mandate, I repeat, had Mr. Deakin to cause the loss of all this time, and the expenditure of all this money, when the electors had deliberately sent in three parties, knowing when they did so that for all practical purposes two of them were working together as one? When Senator McGregor was speaking yesterday about Mr. Deakin's action, Senator Drake interjected that the Labour Party had not said so and so prior to the late general election.

Senator DRAKE.—I thought he was attacking Mr. Deakin.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Whom have the late leader of Senator Drake and the protectionists in the present Coalition Government to thank for having put their Tariff on the statute-book? Have they to thank their present allies or their present opponents? The members of the Labour Party are twitted with being divided on the fiscal question. We do not make fiscalism the be-all and end-all of our politics, or the first plank in our platform. We put social legislation above fiscalism. I as a protectionist am very glad to be able to say that it was the protectionist members of the Labour Party who made it possible for us to have a protectionist Tariff. Will Senator Drake deny that?

Senator DRAKE.—Certainly not. It was not treated by them as a party question.

Senator O'KEEFE.—What happened when the Barton Government sent up their Tariff to the Senate which was almost evenly divided on the fiscal question? In their hour of trouble, when they wanted every vote which they could fairly look upon as their own, they found that Senator Fraser from Victoria, and Senator Douson from Tasmania, who had been returned to support their policy, were going over to the other side on almost every division. It was the presence of six protectionists in the Labour Party of eight senators, which made it possible for the Barton Government to get their Tariff through the Senate. Senator de Largie and I took a big political risk in voting for the Tariff, but we believed in protection, although it had not been made the first plank in our platform. The Barton Government were deserted not by the members of the Labour Party, but by two honorable senators who had been returned to support the whole of their policy. Yet the Deakin Party deserted the Labour Party and embraced the gentlemen who had bitterly fought them on every measure of progressive politics.

Senator DRAKE.—The honorable senator says that we deserted the Labour Party because we would not accept an amendment which they moved in our Bill.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The Deakin Party deserted a party which was always admitted to be their natural allies, not because they would not accept an amendment in that Bill, but because after that amendment was out of the way, an agreement or understanding between the two parties was broken by Mr. Deakin.

Senator DRAKE.—I thought that we were beaten on that amendment.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is so; but what did Mr. Deakin do after he had asked the Labour Party to form an honorable alliance with his party? Before his natural allies could consider his offer he asked the other party to join his party.

Senator DRAKE.—He said openly that he would receive proposals from either party.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Does the honorable and learned senator deny that before Mr. Deakin had received a reply from his natural allies he consented to a programme for a projected coalition, and put his name to it? At the time when he signed that programme he knew perfectly well that the Labour Party had not had time to meet and to consider whether they should form the working alliance which he had proposed.

Senator DRAKE.—Not time to consider the proposal! I forget how long they had; but I know that it was a long time.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I do not forget how long it was. Before Mr. Deakin went out of office, towards the end of April, he came to an honorable understanding with Mr. Watson that they both had to pursue their policy up to the breaking point, even if it involved his resignation, and keep their pledges to the electors quite irrespective of what some of the Reidites intended to do. But said Mr. Deakin, "After this clause is out of the way, then will be the time for this natural alliance to commence." Well, towards the end of April, Mr. Watson was sent for and formed his Government, and when he asked for an adjournment to the 18th of May, Mr. Deakin made a speech, in which he talked about giving the Government fair play. But what happened? Mr. Deakin knew perfectly well that the third party, with which he was willing to ally himself—

Senator FRASER.—On certain conditions, of course.

Senator O'KEEFE.—What were his conditions?

Senator FRASER. — That they would waive certain things.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I beg the honorable senator's pardon, Mr. Deakin did not say anything about that at that time. He said he was willing to consult with either party as to the possibility of forming an alliance, and he added that the working alliance could only commence after a certain event had occurred—that is after a vital clause in the Bill had been considered. He knew very well that it was quite impossible for the members of our party to meet until the 17th or 18th of May. And yet in the face of that fact he took the leader of the other party into a small cottage in Richmond, and allowed himself to be drawn into a coalition of another kind. I blame Mr. Deakin not for having coalesced with the Reid party, but for having broken his understanding with the leader of the men whom he had described as his natural allies.

Senator DRAKE.—Was not the condition that there should be one party?

Senator O'KEEFE.—The only condition was that the two parties should meet and try to come to some honorable working alliance.

Senator DRAKE.—As one party.

Senator O'KEEFE.—It does not matter whether it was to be as one party or not. But supposing that condition was made, no one can deny that Mr. Deakin knew that his proposal could not be considered by the Labour Party until the 17th of May. Ten days before that date, however, he had drawn up and signed a programme for a coalition with another party. That was not fair political dealing.

Senator KEATING.—He had not done anything of the kind. He had consented to submit certain conditions which had been agreed upon by two of them, to their respective parties.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I accept the correction, although I do not see that it makes very much difference. My complaint against Mr. Deakin is that many days before it was possible for his proposal to be considered by his natural allies he drew up a programme for a coalition with Mr. Reid to submit to his own party.

Senator KEATING.—And he could not have refused to do it.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Does the honorable and learned senator say that Mr. Deakin did not try his hardest to get his party to accept the programme for the coalition?

Senator KEATING.—Yes.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Well, if he did not make the trial then he did a few days afterwards.

Senator KEATING.—He left it absolutely to his party to act.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Where does Mr. Deakin find himself to-day?

Senator DRAKE.—His object was to get rid of the three parties.

Senator O'KEEFE.—One result of his action has been that he has got a fourth party. A second result will be a loss of £60,000 to the Commonwealth, the cost of a general election, and a third result will be a delay of five or six months in passing useful legislation. I ask Senator Keating to consider whether even on fiscal grounds Mr. Deakin could not ally his party more naturally with the party which helped him to get his Tariff put through the Senate, after Senator Fraser, who was returned as a supporter, deserted him.

Senator FRASER.—I did not.

Senator O'KEEFE.—On a number of the most vital items in the Tariff the honorable senator broke his political pledges.

Senator FRASER.—Give me an instance of it?

Senator O'KEEFE.—The struggle over the Tariff was marked by many such instances. I cannot pick out a particular case at random. But I remember reading in a newspaper that the honorable senator attended a meeting of free-traders, and said that he was against the Barton Government.

Senator FRASER.—I attended a meeting in opposition to the then Government, but not as a free-trader.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable senator came here as a supporter of the Barton Government, and I presume of all their policy.

Senator FRASER.—I did not. I was opposed all along to the construction of the Transcontinental Railway, and to other proposals as well.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I understood, from the Age, that the honorable senator was a strong supporter of the Barton Government. At any rate, it had a good deal to do with putting him into the Senate.

Senator FRASER.—So had the Argus, and so had my personal canvass.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Did the Argus claim the honorable senator as a free-trader?

Senator FRASER.—No, it could not.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Did the honorable senator say he was a free-trader?

Senator FRASER.—I did not.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Did the honorable senator promise to give a general support to the Barton Government?

Senator FRASER.—To their policy as announced at that time.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Now we are getting down to the truth.

Senator FRASER.—They did not announce rabid protection.

Senator O'KEEFE.—What nonsense the honorable senator talks. They announced a policy of revenue without destruction. They announced that no existing industries should be destroyed.

Senator FRASER.—And I did not give one vote to destroy an existing industry.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable senator came in as a supporter of the Barton Government, and I suppose of their general policy, but when they were in difficulties here he deserted them.

Senator FRASER.—I did not come in as a caucus man, but as a free independent representative.

Senator MCGREGOR.—That is a lie.

The PRESIDENT.—Order! The honorable senator must withdraw that remark.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I shall not withdraw the remark, because you, sir, allowed Senator Millen yesterday to say something of that kind to Senator Henderson.

The PRESIDENT.—Senator Millen did not say exactly the same thing. I think that the honorable senator should not use such language as that here. I admit that Senator Fraser had no right to interject. He was being attacked, and, of course, it was very difficult for him to refrain from making an explanation, but I think that Senator McGregor ought to withdraw the remark he used.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I made the remark with the express purpose of getting a ruling from you, sir, different from that which you gave yesterday.

The PRESIDENT.—Perhaps the ruling which I gave yesterday was not a well considered one. I do not think that the use of language such as the honorable senator has given utterance to ought to be permitted in the Senate.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Nor do I.

The PRESIDENT.—I ask the honorable senator to withdraw the remark.

Senator MCGREGOR.—I withdraw the remark because I know that it is right that it should be withdrawn, and I hope that whenever another honorable senator contravenes the rules in the same way, he will be called to order by the Chair.

Senator O'KEEFE.—We are merely talking politically now, and I am not making any personal attack upon any honorable senator.

Senator FRASER.—Then what is the honorable senator doing?

Senator O'KEEFE.—I am justifying the attitude of my party, and am trying to show that the present alliance is not a natural alliance. As for the honorable senator who interjects, I will say that he did not give the Barton Government anything like the assistance which they were entitled to expect from him when the Tariff was being passed.

Senator FRASER.—I do not object to that statement in the least, but I am entitled to hold my own view.

Senator O'KEEFE.—And the public of Australia are entitled to hold their view. That view has been pretty generally voiced since the honorable senator turned from being a protectionist to a free-trader, and announced himself as a straight-out supporter of Mr. Reid. But I am inclined to think that it was not so much a matter of free-trade and protection with him. What displeased him was that the Barton Government brought before Parliament legislation which he thought was introduced too soon. I refer specially to the legislation dealing with the kanakas.

Senator FRASER.—That was only a very small matter.

Senator O'KEEFE.—It seemed to be a large matter in Senator Fraser's estimation. He did not approve of the radical policy of the Barton Government, especially their White Australia policy.

Senator FRASER.—I did, and do now.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Senator Fraser would put the kanakas back in Queensland to-morrow, if he could.

Senator FRASER.—I would allow the State to deal with the matter.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Is it not a fact that Senator Fraser would repeal the Pacific Island Labourers Act, if he could?

Senator FRASER.—I would allow the kanaka question to remain as it was for a few years and test the matter.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I am entitled to believe, from the honorable senator's actions, that it was because he did not like the White Australia policy of the Barton Government, that he became an out-and-out free-trader.

Senator FRASER.—There were other matters of far more importance that I objected to.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I had the honour to be on the platform at Ballarat when Mr. Deakin delivered his Ministerial pronouncement to the country, and when he justified the action of his Government for the past three years. It had never been my pleasure, and I suppose it never will be my pleasure again, to hear a finer speech from an oratorical point of view. I was charmed in listening to Mr. Deakin for two hours, while he delivered that speech on the 29th October last. But let me quote a passage from it. Mr. Deakin said—

Free-traders have hitherto resented the appellation of "foreign traders." Their affection for the mother country has disappeared. They are also creatures of inconsistency. They favour treaties containing the most favoured nation provisions, but we must not make most favoured nation provisions with our own flesh and blood. They believe in reciprocity, provided it is not with citizens who live under the same flag. For the sake of foreign traders they are prepared to sacrifice all. Is it national trade or foreign trade? "National trade," says the Ministry—"Foreign trade," says the Opposition.

But since then Mr. Deakin has allied himself with the Coalition Ministry. He has refused to join it, but nevertheless he supports it. He puts himself in the position of the poor old gentleman who, hearing a burglar down stairs at night, went down with his wife, pushing her in front of him, and saying "You go first"—staying behind himself. While pushing Sir George Turner and Mr. McLean into the Coalition Ministry, Mr. Deakin says he has not sufficient faith in it to enter it himself.

Senator PULSFORD.—He never said that.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is what his actions say; and actions speak louder than words.

Senator DRAKE.—Why misrepresent things like that? The honorable senator can draw any inference he likes, but he ought not to attribute language to Mr. Deakin.

Senator O'KEEFE.—If that does not represent Mr. Deakin's attitude, I am in a quandary.

Senator DOBSON.—He stated distinctly what he meant—that he did not want to be in the position of opposing his late colleagues or his late party.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Where is he now? Has he not said repeatedly that he is going to give a loyal support to Mr. Reid, who is being opposed by a section of Mr.

Deakin's late party? He is sitting in opposition to more men who supported him for the last three and a half years than can be found on his own side of the House. Without dealing at any great length with the reasons given for removing the late Government from office, I wish briefly to mention that, in my opinion, in the first place, the whole of the trouble sprang out of the resignation of Mr. Deakin over a detail in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. I take the view that, in that case, the then Prime Minister was absolutely wrong in making that detail vital to the life of his Government. It was not properly in accordance with the meaning of constitutional government, that a cabinet should go out of office on such a detail of a Bill. Of course, we are aware that there was a great difference of opinion on the point, and that, unfortunately, Mr. Deakin had practically pledged himself to resist the inclusion of State or railway servants. We are aware that the Labour Party went to the country and made the inclusion of those servants a point in its programme. We are also aware of the political treachery which marked the conduct of some of Mr. Reid's supporters in the House of Representatives. When Mr. Deakin decided to make the issue vital, he was the judge of his own actions, but the country and Parliament thought he was wrong. Now we come to a rather interesting stage of the question. When the Watson Government, in consequence of the advice which Mr. Deakin gave to the Governor-General, came into power, they took up the Arbitration Bill at the stage at which it had been dropped. What happened? We find that Mr. Deakin and, unfortunately, several of his late colleagues, voted repeatedly against important provisions in that Bill. Certainly Mr. Deakin himself supported the Watson Government to a certain extent. But it is worth while remembering that Sir Philip Fysh, Mr. Chapman, Sir John Forrest, and Sir George Turner by way of a pair—making four out of a Cabinet of eight—voted for almost every amendment proposed by the Opposition, which included a large number of those who were absolutely opposed to an Arbitration Bill in any form. In view of these facts, what about the cry of minority rule? That cry which has been raised against the Labour Party may very well be applied to those members of the Deakin Government. We can only infer, as four members of that Government voted against clause after clause of the Bill, that when that Bill was being considered in Cabinet there was strong opposition to its provisions, and that it was only by a minority vote that it was allowed to be introduced.

Senator DRAKE.—A minority?

Senator O'KEEFE.—Yes. I hope that for the enlightenment of the people of this country upon this Bill—which has wrecked two Governments and is going to wreck a third very shortly—and for the credit of himself and his late colleagues, Senator Drake will not sit silent during the debate, but will inform the Senate what really took place in connexion with the Arbitration Bill.

Senator DRAKE.—Does the honorable senator mean what took place in Cabinet?

Senator O'KEEFE.—No; but I hope that Senator Drake will enlighten us about the conduct of four out of eight members of the Deakin Government, who, when the Bill was in charge of a succeeding Government, voted against clause after clause of it. Four out of eight members of the Deakin Government have shown themselves to be opposed to nearly every clause of the Bill, showing that they were opposed to that measure when it was being considered by their own Government, and that it was not the product of a majority of the Cabinet. If that be not the explanation, then those four members were wreckers, and immediately turned a somersault and voted against their own convictions. Either they voted in Cabinet against their convictions in allowing the Bill to be introduced, or, when they were out of power and another Government took up the Bill, they voted against their convictions when they opposed all its principal clauses.

Senator DRAKE.—There is always a difference of opinion in regard to details in connexion with every important measure.

Senator O'KEEFE.—But how many members of the Deakin Cabinet were in favour of the Arbitration Bill from the beginning? Apparently not a majority.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator's party have already declared that they are going to wreck the Bill if they cannot have their own way.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I leave the question with this further remark: that, with reference to the question of preference to unionists a great deal has been heard, and much more will be heard when the measure comes before the Senate. I feel sure that there is a majority of members of the Senate who are genuinely in favour of arbitration, and that there is a sufficient majority in favour of preference. Without preference to unionists, the Bill is absolutely useless. Without it Mr. Deakin, when asked for bread in the shape of industrial peace, gave us a stone in the shape of industrial strife, which is bound to occur if Mr. McCay's amendment remains in the Bill. It is only fair that members of the Labour Party should be allowed to say one or two words in reply to the old charge of Socialism which is hurled against us. Have honorable senators read the words which were uttered by the present Prime Minister only last week, when addressing a gathering of farmers in Melbourne? The quotation was used last night in another place, but it is worth repeating, because it cannot be too widely known what are the real views of the head of the present Government, who is constantly railing against the Labour Party, who, he says, are Socialists. Mr. Reid, on the occasion referred to, said—

I believe it is a true ideal of politics to use the national power in every conceivable way to advance the happiness of the community.

What greater evidence of Socialism has any member of the Labour Party ever given?

Senator CLEMONS.—That is the sort of Socialist the honorable senator ought to be.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is the sort of Socialist I am, and the sort of Socialist which every member of the Labour Party is. I do not object to be called a Socialist; but I claim the right to say what particular brand of Socialist I shall be called. I belong to that brand of Socialism which would nationalize or municipalize any public service, as soon as that service, in the hands of a private individual or syndicate, becomes a menace to the welfare of the community.

Senator CLEMONS.—Are fixed deposits in banks a menace to the community?

Senator O'KEEFE.—Certainly not.

Senator CLEMONS.—But the Labour Party proposed to get hold of those deposits.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable senator is just as much a Socialist as I am, because I am sure he would not now approve of handing over our railways, our posts and telegraphs, our hospitals, our water supply to the control of private individuals or syndicates. One of the most striking instances of successful municipal ownership is found in the city of Launceston, from which the honorable and learned senator comes. At the very front door of that city is provided a magnificent water power, which is, and has been for some time, utilized by the local authority to generate electricity for lighting the streets and the houses of the citizens. Would Senator Clemons be pleased if that water power had, some years ago, been placed under the control of a private syndicate, which was then seeking to acquire it by Act of Parliament?

Senator CLEMONS.—I may say that I am not full of admiration for State-owned railways, if I may judge of these by the measure of their success.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Would the honorable and learned senator prefer to see that lighting service owned municipally or owned by a private syndicate?

Senator CLEMONS.—As the service is being run at present, it is very well.

Senator O'KEEFE.—It is one of the most successful instances of Socialism we have in Australia. The honorable and learned senator is a keen opponent of Socialism, who loses no opportunity of criticising the Labour Party in very strong terms; but I think that in his heart he feels glad that his own city was wise enough to municipalize this service.

Senator CLEMONS.—So long as it is well managed, I shall not quarrel with it.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is all we ask.

Senator CLEMONS.—The honorable senator asks a great deal more.

Senator O'KEEFE.—We propose to convert only such services as are used by the community, and are likely to become a menace or an inconvenience to people while in private hands. That is the sort of Socialist that Senator Clemons is, and all his sophistry, argument, and eloquence cannot relieve him from his admission that the people of Launceston have done a good thing.

Senator CLEMONS.—I have not admitted that far. I admit that at the present time the service seems to be well managed, and, therefore, I approve of it.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Can the honorable senator show me a member of the Labour Party who says that such services should be other than well managed? Honorable senators can bring evidence in favour of Socialism or in favour of anti-Socialism, just as they think best suits their case.

Senator CLEMONS.—That is what the honorable senator is doing.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I have given a good instance of successful Socialism, and I am glad to have converted Senator Clemons.

Senator CLEMONS.—I am afraid the honorable senator has not quite succeeded in converting me.

Senator O'KEEFE.—In two years' time, possibly, when Senator Clemons and I fight the electors on separate platforms, I shall be able to point to the fact that I have converted him in some respects. I do not think that I need take up the time of the House by asking any anti-Socialists whether they are in favour of such services as have indicated being municipally or locally owned. It is the most empty and arrant humbug that we hear about the Socialism of the Labour Party ruining Australia. There is a kind of Socialism which appeals to some of the supporters behind the Premier, namely, the Socialism of which Mr. Walpole, the paid agitator of the Employers' Federation, is the advocate. The other day Mr. Walpole said that this Employers' Federation had by its action rendered the Factories Act harmless, and justified the existence of the organization. We are, therefore, justified in regarding Mr. Walpole, the representative of the federation, as one who believes that the conditions and conditions which existed prior to the introduction of the Factories Acts in this and other States should be allowed to continue — conditions which prevailed at a time when Tom Hood wrote his memorable Song of the Shirt. Is that the kind of anti-Socialism of which the Attorney-General or his leader approve? It is a kind of anti-Socialism which a number of the supporters of the Government in this other place approve. Let us see what a leading Melbourne paper says, for instance, in reference to the wages of dressmakers in the following paragraph, which is published under the headings, "Wages of Dressmakers," "Employers Dismiss Hands":

It appears that, as a result of the determination of the Wages Board in the dressmakers' trade, having come into force, a number of employers in some of the leading establishments have been dismissed. The scale fixed by the board appears to most people to be at least not a bad one—many will think it exceedingly low—and the employers and the trade consider it too low as a basis for the remuneration of their workpeople.

Let us see what the remuneration is—

The scale provides a wage of 2s. 6d. per week for the first year, 4s. 6d. for the second year, 7s. 6d. for the third year, 11s. for the fourth year, 14s. 6d. for the fifth year, and thereafter the minimum is 16s.

After a poor unfortunate girl has worked for five years she is allowed enough to enable her to keep herself from starvation, and cover herself with scanty rags, but not enough to enable her to keep herself in a decent state. That is the kind of anti-Socialism which is being advocated by the Walpoles and the Dobsons of the community.

Senator FRASER.—That is not true.

The PRESIDENT.—Order!

Senator O'KEEFE.—It is absolutely true. Is it the kind of anti-Socialism to which Senator Fraser subscribes?

Senator FRASER.—No.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I am glad to hear that, but he cannot deny that it is the kind of anti-Socialism which Mr. Walpole, and the organization he represents, advocate. The Employers' Federation, would like to abolish Factory Acts, Arbitration Acts, and all similar legislation. Will the Attorney-General, out of the plenitude of his knowledge and experience, tell me how by any possibility sweating can be prevented without such legislation?

Senator FRASER. — It was the Upper House which passed the Factories Act.

Senator PEARCE.—It was the Upper House which abolished the Factories Act, and reinstated it under public pressure.

Senator O'KEEFE.—One alleged reason for which the late Government was kicked out of office, without any charge against their administration, was that they represented minority rule. Here we are face to face with an interesting situation. Mr. Deakin said that the chief reason for the action taken was to bring about majority rule—a return to constitutional government. I apprehend that Mr. Deakin has achieved his desire in so far as there is a Government in power with a small majority.

Senator DRAKE.—That is a commencement.

Senator O'KEEFE. — Does Senator Drake say that they have majority rule now?

Senator DRAKE.—Yes.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Then I ask Senator Drake and his colleagues whether the Government are going to carry out their ideal. Are they going to alter the Arbitration Bill in accordance with their view, and strike out the provision including railway servants?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — What has that to do with the question?

Senator O'KEEFE.—That was the rock which wrecked the Government.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — Discuss something that is relevant.

Senator O'KEEFE.—My remarks are too relevant for the honorable and learned senator. If Mr. Reid and his present colleagues believed three months ago that it is wrong to include States servants—

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Labour Party abandoned the State servants.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The Deakin Government went out of office, and dropped the Bill because States servants were included, and because there was not majority rule—because the position was "intolerable." Now that they have majority rule, are the present Government going to strike out the clause including railway servants?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Labour Party were not "game" to take up the clause, but ignominiously abandoned it.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The Labour Party followed the wording of the Constitution, and would have been satisfied if that course had been followed by the Deakin Party.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Did the Labour Party not abandon the States servants?

Senator O'KEEFE.—No; and the honorable and learned member knows that the Labour Party did not do so. All that the Labour Party did was to alter the phrasing of the clause—to first provide for railway servants, and then for all States servants who are engaged in industrial occupation. Does not the word "industrial" occur in the Constitution, and is it not the correct word to use? Mr. Reid told the Governor-General that he could get a majority with which to carry on the business of the country. Mr. Reid is going to do one of two things—he is either going to send up an Arbitration Bill, in which he does not believe, or he is going to suffer a defeat; and I think I know what he will do rather than meet the latter. I do not believe the present Government is "game" to put the question to the test in order to ascertain whether they have majority rule, after all their trouble. Another reason urged against the Labour Government was that the members of the party are professional politicians. If our experience in Australia, during the last three years of the professional and amateur politician is to be taken as a criterion—if we have to contrast the attendance and the work done by those politicians in both Houses—then it seems to me that the professional politician is the better servant for the people. Who are the loudest in the denunciation of professional politicians? Mr. Bruce Smith, Mr. Norman Cameron, and one or two others in another place, who have the worst record for attendance. They draw their monthly cheque for only a few days' work. There are some honorable senators who have spoken here against the professional politician; but they are gentlemen who attend only occasionally, perhaps a day now and again, or for an hour or two in a day, when something of importance to them or to their friends is before the Senate. Week after week, and month after month, during the last three and a half years, the amateur politician has refused to sit here continuously doing the work of the country, although he was returned to do that work, but he has had no scruples about drawing £33 6s. 8d. per month as payment for doing it. But let us get away from the personal point of view, and look at the matter from a broader basis. Would any business man intrust the management of a large Department to an amateur? Would he not rather pick out a professional, a man who was competent to take charge because of his training, his special knowledge, his attention to affairs, and his diligence? Surely if that principle holds good in the management of private businesses, it should hold good in the management of the affairs of the country. The cry about professional politicians injuring the country is an empty one. One of the reasons why it is alleged that the existence of the Labour Party is inimical to the interests of Australia is that it is driving capital from the country. Senator Fraser has said that on more than one occasion.

Senator FRASER.—And it is destroying capital in the country, too. It is doing two bad things.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Let us examine the statement by means of statistics. I find that the Colonial Sugar Refining Company last half-year paid a dividend of 10 per cent., and the Colonial Bank of Australia a dividend of 5 per cent. The London Bank of Australia has this year paid a dividend of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., its first dividend since the great bank smashes of 1892. Twenty Australian banks are now on the dividend list, and are doing better to-day than during any other period since the bank failures.

Senator FRASER.—The honorable senator knows very little about banking.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I have taken my figures, not from the Worker, or any other labour organ, but from the Sydney Daily Telegraph, a newspaper which has never had much to say in favour of the Labour Party. During the March quarter the New South Wales banks increased their deposits on current accounts by £950,000, and their coin and bullion by £675,000, while there was a reduction in advances of £850,000. Yet this was done during a period in which there were labour parties in existence in all the States of Australia, with the exception of Tasmania.

Senator CLEMONS.—Does the honorable senator regard a reduction in advances as a sign of prosperity?

Senator O'KEEFE.—It is certainly not a sign of depression that people can afford to reduce the advances made to them by the banks.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is the other way about. The banks are reducing their advances.

Senator O'KEEFE.—A reduction of overdrafts does not mean depression.

Senator GRAY.—Yes, it may.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Then, to be logical, the honorable member would assert that Australia would be in a prosperous condition if every business man had an overdraft.

Senator CLEMONS.—When advances are reduced it is a sign that the employment for capital has decreased.

Senator FRASER.—The honorable senator's figures do not prove anything at all.

Senator O'KEEFE.—They are figures compiled by Mr. Nash, a recognised financial authority, and financial editor of the Sydney Daily Telegraph. It would take a great deal from this side of the Chamber to prove anything to Senator Fraser.

Senator FRASER.—Read what Mr. Nash wrote about Mr. Watson's proposed banking system.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I am not discussing that matter now; but if the late Prime Minister had remained in office for a few months longer he would have converted Mr. Nash to his scheme, as he would have converted the people of Australia to it. To quote from another financial newspaper, the Financial Record, seven life assurance companies show a net expansion of business during last year of £3,163,117. It will not be denied by any reasonable man that the expansion of life assurance business may be taken as evidence of increased prosperity. Then I find that Tooth and Co., a big Sydney brewery, made a net profit for last year of £61,942, and declared a dividend of 8 per cent.

Senator CLEMONS. — Senator Pearce would not consider that a sign of prosperity.

Senator O'KEEFE. — Senator Pearce is a genuine teetotaler, and all honour to him for it. But even Senator Clemons will admit that the amount of money spent upon drink is generally regarded by financial experts as in some measure an index to the prosperity or depression of a community. If men have not money to spare, they cannot spend it on drink; but when there is a good deal of surplus money some of it will be spent on drink.

Senator GRAY. — The breweries have decreased in value by 15 per cent. during the last fifteen months.

Senator O'KEEFE. — That is because there is too much competition; but well-managed institutions, whose manufactures have a good name, have not declined.

Senator GRAY. — The value of Tooth and Co.'s business, which is the best in Australia, has gone down 15 per cent.

Senator O'KEEFE. — Well, last year that business made a large profit, and declared a dividend of 8 per cent. Then the Australian Agricultural Company, which has large landed properties —

Senator DE LARGIE. — And coal mines.

Senator O'KEEFE. — Yes. It made a profit of £60,000 in the half-year, and paid a dividend of 25s. a share. As the shareholders are absentees, I think that that company would be "fair game" for an absentee tax.

Senator CLEMONS. — The companies to which the honorable senator has referred are conducted by private enterprise; but what profits have been made by the socialistically managed State railways?

Senator O'KEEFE. — The State railways are not run primarily to make profits, but to open up the country, and to indirectly increase the revenue. But I ask the honorable senator to contrast the State owned railways with the privately owned railways in Tasmania. Let him, too, contrast the privately owned tramways in Melbourne with the State owned tramways in Sydney. In Melbourne one is charged 3d. for riding merely from one street to another, unless one buys a shilling's worth of tickets, in which case the charge is 1½d.

Senator CLEMONS. — Is that all one can do here for 3d.? The charge for a five-mile ride is only as much.

Senator O'KEEFE. — In Sydney a ride from one street corner to another costs only 1d., or one can go as far for that coin as one can go here for 3d. Furthermore, one can get there what one does not often get on the Melbourne tramways, and that is civility.

The PRESIDENT. — Does the honorable senator think that this has anything to do with the policy of the Government?

Senator O'KEEFE. — I am giving instances which, in my opinion, show that the charges of Socialism hurled at the late Administration are empty charges, and that State control is in certain instances preferable to private control.

Senator GIVENS. — The only policy of the present Government is anti-Socialism.

Senator O'KEEFE. — Yes. If it were not for that policy, three or four of those who are now sitting behind them would not be supporting them. I have here a few figures which must appeal to our friends the anti-Socialists, and they are gathered at random from statistics supplied in Coghlan's book, which is the statistical bible common to us all. I find that in 1901 the deposits in banks, including savings banks and in building societies, where the information has been available, amounted to £44,954,947; and in 1903 they had increased to £47,065,620. It will be admitted that that is a very considerable increase, and Coghlan explains that on these lines the increase in those three years was larger than the increase in the previous ten years. I find further that in 1891 the number of depositors in savings banks was 158,426, and the aggregate amount of money deposited by them was £5,342,135. In 1903, thirteen years later, the number of depositors was 323,212, or more than double the number in 1891, whilst the amount deposited had increased to £12,425,464. It will be seen that the amount deposited was also doubled in the same period. I direct the attention of honorable senators to the fact that during the last ten years the Labour Party had more power in the New South Wales Parliament than in any other State, but in spite of the figures I have quoted we are being continually told that the Labour Party is driving capital out of the country.

Senator DE LARGIE. — And the figures quoted also cover years of drought, bank smashes, and all the rest of it.

Senator O'KEEFE.—So much for the charge that the Labour Party are driving capital out of the country. If the party at present in power be so nearly allied to the Labour Party in matters of Socialism, as shown by the utterances of Mr. Reid, and if it cannot be proved that they have driven capital out of the country, and, further, if the present Administration are not going to establish the majority rule for which they have fought, and if they are not going to bring to an end minority rule—and I do not think they will try to do so on the question of the inclusion of State servants in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill—what difference is there between their policy and the policy of the Labour Party? If there is no difference, I am entitled, on behalf of the people of Australia, who have to pay the piper, to ask what is the reason for the delay which has been caused by the change of Government, by the turning of one set of men off the Treasury bench, in order to allow another set of men to occupy their places to carry out the same policy?

Senator DOBSON.—They turned themselves off.

Senator O'KEEFE.—They went off, to the unutterable joy of the honorable and learned senator, and they went off on a matter of principle. It will be a good thing for parliamentary honour and dignity if the right honorable leader, for whom the honorable and learned senator has such a great admiration, proves to be equally scrupulous, and will retire, if defeated, on a principle of a Bill.

Senator GIVENS.—It will require a team of bullocks to drag the right honorable gentleman off.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Had the members of the present Ministry any charge to make against the administration of the late Government? Again, the answer is "no." Only the other day the present Prime Minister admitted that the late Government had left everything in apple-pie order, and the right honorable gentleman passed the highest encomiums on Mr. Watson for the manner in which he had grappled with the work of his Department, and on the fact that he had not only worked up arrears which had accumulated when he took office, but had left everything in apple-pie order.

Senator GRAY.—Hear, hear.

Senator O'KEEFE.—That is the general verdict of Australia. So much for Mr.

Watson in his capacity as Prime Minister. In his capacity as Treasurer we have it on the authority of Mr. Reid and his colleagues that Mr. Watson, by the application of intense energy, left matters connected with that Department in perfect order for his successor. Then with respect to Mr. Hughes, is there any charge against the administration by that honorable gentleman of the Department of External Affairs? Who was it that exposed the swindle of the fraudulent Chinese certificates? Who first burst up that practice which had probably been going on for some years in Australia, I do not say with the connivance of the Deakin and Barton Governments, but probably because there was not quite so much energy shown in the administration of the Department? Directly Mr. Hughes came into power he discovered the evil, or if he did not actually discover it he at all events grappled with it. In doing so he came into conflict with the State Premier of South Australia, and we know that some rather severe passages appeared in the press in connexion with the matter. Under the Constitution, where a State and a Commonwealth law come into conflict, the Commonwealth law must prevail. When the Premier of a State and the second in command in the late Commonwealth Ministry came into conflict the Commonwealth Minister prevailed; the Premier of South Australia had to admit that he was wrong, and he had to take a back seat. These instances show the capacity exhibited by the late Minister, and no charge has been levelled against his administration of his Department. Then we come to the Defence Department. I do not know whether it is next in order of precedence, but that does not matter.

Senator WALKER.—The Attorney-General.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The work of the Attorney-General is not patent to the public eye. I do not think that if we took a plebiscite of the people of Australia to-day, there would be a very large majority found voting to say that the late Minister of Defence made many mistakes in his Department. I believe that the majority of the people would say that he filled the bill very well, and possibly that he did better than any of his predecessors. The honorable senator was, at least, the first Minister in charge of that Department, who let one of the servants of the Commonwealth know that the Commonwealth is first, and that servants of the Commonwealth must obey. It was the late Minister of Defence who told the General Officer Commanding that he was not the ruler of the Defence Department of Australia, but was the servant of that Department. I could quote other instances to show that the late Minister of Defence was, at least, as well able to administer the Department as any of his predecessors, and I venture to say that he left it with the good will of the people of Australia, because no charge has been hurled against his administration. Then I come to deal with Mr. Mahon, as Postmaster-General. Has any other honorable gentleman who has occupied that high and responsible position, taken the same stand? Was it not Mr. Mahon who first put an end to all the frivolous nonsense in the Department whereby a subordinate officer, if he were a volunteer holding a higher rank than a man above him in the Department, could insist that his official superior should address him by his full military title? Who was it that put an end to all that nonsense, and declared that when volunteers came into the Department they came in to do the work of the Department for which they were paid, and had to leave behind them all the titles connected with their military calling.

Senator GIVENS.—All their military frill.

Senator O'KEEFE.—When they come to do the work of the Post Office Department now they are not colonels, captains, or anything else, but have to answer to their proper names. Again, who was it who upheld the right of the employés of the Department to organize, so that their united voice might be heard by the highest authority in a proper way? It was Mr. Mahon. In that matter the honorable gentleman came into conflict with the Deputy Postmaster-General of Victoria, and I think that, in the opinion of the people of Australia, the late Postmaster-General got considerably the best of his deputy in the argument. Again, who was the first Postmaster-General to declare that, so far as he or the Public Service Commissioner could have it done, the public servants of his Department should not any longer continue to victimize their tradesmen. We know that a very great deal of opposition was offered to Mr. Mahon's proposal to make it a misdemeanour for the servants of his Department to be continually dunned by their creditors during office hours. In thus compelling them to pay their just debts, the honorable gentleman did what was absolutely right in the interests of fair play to the tradesmen. Mr. Mahon is a member of a party who make it a vital plank of their platform to see that every man employed by the Government shall be paid a fair wage, which will enable him to pay his debts. If, after he has given a fair return, he is given a fair wage, so far as the Labour Party can do so, they are prepared to see that he shall pay his just debts. In that matter again Mr. Mahon showed that he had a grasp of the situation, and was well able to administer his Department. He probably administered it better than it had been administered before, and I may at least say that he administered it quite as well. No charge has been brought against his administration. I now come to the administration of the Home Affairs Department, by Mr. Batchelor. No sooner did the honorable gentleman take office than he started to grapple with its difficulties in a business-like way. He attended his office day after day for more than the regulation eight hours, in the endeavour to evolve from the chaos produced by the Commonwealth Electoral Act some state of order for the next elections. It was only to be supposed that passing an electoral law as we passed it, without full knowledge of the circumstances operating all over Australia, it would contain a number of defects. Those defects were made apparent at the last election, and all we could be expected to do was to try to remedy them. Directly Mr. Batchelor assumed office he grappled with the difficulty in a business-like way, with the result that the recommendations he has left on the subject are admitted by the present occupant of the office to be very valuable, and I think that they are certain to be adopted by him. I have said sufficient on the subject, and it is generally admitted, even by our opponents, that no charge can be brought against any member of the late Government in connexion with his administration of the Department committed to his care. In the circumstances, I may well ask why so much indecent haste was shown to turn the members of that Government out of office? It was certainly not because they were discourteous, or because they had not shown themselves to be honorable and fair-minded men. I intended to quote the opinion which Mr. Reid expressed of the Labour Party during the time when he was "in the hollow of their hand." But, if any inquiring person will refer to the pages of Hansard, he will find that Mr. Reid has placed on record the statement that he always found the members of the Labour Party imbued with the strictest integrity, the greatest impartiality, and the finest courtesy, and that they were absolutely fair in every respect.

It is only fair to say this, and it is one of the things which stand to the credit of the Labour Party, that during the whole of my five years' connexion with them in the Parliament of New South Wales they never endeavoured to intrigue themselves into office.

That is what he said on one occasion when he was passing a most eulogistic commendation of their work as a party.

Senator PULSFORD.—And they were very proud of his certificate.

Senator O'KEEFE.—No; we prefer to have the certificate of the people of Australia. We know that a certificate of the Prime Minister is not worth a snap of the fingers, because next week he is likely to say something else. I propose to quote what he said about some honorable senators, because it will make it all the more difficult for him to state what was the reason for his indecent haste in ejecting the Labour Party from the Treasury bench. I now come to the peculiar connexion between Mr. Reid and Mr. Deakin; and I propose to quote what Mr. Reid said about Mr. Deakin and all his colleagues, incidentally. Addressing a great meeting in the Melbourne Town Hall on the 30th October last, he said—

The Government introduced the Electoral Bill in the Senate with a provision for minority representation. That was the main provision of the measure. The Senate knocked it out. Then the Senate put in a provision against plumping. The other House removed it, and the changes were running between the two Houses, in which several Ministers voted in several ways during the several stages of the Bill. Mr. Deakin said last night that that Bill gave manhood and womanhood suffrage to Australia. I say that this Government, to serve its political interests, robbed hundreds and thousands of electors of their just rights. (Loud applause.)

Senator Clemons said the same thing in the Senate, and I am sure that he thinks it now, if he does not say it.

Senator CLEMONS.—And what did the honorable Senator do—did he join in the robbery?

Senator O'KEEFE.—I held a different opinion.

Senator CLEMONS.—How did the honorable senator vote?

Senator O'KEEFE.—I voted in the opposite direction to the honorable and learned senator, and gave reasons for my vote.

Senator CLEMONS.—Then I was the robber, I suppose?

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable and learned senator admits now that he did think what Mr. Reid said was true—that the Deakin Government, in order to serve their political interests, had robbed "hundreds and thousands of electors of their just rights."

Senator FRASER.—Did not the Government throw over the report of their own Commissioner?

Senator O'KEEFE.—Did not the right honorable gentleman, who made this charge of pure corruption against the Deakin Government, crawl to Mr. Deakin a few months afterwards, and whine to him for a coalition? And does he not sit on the Treasury bench to-day equal in all things with Mr. McLean—only a half Premier? Mr. Reid goes on to say—

If the friendless wretch in the criminal dock is told that he is supposed to know the law, and if he breaks it he is sent to gaol; if this Electoral Act makes it penal to corrupt an elector or interfere with his vote, I ask you what do you think of the conduct of those who break every duty they owe to the integrity of the political suffrage of Australia. (Cheers.)

That is what he said about Senator Drake, and Mr. Deakin, and all their colleagues.

Senator DRAKE.—No, that is a general remark.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Although Mr. Reid spoke in that way about those gentlemen only last December, still, to-day, they are willing to sit under the shadow of his portly form, and to be overwhelmed by him, and in a little while they will be swallowed.

Senator CLEMONS.—Is the honorable senator willing to recall what the Labour Party did on that occasion?

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable and learned senator will have an opportunity to recall that, as I have no doubt he will. I have quite enough to do at present to deal with the political sins of the Prime Minister.

Senator CLEMONS.—The honorable senator has more than enough to do to look after his own sins.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Mr. Reid goes on to say—

This nefarious act in the interests of one political party may be committed in the interests of another. Let us, while we stand on the brink of the momentous developments of this Australian nation, try to keep it from the political corruption we see in other great democracies. (Cheers.) My strongest charge against this Government is that they have broken their duty to the people, and broken the laws of the country for a selfish motive, and they have defiled and debased the ballot-box of Australia. (Applause.)

That is what Mr. Reid said in December; but, oh! how he loves Mr. Deakin to-day.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Almost as much as Mr. Mahon did.

Senator O'KEEFE.—How highly Mr. Reid admires Mr. McLean! He says that the interests of Victoria are safe in the hands of Mr. McLean and Mr. Deakin. As Mr. Hughes said at Ballarat the other night, how the python loves the little mild-eyed gazelle, when he slimes him over before he proceeds to swallow him. I feel sure that Senator Symon would like to hear one or two more statements that Mr. Reid made at that meeting.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Certainly; but they do not relate much to the policy now.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Yes, they do.

Senator CLEMONS.—Will the honorable senator tell us what Mr. Reid said about the Labour Party in that connexion?

Senator O'KEEFE.—For five years Mr. Reid had nothing but what was good to say about the Labour Party. So long as they were willing to keep him in power, and to be political fencers of wood, and drawers of water, they were a noble body, and even in England he preached about the merits and virtues of the Australian Labour Party. But when they wished to hew the wood, and draw the water for themselves, they became, in his estimation, another kind of party.

Senator CLEMONS.—Will the honorable senator tell us what Mr. Reid said about the Electoral Boundaries Act, in connexion with the Labour Party.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I wish to say that Mr. Reid has taken to his bosom one part of the combination which he stigmatized in this speech, because it has made him Prime Minister. He goes on to say—

Let me now deal with three measures which involve large questions of national policy. One was the Immigration Restriction Act. I believe in making that Act speak honestly and straightforwardly the determination of the Australian people that we should have a White Australia. (Cheers.) I stood side by side with the Labour Party on that occasion, but I was beaten. I think it was a hypocritical pretence when you wish to exclude coloured races to submit even your own countrymen to the language test.

When an elector interjected "but you did," Mr. Reid suddenly remembered that he had, but he said—

I did not; but if I did, I was very wicked. (Laughter.) There is one part of the Bill which provides that no one is to be admitted into Australia if there is a danger of his becoming a charge on the public funds. No one can object to that. But, at the dictation I have previously referred to, it was provided that another sort of person must be treated as a criminal—for that is what it really amounts to. The man who came with definite employment open to him, should be prohibited too.

After speaking about the case of the six hatters, he says—

Some of my friends don't agree with me.

However "Yes-No" his leader may be, Senator Symon is always consistent, and I wish to know if he believes in the sentiment which was expressed by Mr. Reid when he said—

Some of my friends don't agree with me, but if I ever have the power in Australia—(cheers)—I will make provision for the objects referred to—

That is to say, that he would knock out the contract provision in the Act—

but I would absolutely do away with the opportunity of stopping honest fellow-countrymen settling down here in honest employment.

Does he intend to ask the Parliament to delete that provision? If he does not take that course, he will stamp himself as the worst kind of political humbug, because he will have gone back on the pledges he made only six months ago.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Will the honorable senator support him if he does?

Senator O'KEEFE.—No, and the honorable and learned senator is so consistent that if he did not believe in the provision two years ago he will not change his attitude now. I do not believe that he would ever jump Jim Crow like his leader does.

Senator CLEMONS.—Does the honorable senator wish to keep up the impediment against honest workmen coming here?

Senator O'KEEFE.—No member of the Labour Party desires to keep up an impediment against honest workmen coming here. Every man should come here as a free agent, and after he has acquired a knowledge of the local conditions he should be able to enter into a contract.

Senator FRASER.—But some men prefer to have a billet before they come.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Yes. A number of men got their billets before they came; they were brought here to interfere with the fair rate of wages paid to Australian workmen.

and that was the reason for that provision in the Immigration Restriction Act. Unless the leader of this Government asks the Parliament to repeal that provision he will stamp himself as the worst kind of political turncoat. And if he does attempt to keep his pledges to the people, and he is assisted by Mr. McLean, Sir George Turner, and Senator Drake, then they will break their political pledges. Either one half of this peculiarly constituted Government or the other must break the pledges given to the people only six months ago. When Mr. Reid was reminded by an elector at the meeting in the Town Hall, that he voted for the provision to keep out the six hatters he said—

If I did I ought to be kicked—

He really did not know whether he had voted for it. It is a just retribution for the stand which he took at that time, and the tarradiddles which he told the people of Australia, that the six hatters, for whom he tried to enlist so much sympathy, should work and vote against him at the last general election. He said—

If I did I ought to be kicked. But I say I did not.

Senator CLEMONS.—Was it impossible for the honorable senator to finish that quotation in the first instance? Was the sentence too long for him to quote?

Senator O'KEEFE.—I shall give the honorable and learned senator as much more of it as he likes.

Senator CLEMONS.—Does not the honorable senator think that it would have been fairer to finish the quotation in the first instance?

Senator O'KEEFE.—Does the honorable senator say that I have not quoted correctly?

Senator CLEMONS.—I say that the honorable senator quoted the first part loudly, and the second part as a sort of stage aside.

Senator O'KEEFE.—A voice interrupted Mr. Reid, and he said—

If I did I ought to be kicked. But I say that I did not.

Senator CLEMONS.—That is what I referred to.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Mr. Reid also said—

The democracy of Australia should beware of pushing its principles for a White Australia to a mean and contemptible extreme. I was with the Government on the kanaka question, and was willing to let the Bill pass. But we have to pay too heavily for it.

Then Senator Fraser echoed from the platform "Too heavily."

Senator FRASER.—I say so still.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The honorable senator is consistent in that. Yet he says he is in favour of a White Australia.

Senator FRASER.—Perfectly.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Yes, if he can get it for nothing.

Senator FRASER.—I do not grow crazy about it.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Mr. Reid said—

I do not grudge the amount, but it was still too heavy a price to pay.

Then he went on to deal with the Tariff, but I can leave that subject, because we know that he has sunk the fiscal issue entirely. I wonder how Senator Pulsford likes that. Mr. Reid sunk the only big political principle to which Senator Pulsford ever attached himself. I do not think that in his heart the honorable senator is a genuine supporter of the coalition.

Senator PULSFORD.—Yes I am.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Will Senator Pulsford tell us what in his opinion should be the duration of the fiscal truce? We should all like to know that. Some reason ought also to be given for the change of Government which has taken place, and for the delay in the transaction of public business, which has consequently happened. The present situation must stand condemned before the people of Australia as absolutely devoid of common sense. Those who have taken the reins of Government ought to tell the people what is the difference between their policy and ours. They found no fault with the administration of the late Government. They have copied our methods.

Senator DRAKE.—No.

Senator O'KEEFE.—They have copied them as well as they could. Mr. Deakin, in his great speech at Ballarat on the 30th October, made it a great complaint against the protectionists that their organization was not perfect. He said, "What we want is a solid phalanx of protectionists to be presented at the next general election," and he added in those splendidly flowing phrases of his that there was a plethora of candidates on the protectionist side, and that some of them must stand aside. He said, "We must have only one protectionist candidate for each constituency." That is what Mr. Deakin wanted. How was that object to be attained without a political machine? The very fact that our opponents on both sides are willing to adopt our methods and that they can bring no charge against our administration, furnish reasons why they should justify the change of Government which they have brought about. Only lately the Reform League in New South Wales have copied our methods.

Senator DRAKE.—Not the methods of the Labour Party.

Senator O'KEEFE.—In what respect do the methods of the protectionists with whom the honorable and learned senator is associated differ from those of the Labour Party.

Senator DRAKE.—Very greatly.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Let Senator Drake give us an instance, when he speaks next week. The present Government have adopted our programme, or at least a miserable portion of it. I ought not to call it a miserable portion, but they certainly have adopted a small portion of it.

Senator DRAKE.—There is not a plank in the honorable senator's platform which was not taken from the platform of some other party.

Senator O'KEEFE.—There is not a plank in the platform of the Labour Party which has not been there for many years before the late Government came into existence. The greater part of our platform is derived from the brains of the members of the Labour Party. Mr. Reid calls our policy a crawling policy, but, nevertheless, he adopts it. I ask again: what are the reasons for bringing the coalition into existence? Can it be that honorable senators opposite object to the Labour Party, because they do not mix in the highest social circles? That is a deplorable thing to suggest, but I cannot explain the situation otherwise. I believe that some honorable senators opposite in their inmost hearts and consciences, subscribe to the ideal of Government which was expressed by an American millionaire the other day, when he said that "the rights and privileges of the working people of this great country will be best conserved, not by agitators, but by the Christian men and women, to whom God in his infinite wisdom has given the control of the property and interests of the country." Do honorable senators opposite subscribe to that doctrine? Do they say that the rights and privileges of the people of Australia will be best conserved only by the class of individuals who own the property?

Senator DRAKE.—Certainly not.

Senator O'KEEFE.—I am glad that my honorable and learned friend, who has been a democrat, does not subscribe to that ideal.

Senator DRAKE.—I am a democrat still.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Then the honorable and learned senator should get out of the present Government at once, because I can assure him that his friends in Queensland will not recognise him as a democrat so long as he remains a member of it. I am impelled to the opinion that the majority of the supporters of this Government do adhere to the ideal which I have described.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator is quite mistaken.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Our ideal, on the contrary, is that the rights and interests of any community should be paramount to the rights and interests of any individual or class, and that so long as human nature is constituted as it is, and until we reach the millennium, the rights and interests of the mass of the people must be paramount to those of any individual or class. After all, government in itself and in the abstract is not a good thing. Government is essentially a recognition of the weakness of human nature. While human nature is what it is, we must have some form of Government; and the Government in which I believe is that which uses every fair means to make individuals recognise the claims of the race to which they belong, and of the community in which they live.

Debate (on motion by Senator FRASER) adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT.

GOVERNOR OF WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

Motion (by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON) proposed—

That the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT.—Before I put the motion, I think it only right to mention to the Senate that His Excellency the Governor of Western Australia is present. My attention has just been called to the fact, or otherwise I should certainly have invited His Excellency to take a seat on the floor of the Senate. I am sure the Senate would have accorded so distinguished a visitor that privilege. I was not informed officially that His Excellency was here, or I should have taken action.

HONORABLE SENATORS.—Hear, hear.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Senate adjourned at 3.32 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Friday, 9 September, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 10.30 a.m., and read prayers.

MILITARY BADGES AND ORNAMENTS.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I wish to know from the Minister of Defence whether it has yet been determined to have the badges and ornaments used by our Military Forces made in Australia? Some time ago it was proposed to import these articles, but several honorable members raised a protest against that procedure. The matter has been before the Department for some time, and I should, therefore, like to know from the Minister whether a determination has been come to on the subject.

Mr. McCAY.—I should have been glad if the honorable member had let me know of his intention to ask this question, because then I should have been able to look at the papers bearing on the matter. So far as my memory serves me, the Department has been accepting contracts for the making of badges in Australia.

Mr. MAUGER.—There is a big item still undecided.

Mr. McCAY.—I cannot carry the facts relating to all these matters in my memory, and I am not sure that I have seen all the papers referring to the subject of the honorable member's inquiry; but if he will repeat his question next week, I hope to be able to give a definite answer.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I wish to know from the Minister of External Affairs what is the policy of the Government as regards old-age pensions, and whether he will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the working of the Old-age Pensions Acts of Victoria and New South Wales, with the object of obtaining data on which to base a Commonwealth scheme of old-age pensions.

Mr. REID.—The Government considered that matter in dealing with their policy for this session and afterwards, and, as stated by the Attorney-General in the Senate, the day before yesterday, the view we have taken in regard to it is that it is impossible for the Federal Parliament to bring into operation a Federal system of old-age pensions without the co-operation of the States, because, although the Constitution empowers us to deal with it, it would be necessary, if revenue were raised for the purpose through the Customs—and that has been the policy of taxation common to, I think, all Federal parties—to raise four times the amount actually required, since 15s. in every £1 obtained through the Customs must be returned to the States. The Government, therefore, decided some days ago that they would make the subject one to be dealt with in a Conference with the Governments of the States, and we propose to use all the influence we possess to persuade those Governments to co-operate with us, so that we may be able to deal with the matter upon a national basis.

Mr. THOMAS.—Is this another part of the programme for the recess?

Mr. REID.—The matter was referred to by the Attorney-General two days ago in making a Ministerial statement in another place.

Mr. THOMAS.—Why was it not referred to here? Did the right honorable member forget to refer to it?

Mr. REID.—I did.

Mr. THOMAS.—The right honorable member forgot to refer to so important a question as the establishment of Commonwealth old-age pensions!

Mr. REID.—I had made a note of the matter, and intended to refer to it; but I never look at my notes during the delivery of a speech, and consequently the subject escaped my memory, as I had to deal with a large number of questions. In the Senate, however, the Attorney-General referred to the subject in this way:—

There is also the great subject which must be considered in connexion with the States, as suggested by Senator Higgs, namely, old-age pensions. That must necessarily be the subject of conference, and some kind of basis for common action, even to a greater extent than that which I ventured to indicate desirable in so comparatively small a matter as the appointment of a High Commissioner.

That statement was made two days ago, and no miracle can be worked with the Hansard report, although I hear that it is pretty freely revised at times. The subject was fully considered by the Government, and I regret that, having a large number of matters to deal with, I forgot to mention it when making my Ministerial statement.

Mr. FISHER.—The other Ministers might have advised the right honorable gentleman on the subject.

Mr. REID.—That is perfectly true ; but I ask my honorable friends to show interest in the main subject, which is of more importance than an act of forgetfulness on my part. I plead guilty to the omission through want of recollection ; but, as a guarantee of good faith, I am happy to say that the subject was referred to by the Attorney-General in another place while I was making my Ministerial statement. In reply to the question asked by the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, neither my colleagues nor I have any objection to the appointment of a Select Committee whose inquiries and report will help to pave the way for the proposed Conference. The subject in which he is interested has never been considered a party question, and I hope never will be so considered. It is a matter of too great importance for that. I shall, therefore, welcome any assistance from a Select Committee of this House preparatory to a meeting with the authorities of the States in Conference.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have once or twice before called attention to the requirements of the Standing Orders in relation to questions. The rules in this regard are very strict, and I am bound to enforce them. I therefore ask honorable members who, during the making of any reply to a question, desire further information, not to indulge in running comment, which is quite disorderly ; but to afterwards ask, separately, supplementary questions upon the subjects upon which they desire additional information. To ask questions by way of interjection during the giving of answers to other questions is disorderly.

ALIEN RESTRICTION ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. CARPENTER.—It appears from the press reports that a number of Chinese, arriving by steamer from Singapore, have been detected in the act of trying to smuggle themselves into Fremantle. For some time past it has been strongly suspected in Western Australia that, in spite of the Aliens Restriction Act, Chinamen have been smuggled into that State in considerable numbers ; and in view of the fact that some thirteen of them have now been discovered on board one steamer, I ask the Minister of External Affairs if he will take special precautions to prevent the recurrence of this action. I should also like him to say what steps the Government intend to take in regard to the particular case to which I have referred.

Mr. REID.—I should like to have fuller information on the subject before making any announcement of the intentions of the Government, since correct information is the safe precursor of action. I have not yet received the papers, and I wish to satisfy myself of the facts before taking action. If my honorable friend will put a question on the notice paper for, say, Wednesday next, I hope then to be able to give him a satisfactory reply.

SUPPLIES: POSTAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I wish to ask the Postmaster-General, without notice, if it is a fact, as stated in this morning's Age, that he has decided to continue a practice in connexion with the supplies required by his Department, inaugurated, I believe, by a previous Minister, of giving a preference of 15 per cent. to local tenderers?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am sorry that my honorable friend has not given notice of the question. Some time ago tenders were invited for the supply of materials for the Post and Telegraph Department. Tenders were afterwards received, and certain recommendations were made in regard to them by an officer of the Department, in accordance, I understand, with the decisions of previous Ministers. The matter was then submitted to my predecessor in office, the honorable member for Coolgardie, who determined to accept tenders where no preference was involved. Upon his leaving office it came again before me, and I sent for the papers to ascertain what was the practice in force at the time the tenders were invited. I found that both the honorable member for Denison and Senator Drake had laid down a certain rule in connexion with preference to tenderers.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Was not that the result of a Cabinet decision?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I presume it was ; the rule laid down by the Government for the time being was that certain preference should be given to local tenderers. That decision was communicated to the Deputy Postmasters-General in the various States, and it was in accordance with that decision that tenders were invited by my predecessors in office. The matter came under my notice for determination, because the honorable member for Coolgardie had determined that where no preference was involved the tender should be accepted, and had left me to deal with all other cases.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Did the tenderers know anything about the arrangement?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—All I know is that the Secretary to the Postmaster-General was directed to send the decision of my predecessors to the Deputy Postmasters, and I concluded that a certain practice had been established, and that the tenderers had some knowledge of it. I made a minute to the following effect:—"The practice in force under Ministerial decision at the time tenders were invited to be followed."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If it was understood by the tenderers that preference was to be given to local tenders, the Minister was only carrying out what amounted practically to a contract.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Of course, I cannot say for certain whether the tenderers knew of the arrangement. All I know is that the decision of my predecessors was communicated by order to the Deputy Postmasters-General.

Mr. MAUGER.—I desire to know whether the Postmaster-General will, of his own motion, continue the very admirable practice which has been referred to?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I shall deal with that question when it arises.

Mr. SALMON.—I wish to ask whether the papers disclose any reason why the late Postmaster-General declined to deal with the very important question of allowing preference to local tenderers?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—No; the papers do not disclose that. The late Postmaster-General left a minute to the effect that tenders were to be accepted where no preference was involved.

Mr. SALMON.—Then the matter of preference was hung up?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It was left in abeyance.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The late Postmaster-General very wisely shunted the responsibility.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Is it not a fact that the reason why the late Postmaster-General did not deal with the question of preference to tenderers was that fresh tenders were called, and that he was therefore unable to arrive at a decision?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not think that that is the correct explanation. The papers were submitted to me, and I asked the Secretary to give me some information bearing on the question of preference. Then the decision arrived at by my predecessors was placed before me.

Mr. FISHER.—The Minister has made an excellent start by trying to take a point upon the previous Minister.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I wish to ask the Minister whether, in arriving at his decision, he did not assume that there was an understanding between the Department and the tenderers with regard to preference?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I did not make any inquiries with regard to the tenderers. All I saw was the decision of my predecessors, which it was directed should be communicated privately to the Deputy Postmasters-General, I did not inquire as to the action which they had taken; but I arrived at the determination I have indicated.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Is it not true that the papers sent to the Deputy Postmasters-General with respect to the preference to be given to local tenderers were marked "private and confidential," and that no tenderers knew anything about them?

Mr. REID.—This is curious. The honorable member must have been an understudy for the late Postmaster-General.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have already stated that it was ordered that the decision of my predecessors should be communicated privately to the Deputy Postmasters-General. It was that knowledge which made me hesitate to state that the tenderers were informed of the conditions. I determined the matter upon the papers submitted to me, and I am quite prepared to stand by my decision.

SALARIES OF TEMPORARY TELEGRAPH OPERATORS.

Mr. GROOM (for Mr. CROUCH), asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

1. Whether two expert telegraph operators of experience, named Lumley and Knight, have been recently employed at £90 per annum in the Department?

2. Are these men of mature years, with wives and families to support?

3. Does he propose to continue to pay these rates to men of experience under such conditions?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The answers to the honorable and learned member's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes. Lumley, from 28th November, 1903, to 26th July, 1904; and Knight, from 22nd February, 1904 (still employed).

2. Yes.

3. No special rates of pay have been determined by the Public Service Commissioner for temporary telegraphists; the salaries of those permanently employed are from £40 to £160 in the 5th Class. It is, however, the intention of the Postmaster-General that in future the minimum salary of £110 per annum shall be paid in such cases as those referred to.

I may add that when I found that these two men, who were married, and had large families, and were expert at their work, were receiving only £90 per annum, I felt that I should be perfectly justified in paying them the minimum salary.

PAPERS.

Mr. REID laid upon the table the following papers:

Statutory rules made by the Justices of the High Court under the Commonwealth Electoral Act.

Statutory rules made by the Justices of the High Court under the High Court Procedure Act.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

Debate resumed from 8th September (vide page 4462), on motion by Mr. REID—

That the despatch from the Secretary of State, with reference to the metric system, be printed.

Mr. ROBINSON (Wannon).—Like most other honorable members, I listened to the honorable and learned member for Indi with considerable pleasure and interest. My interest was increased by the fact that his speech was of a character such as we are not accustomed to hear from him. It was palpably an address to the gallery, and to his constituents. I welcome the attitude which the honorable and learned member has taken up on this question, because it seems to me that if there is to be organized obstruction the sooner we face the music the better. For my part, I am quite prepared to abide by the consequences, although I know that many honorable members on the other side are not so ready to face the situation. The honorable and learned member for Indi, and the leader of the Opposition, dealt with the methods by which the late Government were defeated, and claimed that they were not ejected from office by fair and reasonable means—that the battle ground was not of their own choosing. I am of opinion that the battle ground was distinctly of their own choosing. The only way in which we could arrive at a fair and definite decision upon an important point was afforded by the method adopted. What were the broad facts of the case? When the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill was previously in Committee it was proposed to delete the sub-clause providing for unconditional preference to unionists. That amendment was defeated. A further amendment was moved by the present Minister of Defence, with the object of limiting preference to the members of organizations which could show that they represented a majority of the persons interested in the award. That amendment was carried. Notice of it had been given some days before the division took place, and more than ten speakers discussed it. After the amendment had been adopted the then Government announced, through the press, their intention to seek a dissolution or resign office if the House did not reverse its decision. The Government chose to regard the question as vital, and I contend that it was far better that the whole matter should be disposed of in the full House, where every vote would count, rather than in Committee. The object of the late Prime Minister in seeking to recommit the Bill was to give that champion bridge-builder, the honorable and learned member for Indi, a further opportunity to display his powers. The intention undoubtedly was that, in the event of the Government amendment being defeated, the honorable and learned member should prepare some other amendment, or perhaps dozens and dozens of amendments if such should be necessary, with a view to enabling some slippery politicians to act contrary to their convictions. As it was, three honorable members changed their attitude upon the question of preference to unionists. Two of them were wise enough not to give reasons why they went over to the Government. Fortunately, most other honorable members had a sufficient amount of courage to stand by the votes they had given on a former occasion. What was desired by the Government was to revive bridge-building methods, which would enable weak-kneed politicians to evade giving a straight-out vote. The leader of the Opposition told us that the Government had made no effort to retain office. But I hold a very different view. There was a great deal of squealing and manœuvring by Ministers before they left office. When it was proposed to amend the clause in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill relating to the rules of the unions, which the late Prime Minister declared to be vital, one honorable member who was opposed to the registration under the Bill of unions having anything in the nature of political objects, asked the Minister in a very meek tone if he would resign in the event of the Government being defeated upon the clause. A reply was given in the affirmative. That threat had the desired effect, and the honorable and gallant member referred to changed his attitude, saved the Government, and ran home. The same tactics were employed on the last occasion.

Mr. WATSON.—Is there anything dishonorable or improper in the Government saying that they will make a certain question a vital one?

Mr. ROBINSON.—Pressure was applied to that honorable and learned member in the most open and flagrant manner. It was a matter of open comment. It was referred to in more than one speech delivered in this Chamber, and was the subject of many private conversations between honorable members. Honorable members on this side of the House take up a courageous attitude. They seek to check such practices, which bring Parliament into disrepute, and would have every man stand by his guns.

Mr. SPENCE.—The amendment was sprung on the House.

Mr. ROBINSON.—That is not so.

Mr. GROOM.—How many honorable members knew that it was to be moved?

Mr. ROBINSON.—If the honorable and learned member refers to the amendment against the recommittal of clause 48—

Mr. GROOM.—I do.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable and learned member's parliamentary experience should surely be sufficient to teach him that if a Government announces that it considers that a certain clause or sub-clause of a Bill is vital, and that it will go out of office if it be defeated on it, it is for the Opposition to take the first available means to test the opinion of the House on that question. That is the course which we adopted, and, to my mind, the result was very satisfactory. The leader of the Opposition has told us that the Government party is composed of a number of incongruous elements. I frankly admit that there are wide divergencies of opinion, on certain questions, among honorable members on this side of the House, but I think that I shall be able to show that there are equally wide divergencies of opinion on the part of honorable members of the Opposition. We, at all events, have one principle in common.

Mr. HUME COOK.—What is it?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I shall be able to show that some members of the Opposition and more particularly the honorable member for Bourke, have one principle very much in common with that which we favour. We object to caucus or machine-bound Governments.

Mr. WATSON.—And yet the Government use the machine.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I object to a caucus-bound Government—a system under which a Government is a mere detail in the hands of a machine. Such a system makes a man a mere puppet in the hands of wire-pullers outside the House. It destroys an honorable member's liberty and conscience, and reduces him to the position of a mere delegate. In order to show the House, and more particularly the honorable member for Bourke, the infamous nature of caucus or machine politics, I trust that I shall be permitted to quote from a speech made by that honorable member at the last general election. According to a report which appeared in the Age on 14th November, 1903, he took up a very vigorous attitude in opposition to the Labour Party. The report sets forth that he said—

Why was it the Labour Party was opposing him? . . . He did object to sign the party's constitution and pledge. Had he signed the pledge he would have put himself in the hands of twenty or thirty men who wanted his billet, and be compelled to support the candidate whom they selected, even if he were a free-trader. He would also have to give up 5 per cent. of his salary to the Political Labour Council; but he did not intend to do that. The position was that some twenty or thirty persons—a little clique at the Trades-hall—were to have the power to say whether they approved of a candidate, and if they did not approve of him he would have to stand down. Such things savoured of Tammany-hall and Russia—

That is the policy to which honorable members on this side of the House are opposed. Then he went on to say—

Any one who signed that pledge (i.e., labour pledge), agreed to support a candidate before they knew who the man was. The caucus did not allow any liberty; they must vote for the majority. They clamoured for the liberty of minorities, but they did not allow any liberty to their own minority.

That constitutes the basic difference between the Opposition and the Government.

Mr. REID.—Did they run the honorable member for Bourke very closely?

Mr. ROBINSON.—They did.

Mr. HUME COOK.—He beat his opponent by over 700 votes.

Mr. ROBINSON.—But he had to call upon the then Prime Minister, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, to extricate him from his difficult position.

The honorable and learned member went to Essendon in support of the honorable member, and made a rallying speech against machine government. According to a report which appeared in the Age on 25th November last, the honorable member for Bourke, in the course of another election speech, said—

The electors had to consider whether they would be represented by a person who was the nominee of a little clique called the Political Labour League, or whether they would send back their present member, who represented, not one section, but all sections of the community.

I come now to the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, for whom I have the greatest respect. I find that at the last general election he took up a position similar to that adopted by the honorable member for Bourke. Under the heading of "Mr. Mauger on the Labour Party," the Age, in its issue of 18th November, 1903, published the following report:—

If he were to be returned to the Federal Parliament it would be as a representative of the whole of the people, and not as a machine, to be worked at the dictation of a small portion. . . . If he did this—

That is, sign the labour pledge—

he would be abrogating the fundamental principles of the Constitution by handing over to a few men and a small section of the electors the right to say whether or not he should be a candidate.

Then, again, according to the Age of 24th November, 1903, he said—

He had been asked to "nominally" sign the platform of the Political Labour Council. (A Voice : Then the council is a failure).

Mr. MAUGER.—I say it is not only a failure—it is an absolute fraud.

I do not think that any words of mine could put the position more clearly than does the luminous exposition made by the two honorable members, whose utterances I have quoted.

Mr. REID.—Did the Labour Party run the honorable member for Melbourne Ports very closely?

Mr. ROBINSON.—They opposed him, but I am glad to say that his majority was not a small one. His popularity was so great that he was able to hold his own.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Did the then Prime Minister have to go to his assistance?

Mr. ROBINSON.—No. His popularity was so great that he did not require such help. We agree with these honorable members with regard to the position of the Labour Party, but the distinction between us is that we are prepared to give effect to our opinions in a proper and legitimate way, while they, on the other hand, have sunk their views.

Mr. REID.—It is the biggest case of "yes-no" of which I have ever heard.

Mr. ROBINSON.—One reason why some of us object to the Opposition is because of the extreme, militant, aggressive Socialism preached by a very large section of that party. A most unfair attempt was made last night to foist on the Prime Minister the responsibility for the utterances of Mr. R. S. Walpole. I am fairly well acquainted with that gentleman, and think I can say that he would resent such an attempt.

Mr. WATSON.—But he uttered the statement to which reference was made.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I repeat that he would resent the suggestion that he was giving expression, in any shape or form, to the views of the present Prime Minister. I do not wish to defend him, for he is well able to take care of himself, but on one point he has been grossly misrepresented.

Mr. TUDOR.—No.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The interjection made by the honorable member for Yarra—

Mr. TUDOR.—The statement in question was made by Mr. Walpole, when speaking at Lilydale, and I have a copy of the report, which has never been denied by him.

Mr. ROBINSON.—He has shown me a letter from a clergyman, who heard the whole of his speech, and who, without concurring in his remarks, moved a vote of thanks to him for his lecture. That clergyman states that no such statement as that attributed to Mr. Walpole was ever made by him.

Mr. TUDOR.—Will Mr. Walpole himself deny it?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I believe that he will.

Mr. REID.—What have we to do with Mr. Walpole?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—A great deal; the Government exist by his agency.

Mr. ROBINSON.—He represents one section of the community, which is entitled to adopt whatever constitutional means it pleases to secure the propagation of the views that it holds, but there is no justification whatever for the suggestion that the views of Mr. Walpole are shared by the present Government. The socialistic party object to Mr. Tom Mann being regarded as their mouthpiece. That is a most extraordinary position for them to take up. When I said last night that the Victorian labour members were partly responsible for the payment of the expenses of Mr. Tom Mann's mission, the honorable and learned member for West Sydney indignantly denied the statement. I do not make such assertions without being able to prove them.

Mr. BAMFORD.—The honorable and learned member was understood to refer to members of the Labour Party in this Parliament.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I said that some members of the party in this House were responsible, and can prove my assertion. Let me quote from a report which appeared in the issue of the Tocsin—the authorized political organ of the Trades Hall Council, of 30th June, 1904—

A meeting of the Trades-hall and the Political Labour Councils, sitting as a combined body, was held in the Trades-hall on Friday night, Mr. Hannah, M.L.A. (President of the Trades-hall Council), presiding.

Mr. SALMON.—Is that the Mr. Hannah who opposed the honorable member for Bourke?

Mr. ROBINSON.—Yes.

Mr. HUME, COOK.—And he was defeated by over 700 votes.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The report proceeds—

A number of Federal and State labour members were present. The meeting was unanimously of opinion that Mr. Mann's services should be retained, much of the success which had crowned the party's efforts in the late State election being directly traceable to his splendid capacity for organization, and to his strikingly forcible platform exposition of labour's aims and ideals.

In my opinion, Mr. Tom Mann is one of the best investments that the Labour Party have ever made, but I am surprised that they should have the effrontery to deny their association with him. The next paragraph in the report is as follows:—

The amount required to continue Mr. Mann's services is £40 per month, which includes salary, travelling expenses, hire of halls, and all other necessary outgoings.

That seems to me to be a remarkably small sum.

Mr. REID.—They are sweating him.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I shall read the next paragraph, because it absolutely bears out the statement which I made last night—

Of this monthly sum £22 is already assured, four Federal and eighteen State Labour members having agreed to contribute £1 per month each to the special organizing fund. The balance of £18 is to be subscribed by the unions.

We have here a clear and definite statement that the expenses of Mr. Tom Mann's campaign are borne by the Political Labour Council, the various political unions, and by various members of the Victorian Labour Party. It proves up to the hilt that the Victorian section of the Labour Party, at any rate, is responsible for Mr. Tom Mann's utterances, because he is their duly accredited paid agent and representative.

Mr. HUGHES.—What about Mr. Walpole?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I have already dealt with that gentleman's position.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Does the honorable and learned member belong to the union which that gentleman represents?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I do not; I belong to only the parliamentary union. From the quotations I have made it will be recognised by the House that the Labour Party are responsible for Mr. Mann's utterances. I do not say, however, that because the Labour Party is supported by some anarchists it should therefore be branded as an anarchist organization. The Opposition have endeavoured to show that every grinding employer of labour is a supporter of the present Government. I do not think that is so, and it is just as improper for the Labour Party to make such a suggestion as it is for them to endeavour to avoid the just consequences of the utterances of their duly accredited agent, Mr. Tom Mann. Let us hear what the Age newspaper, which is the organ of the new alliance opposite, that is going to attain office, and save the country at a break-neck rate, says about the Political Labour Council and Mr. Tom Mann. I find this in the issue of the Age for the 25th November, 1903—

It is that a mischievous organization, calling itself a political labour council, nominated by self-seeking parasites of the labour cause, has captured the control of the machine and foisted itself into the leadership of the scheme. It may be, of course, that some members of this council have indeed become the disciples of anarchism which one or two have not scrupled to avow. We cannot afford to forget the meeting recently held in the old Trades-hall, at which certain labour leaders gloried in comradeship with the foul assassin of President McKinley. They apotheosize the man who sneaked up to the late President and fired a revolver bullet into his stomach; and they called upon their deluded followers to "Remember our comrades who died for anarchy." It is revolting to any one who cherishes a sense of decency and pride in the grand old name of liberalism to think that any section of that party—which in this State has gloried in the leadership of a Higinbotham, a Berry, and a Grant—can have left the fair pastures of a clean progressive creed and policy to link itself with political leaders who uphold the cowardly doctrine of assassination.

That was a comment on a section of the Labour Party, and I am satisfied that it is so stringent as to be quite unfair. I do not believe that the members of the late Government should be charged with sympathizing with the cowardly attack on President McKinley in any shape or form. I have sufficient confidence in them to believe that they would reprobate it with all their hearts. But I do say that it is as justifiable to charge the Labour Party with sympathy with these ideas, as it is to endeavour to foist some of the extreme ideas given utterance to on the other side on the present Prime Minister and his associates. At the last election there was a free interchange of opinion on this question. I have already told honorable members what the honorable members for Melbourne Ports and Bourke thought of the labour caucus and the labour pledge, and any honorable member who has a few minutes to spare may turn up the records of the Tocsin newspaper for last November, to find some very interesting reading, and to learn how the labour organizations denounced the honorable members to whom I have referred as trimmers and traitors who sought to get into Parliament by cadging votes, that they might sell the Labour Party on the first opportunity. That was the opinion then held of those gentlemen by the labour organizations, but now they come together in a close embrace, as though they were long-lost brothers, who had met again—while each one is feeling to see that his knife is loose, in case of accidents. We have been told that an alliance has been completed between the Liberal Protectionist Party and the Labour Party, and the terms and conditions of the alliance have been published. The one thing which appears in the forefront of the terms of alliance is the evidence that it is based upon a shameless and open departure from pledges given by honorable members at the last election. If there was one definite question at the last election, it was that there should be a fiscal peace. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat, who was then Prime Minister, stood for fiscal peace, and asked that the Tariff should not be disturbed during the currency of the present Parliament. I followed one of the staunchest free-traders who ever sat in this or in any other Parliament, and who voted for every free-trade motion, and I agreed with the honorable and learned member for Ballarat in his claim, during the election campaign, that the present was not the time at which to re-open the Tariff question, the people of Australia being sick and tired of it. I therefore took up the position of supporting fiscal peace, and I pledged myself to resist any attempt to reopen the tariff during this Parliament, even though the pledge might force me to vote against my esteemed leader the right honorable member for East Sydney. I propose to adhere to that position now, because I believe that a man who gives a definite pledge of that kind should adhere to it.

Mr. REID.—In common honesty, I should think.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Common honesty and common decency demand it. In order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the real question submitted to the electors at the last elections, I refer honorable members to what the Age newspaper had to say on the subject. I find in the issue for November 23, 1903, the following remarks in an article on the Tariff question:—

A reasonable public opinion recognises that this is not a fitting time for reopening the whole question, just after spending some seventeen months in dealing with it. Free-traders need not fear, but that after a few years, during which public opinion will have had time to ripen, protectionists will seek to do for Australia what they have done for America, Germany, France, and Russia. . . . But that time is not now. Public opinion claims a rest, and will have it. It is no more prepared outside Victoria to perfect protection than it is to return to free-trade. Protectionists have the insight to perceive this, free-traders have not, and they are doing to the Commonwealth the disservice of forcing a barren issue. . . . It is as vital to the protectionists to gain the battle for fiscal peace as it would be if their immediate object were further protective advances.

Mr. REID.—Hear, hear; and now that they have gained it, they wish to stain the white flag.

Mr. MAUGER.—Having gained it, it is ours to do what we like with.

Mr. REID.—To do what honorable members like with their pledges? That is the confidence trick.

Mr. ROBINSON.—On the 27th November, the Age said—

The issue which will decide the election is that of Australian trade or foreign trade: Is the Federal Tariff to be ripped up or let alone?

On the 30th November this appeared—

The first and foremost necessity of the time is a truce on the fiscal question. As long as that struggle goes on it bars the way to any progressive legislation on other national and social questions. The Opposition proposal for a new strife over the Tariff is directly opposed to the Deakin policy of fiscal peace . . . There is a time to draw the sword, and a time to sheathe it. All the interests of trade, and industrial development demand for the present a cessation of fiscal hostility.

That was the view held by the Age newspaper.

Mr. MAUGER.—Yes, twelve months ago.

Mr. REID.—That accounts for it.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The issue which the honorable and learned member for Ballarat put before the electors was the issue of fiscal peace, and the honorable and learned gentleman bound his party, so far as a leader can bind a party, to that platform. Though I differed from the honorable and learned gentleman on nearly every other point, I agreed with him that it was not desirable that the Tariff should be again ripped up during the currency of this Parliament. That policy was indorsed by all sections of the community. The honorable member for Bland, when this House met made the same kind of statement. On 4th March, 1904, I find he is reported on page 147 of Hansard, to have said—

There is another feature of the elections to which I should like to refer, namely, the fiscal question. I share the feeling of gratification which has been expressed by the Prime Minister, that with the last election, the issue, as between freetrade and protection, has disappeared for some time to come.

That was the definite platform of the Labour Party and of the Deakin party. Honorable members may recollect, as I do clearly, the account of an interview between the honorable member for Bland and the press soon after the present Prime Minister made a speech in Melbourne advocating the reopening of the Tariff. When the honorable member for Bland was interviewed on the subject, he said that he was very much disappointed that the right honorable member for East Sydney should be trying to revive the Tariff question, because he thought it ought to be sunk until the end of the period fixed by the Braddon clause. That was the position which the parties opposite took up then, and it is, therefore, clear that the new alliance is based upon a shameless and open disregard of those pledges. The alliance has been formed, we are told, for the purpose of reviving the Tariff issue, which honorable gentlemen forming the alliance definitely pledged themselves to sink during the life-time of the present Parliament. It will be a matter of interest to us, who gave definite pledges not to re-open the Tariff, to see how those staunch free-traders, like my honorable friend the ex-Postmaster-General, and the honorable members for Maranoa, Perth, Canobolas, Barrier, and others will vote on the question. Is it true that they have sold themselves body and boots to the new alliance?

Mr. REID.—No fear, they are too staunch on that subject.

Mr. MAHON.—Do not indulge any hope in that quarter.

Mr. ROBINSON.—If the honorable member for Coolgardie were to go over on a question of that kind, I do not know anybody in the world whose steadfastness I could trust on this or any other question. But the honorable member for Melbourne Ports also took up the same attitude. He was also a fiscal peace man at the last election. He is reported in the Age newspaper of 24th November, 1903, to have said—

The Tariff was by no means satisfactory to protectionists. He had no intention, however, of reopening the fiscal question.

Mr. CHAPMAN.—Who said that?

Mr. ROBINSON.—Mr. Samuel Mauger, the honorable member for Melbourne Ports.

Mr. REID.—No, a brother; not "66 Bourke-street," surely?

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable member went on to say—

More was to be gained at present by fiscal rest than by resurrecting the Tariff.

Mr. MAUGER.—Quite right, that was twelve months ago.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member is a regular body snatcher now.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable member for Bourke, who, I am sorry to say, has flinched from my castigation and run out of the chamber, said much the same thing. He is reported by the Age of 12th November, 1903, to have said—

He would support the Government as regards the maintenance of the present fiscal protection and fiscal peace.

So that those two honorable members, who are now battling to resurrect the Tariff issue were definitely pledged, so far as words can be definite, to prevent any reopening of the Tariff question during the present Parliament.

Mr. MAUGER.—No, I did not say a word about the present Parliament.

Mr. ROBINSON.—It is extraordinary that honorable members who gave a pledge of that kind should have the effrontery now to advocate the reopening of the Tariff question. I have shown that the alliance existing between the extraordinary elements of the present Opposition is based upon a shameless disregard of pledges, and an open breach of faith with the public of Australia. We should look at the agreement which has been come to to see what are the conditions of the alliance. They are very amusing, and to those honorable members who are asked to contribute 5 per cent. of their salaries, they should be very interesting also. Article 3 of the conditions reads in this way—

Each party to use its influence individually and collectively with its organizations and supporters to secure support for and immunity from opposition to members of the other party during the currency of the alliance.

The honorable and learned members for Melbourne Ports and Bourke will not be assailed from the Labour side. They will not be asked to sign a pledge, or to hand over 5 per cent. of their salaries to assist the Labour cause. For this Parliament and the next their positions will be safe from Labour attacks, and no levy will be made upon their purses so long as the alliance continues.

Mr. MAHON.—Does the honorable and learned member say that any section of the Labour Party pays 5 per cent. of its salary to support the Labour cause?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I quoted the remarks made by the honorable member for Bourke at the last election, when, I believe, the honorable member was absent from the chamber. At any rate, the proposition was made that every member of the party in the Federal Parliament should contribute 5 per cent. of his salary to assist the Labour cause.

Mr. REID.—I guarantee that it was not approved of.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I am informed that it was.

Mr. WILSON.—It was at the time; but it has since been withdrawn.

Mr. ROBINSON.—It is stated in the articles of alliance that the Arbitration Bill is to be put through as nearly as possible as originally introduced; but that members are at liberty to adhere to votes already given. What does that mean? Honorable members will recollect that on the very first division after the Watson Government took office an amendment was carried, on my motion, excepting farming and rural industries generally from the operation of the Bill. The present leader of the Opposition then stated that he would use all his efforts and influence to defeat that amendment, and that he and his party would do their best to bring those industries under the Bill. Is it the intention of the alliance to go back on that vote, or are honorable members opposite to have freedom of action on so important a question? If the combination is successful, and the honorable and learned member for Indi is able to oust the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, how will he vote on the question? He was one of those who originally voted to exclude the farming industries from the operation of the Bill. The honorable member for Hume voted in the same way. The first vote which he gave after the Watson Government came into power was against the application of the Bill to the farming industries. What does he propose to do in the future?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I shall do as I did before.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I am very pleased to hear it, and to notice that my honorable friends are not unanimous on this important point. We are told, however, that in another place there are fourteen pledged labour members. If they insist on applying the Bill to the farming industries, will the members of the Opposition in this chamber accept this amendment? That is a point upon which the people in the country desire enlightenment. When the honorable member for Bland made his Ministerial statement some four or five months ago, he told us that his policy included the Government manufacture of tobacco. The making of provision for such a step was part of his programme for the session of next year; but, on looking at the platform of the alliance, I find that paragraph 10 reads as follows:—

Tobacco monopoly. Appointment of the present Select Committee as a Royal Commission, with addition of members from both Houses of Parliament.

I wish to know if the united Opposition is in favour of the manufacture and sale of tobacco by the Government.

Mr. MAUGER.—That will depend upon the report of the Royal Commission.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The Labour Party are definitely pledged in the matter. What then will become of the joints in the Labour tail? Are they going to wag the dog, or will the dog wag the tail? I should like to know how the honorable and learned member for Indi is going to vote on the question, and a great many others would also like a definite pronouncement from him on the subject. In the last Parliament the honorable and learned member for Corio would work himself up into paroxysms of indignation whenever mention was made of the Government taking over a manufacture, and the proposal to establish a Government clothing factory nearly drove him out of his senses. I should like to know therefore whether he will vote for the Government manufacture of tobacco. This question is a very vital one, because the attitude of the alliance in regard to it will show to what extent the Socialism of the Labour Party is to be adopted by it. Are the members of the alliance ready to vote for the manufacture of articles in every case where a monopoly might be created under private enterprise?

Mr. MAHON.—Will not the honorable and learned member give us his views on the single tax question?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I am at present giving my views on the Ministerial statement, and the programme of the Opposition. If my honorable friend wishes to hear me on another matter, I shall be prepared to give him my opinions in regard to it at some other time. I wish to know what is to be the attitude of the alliance in regard to the Iron Bonus Bill. Their platform in regard to it is as follows:—

Iron Bonus Bill.—Every member to have freedom of action as to method of control.

Does that mean that the whole party is pledged to the granting of bonuses for the manufacture of iron? If so, a number of the members of the Opposition are going back upon their written opinions. I have before me the report of the Iron Bonus Commission, which was presented to His Excellency the Governor-General in March last, and was signed by, amongst others, the ex-Prime Minister, and the ex-Minister of External Affairs. Both of those gentlemen signed a report which pronounces in the most vigorous terms against the granting of a bonus for the manufacture of iron. Are they going back on their opinions? Are they to have a free hand only in determining who is to get the spoil, or are they going to adhere to their pledges in the matter? The decision of the alliance on this question will throw further light upon their attitude in regard to State Socialism. Caustic reference was made last night by the honorable and learned member for Indi to the question of preferential trade. He asked what was the attitude of the Government in regard to it, and stated that he would oppose any proposal which was not based on protectionist lines. But on looking at the programme, all I can find is, that preferential trade is to be discussed by the two parties at an early date. Prior to the last general elections, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat took up a definite attitude on this question, and I supported him in regard to it. He stated that we must wait for a request from the British Government before taking action, and the Age in a leading article published on the 30th October last, after the speech of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, outlining the policy of his Government, said—

If the time for negotiations ever arrives in consequence of Great Britain accepting the new policy, then will be the occasion for saying in what particulars our Tariff shall be modified in favour of England. . . . Mr. Deakin's preferential policy is crystallized in a sentence. "Great Britain must make the first move."

That was the policy of the Deakin Government, and I understand that it is the policy of the present Government. When Great Britain makes a move, the House will be given an opportunity to discuss the matter, and honorable members can then express their views on the question. The attitude taken up by the honorable member for Bland, when speaking on the motion for the Address-in-Reply, was that the Tariff should not be re-opened under any circumstances. "unless proposals first come from the mother country." There are three or four points upon which we require information. We want to know to what extent the Socialism of the Labour Party is adopted by those allied with it. Have the stragglers from the Protectionist Party, who are allying themselves with the Labour Party, swallowed its socialistic principles, or have honorable members of the Labour Party abandoned their principles to please the stragglers from the Protectionist Party? Although the platform of the alliance contains about seventeen paragraphs, and deals with nearly every phase of legislation likely to be discussed during the next ten years, no reference is made to the proposal put forward by the honorable member for Bland to take £8,000,000 of the gold in the reserves of the banks, and substitute for it the I.O.U. of the Commonwealth Government. No reference is made to the banking policy of the Labour Party, a policy of deliberate theft from the banks. Have the liberal malcontents succeeded in getting the Labour Party to drop that proposal, or is it to be brought forward again later? It would be a matter of interest to us, and to the whole country, to know whether the Labour Party and members of the Opposition generally intend to institute a system of spoliation of the banks the moment that they have a sufficient majority at their back. Whatever incongruity there may be about the coalition of honorable members upon this side of the House—and I do not deny that differences of opinion exist upon vital questions—there is still more incongruity to be found in the combination upon the Opposition benches. Many honorable members, who previously stated that the Political Labour Council is a perfect fraud, and who refused to surrender their liberties by allying themselves with the Labour Party, are now prepared to work with them. I do not think that any sacrifice of principles has been made by honorable members on this side, to compare with the abandonment of policy of which some honorable members opposite have been guilty. It will be interesting to watch how the present combination upon the Opposition benches works, and what strength the respective parties will be able to exert. When the leader of the Opposition approached the Protectionist Party with a view to effect a coalition, he offered to distribute portfolios in the Ministry in accordance with the number of members who allied themselves with the Labour Party. I should like to know if the same principle is to be followed in connexion with the present combination. Is one portfolio or more to be given to members outside the caucus, or are they to be equal in all things? Not the least amusing development to which we shall look forward is the Homeric struggle which is bound to take place between the honorable and learned member for Indi and the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, as to who is to occupy the position of legal adviser to the Government. Is it to be the honorable and learned member who has drafted amendments in the Ministerial room, or the bridge-builder who has drafted amendments to save the Government in this Chamber? The struggle between these two honorable and learned members will be watched with the greatest amusement and the greatest zest. An honorable member has just placed in my hands an extract from a speech delivered by the honorable member for Hume upon the 15th March, 1904.

He is reported at page 535 of Hansard as having said—

The Government do not propose to raise the fiscal issue, but I intend to maintain my principles. At the same time, I shall adhere to the statement of the Prime Minister that fiscal peace is to be preserved.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Hear, hear.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I am very glad to have an opportunity of disinterring that statement of an honorable member who, until a few days ago, was the leader of the malcontent Liberals, and who has now given place to the honorable and learned member for Indi. I am glad that an alliance has been formed between the two parties sitting in Opposition, because their combination will tend to clear the political atmosphere. It will show the country that there are a number of honorable members who are quite prepared to play the part of the tail of the Labour Party—the tail of the caucus and socialistic party. We know now that we are fighting a party wedded to the system of machine politics, and to the methods of militant Socialism. If the threats that the Opposition will obstruct the business of the House to the best of their ability are carried out, I hope the Prime Minister will adopt a courageous attitude, and place a distinct issue before the electors at once, so that the responsibility for the present political upset may be laid upon the right shoulders, namely, upon the shoulders of those who are wantonly obstructing public business. We do not fear to face the electors upon the issue of free versus machine politics, but I know that many honorable members opposite are praying night and day that a dissolution may be a long way off.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume).—The honorable and learned member who has just resumed his seat has had a great deal to say about the head and the tail of the Liberal Party, but I think I might very well ask the honorable and learned member to tell me which is the head and which is the tail of the Government Party? At present it is difficult to ascertain which side is uppermost. The present situation is unique, and it behoves every honorable member to do his best to place the responsibility for this extraordinary condition of affairs upon the right shoulders. When the first Commonwealth election was held, a vigorous fight was carried on throughout Australia—at any rate, in New South Wales—upon the fiscal question. Although a majority of protectionists were returned to the House, some of the members of the party did not, to my mind, support protectionist principles in connexion with the framing of the Tariff so strongly as might have been expected. The Free-trade Party adopted obstructive tactics, and very largely contributed to make the Tariff what it is, and what it should not be. Upon the occasion of the last election, the cry was raised by the Prime Minister that there should be no fiscal peace, and that the free-traders should fight for their own cause, in order to remove from the Tariff its protectionist elements. It is astonishing that, after having sustained a great defeat on the fiscal issue, the right honorable gentleman should be embraced by his political opponents, and permitted to enjoy those fruits of victory to which he is not entitled. When the right honorable gentleman was vigorously opposing me in my electorate, he said that he would ask his constituents to return him for this occasion only. He stated further that, whether by the result of the elections he was on the top or not, he would not remain in public life beyond the life of this Parliament. After being defeated upon the fiscal issue, he comes to this House, and by disgraceful intrigues and machinations, succeeds in usurping the position which he has no right to hold.

Mr. KELLY.—That is really wicked.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Terrible.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Honorable members may make light of the situation. The little man from Wentworth has more assertiveness than anything else, and is continually interjecting silly remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. Personal remarks with regard to an honorable member's stature are not in order, and I must ask the honorable member not to continue in that strain.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I was merely speaking of the littleness of the honorable member's interjections. It is not right that the arch-enemy of the protectionist cause should hold the position of Prime Minister of the Commonwealth in a protectionist Parliament. How did he achieve that position? In the first place he intrigued against the Deakin Government in a manner that was not reputable to himself, or to his followers. He publicly told his supporters to vote against that Government, whilst he saved his political skin by voting with them on the question of including public servants within the scope of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Can the honorable member show that the Prime Minister made the statement he has referred to?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes, I read the statement in the public press. He said that he would vote with the Government, but that he was not going to bind his followers to adopt the same course; they could vote against the Government if they felt so disposed.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—That is very different from what the honorable member stated.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Two honorable members stated that they voted against their consciences simply with a view to destroy the Government.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—There were more than two who did that.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—There may have been a large number, but I heard two make that declaration. These were some of the tricks which the Prime Minister adopted to eject the Deakin Ministry from office. The late Government did not desire office. From the first, it was subjected to unfair treatment at the hands of the Prime Minister. The present Postmaster-General also was intriguing against it all the time.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member endeavoured to secure my seat upon the direct Opposition benches.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Minister is not stating what is correct. I may have sat in his seat for a few minutes, but I have never been in direct Opposition to the late Government. The Deakin Government never received fair play at the hands of the Opposition, and the Tariff would have been very much worse had it not been for the support given to the Barton Government by the Labour Party.

Mr. MCCAY.—By the protectionist members of the Labour Party.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes, of course. Seventy-five per cent. of the members of that party are protectionists, and they constituted our main support in passing the Tariff.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why should they not have supported the carrying out of the policy of which they approved?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not say that they should not have done so; but the free-traders and some of the right honorable member's bosom friends, whom he has been intriguing to bring into power, did not give us any assistance.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have never intrigued.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—There is no greater intriguer or underground engineer in Australia than is the right honorable member. I was deceived for a time as to his capacity in that direction, but the scales have been removed from my eyes. There is a belief on the part of some honorable members that I occasionally resort to intrigue. Such a supposition is entirely a mistake.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member is a pretty good hand at it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—And the honorable member is a little better.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I do not think so.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It was manifest when the Deakin Government were defeated that there was no desire on the part of the Labour Party that they should be so defeated. The party did not wish to take the place of the Deakin Government, and I know from statements made by many individual members of it that they had no desire to put that Government out of office. The Labour Party went to the country as advocates of the extension of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill to the States railway servants. They were to a large extent returned on that issue, and were, therefore, perfectly justified in the course which they adopted in regard to the clause in the Bill dealing with that question. Had they not adhered to the principle on which they were mainly returned, they would not have been worthy of the position which they occupied. They stood by that principle, and the Deakin Government were turned out of office—not by the Labour Party, but through the agency of the leader of the present Government.

Mr. SALMON.—Does the honorable member think that an honorable member should keep his election pledges?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I know that the honorable member does not keep them.

Mr. SALMON.—I rise to a point of order. The honorable member for Hume, mistaking an interjection which I made, has charged me with having failed to keep election pledges. I think that such conduct would be unworthy of an honorable member, and I therefore ask, Mr. Speaker, that the honorable member be called upon either to prove his charge or to withdraw it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I scarcely think that the point of order is a good one. The honorable member made an interjection, and I simply replied to it.

Mr. SPEAKER. — If the honorable member desires a statement to be withdrawn he is entitled to have his request complied with.

Mr. SALMON. — I wish the honorable member to prove his statement or to withdraw it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If Mr. Speaker says that that statement must be withdrawn I shall withdraw it. I may say that I have closely watched the honorable member for Laanecoorie's political career for some little time past. It had been so circuitous that I desired to see what would be the outcome of it.

Mr. McCAY.—If it were circuitous, it would be quite natural to the honorable member for Hume.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable member for Laanecoorie has been slightly wobbling. I have referred to the position of the Labour Party, because I think that their opposition to the Deakin Government has been dealt with in an unfair way. The right honorable member for Swan, as soon as he went into opposition, began to make vigorous attacks on the party. It was the first time that he had sat in opposition during a public career extending over twenty-one years. He informs me that he never had a contest during the whole of that time, and having held office for so many years, I think he might very well have sat quietly for a little time in opposition, instead of attacking the Watson Government as he did. As a matter of fact, his attacks should have been made not on the Labour Party, but on the present Prime Minister.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—My complaint was that the Watson Government had not a majority behind it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The right honorable member made an all-round attack on the late Government—an attack which, I am afraid, was due to some soreness on his part.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I hope not.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I may be wrong, but that was the impression which I formed. After being in office for twenty-one years, the right honorable member should have been fairly well satisfied to remain for a time in opposition.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In some respects it was a happy release for me.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—And in others it was not. When the present Prime Minister and his supporters had by means of intrigue secured the defeat of the Deakin Government, the Governor-General was advised to send for the honorable member for Bland—the leader of the Labour Party—and the present Prime Minister began to whine like a school boy, because the Governor-General had not sent for him. He even went so far as to accuse His Excellency of having taken a wrong course. He practically charged him with having acted improperly. I was surprised to hear the right honorable member say in the course of the speech made by him a day or two ago that if anything happened to prevent the present Government carrying on the business of the country, he would dictate to the Governor-General the course to be taken by him. I have no doubt that when the right honorable gentleman called on the Governor on that celebrated Saturday afternoon, before he was officially sent for, he gave His Excellency an assurance that he could carry on the Government of the country, although he must have known that that assurance was not true. In that way I think that the right honorable gentleman deliberately misled the Governor-General, and when he says, in effect, as he did, the other day, that he is going to set aside the discretionary powers of His Excellency, and to do certain things himself, I think he assumes a power that is beyond his rights. I should not be surprised, however, at anything the right honorable member attempts. He sought on one occasion to deal in the same way with the Governor of New South Wales, but was well snubbed for his pains. He was told to mind his own business, and that the Governor would look after his own affairs.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I had nothing to do with that, so that the honorable member need not look at me as he is doing.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The right honorable member is such a striking figure in the House, and his characteristics are so attractive that I find it difficult to avoid turning towards him, more particularly as the Government benches are practically deserted.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Government supporters ought to be present.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The right honorable member for East Sydney lost no time in setting to work to get rid of the Watson Government. I should like, at this stage, to quote a few words from a speech made by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, which will live in history, and will, doubtless, be referred to on many occasions. I refer to the speech in which he dealt with the attitude which the Opposition would take up towards the Watson Government. I must say, without any feeling of warmth, that, unless the honorable and learned member for Ballarat had intended to give support to the Watson Government, he should not have recommended the Governor-General to send for the honorable member for Bland. He knew, as well as did any one in this Chamber, that the Labour Party in itself did not constitute a majority of the House. In that respect they were in the same position as the Barton Government and the Deakin Government, and if the Governor-General was to be guided in arriving at a decision by the question of whether the Labour Party constituted a majority of the House, the honorable and learned member should not have advised him to send for the honorable member for Bland, unless he intended to extend some measure of support to him. Unless he was prepared to support the leader of the Labour Party he was leading that honorable member into an absolutely false position. What did the honorable and learned member for Ballarat say on the first available opportunity, after taking up his position as one of the leaders of the Opposition? In speaking for the Opposition he said—

I am charged to extend to the Government the assurance that the Opposition propose to extend to them the utmost fair play.

That was the first statement which the honorable and learned member made in this House, after recommending the Governor-General to send for the honorable member for Bland, and after that honorable member had formed a Ministry. Then he went on to say—

The secret history of Cabinets is not written, or to be written; but once in my life-time I made the fatal mistake—and it was in connexion with a State coalition Government—of failing to insist on the acceptance of the resignation I had tendered. I saw plainly enough that what I believed to be mistakes in policy were about to be made. I was entirely opposed to the particular policy then suggested, but allowed myself to be persuaded that consideration for my party and my colleagues, in which I hope I have never failed, demanded that I should sacrifice my own views to those of others. I did sacrifice my own strong views to those of others. I did so on that occasion, but shall not do so again.

Even at the time that this speech, in which the honorable and learned member admitted that he had made a mistake in joining a Coalition Government, was made, he was advising his colleagues to join a coalition. The attempts to bring about such coalition were for some time unavailing, because it was considered to be a most unholy proposal. The final result was that several of his colleagues joined the present Prime Minister. I regret that the Coalition Government was ever brought into existence, not because of any personal considerations, but because of my regard for the Protectionist Party, and for those, calling themselves protectionists, who have given themselves away.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The mistake to which I referred was not in joining a coalition, but in agreeing to a policy to which I strongly objected.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I thought that the honorable and learned member was referring to the fact that he was a member of the Gillies-Deakin Coalition Government.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I was.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—And I understood that the honorable and learned member was referring to that Government.

Mr. DEAKIN.—I referred to the mistake made by me, not in joining the Coalition Government in question, but in allowing myself to be persuaded to remain in it in spite of the fact that I saw that what I believed to be mistakes were about to be made.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I take it that the honorable and learned member said, in his concluding sentence, that he made a mistake in remaining in that Coalition Government, but that he was not going to make another mistake of the kind.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable and learned member will yet burst up the present Coalition Government.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I desire to say that, although I have considered it necessary to make these quotations from a speech delivered by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, there is no one who holds him in higher estimation than I do, and that I trust that whatever may be our differences in political life, our private friendship will always continue.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Hear, hear!

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—In another part of the same speech the honorable and learned member said—

I think that we must all agree that it can only be maintained—

That is, the Watson Government—

even temporarily, by that honorable granting of fair play, to which I have already alluded; by that extension of consideration from one side of the House to the other, which enables us to discharge our common duties to the public.

Mr. McCAY.—Does the honorable member charge the honorable and learned member for Ballarat with having failed, so far as he was personally concerned, to carry out that promise?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — I have not made any charge against him. I have simply made one or two quotations from his speech, but I intend to show that the essence of the promise made by him on the occasion in question was not carried out. I repeat the statement, because I think it is necessary that it should be emphasized that the Watson Government, after being placed in power as the result of the action of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, should have received a greater measure of fair play than was vouchsafed to it by the then Opposition. A large section of the community comprising the political enemies of the Labour Party feel keenly that it did not get fair play owing to the intrigues of honorable members led by the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What did they expect?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—They did not expect anything from the right honorable gentleman. I am quite sure of that.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why should they; they turned us out?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—They did not turn us out. I have shown that it was the right honorable member for East Sydney, and not the Labour Party, who turned us out. It was, in my humble opinion, an unwise thing for the honorable and learned member for Ballarat to have made the question of the inclusion of the railway servants in the Arbitration and Conciliation Bill a vital one. I fancied that I had felt the pulse of the people; I knew my own feeling on the subject, and I told the honorable and learned member for Ballarat at the time, that if he did not include the railway servants some other Government would, and that the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill would never pass this House without their inclusion.

Mr. SPENCE. — And now honorable members opposite have swallowed the inclusion of the railway servants.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I admit that it was a high minded course to adopt, but in my opinion it was Quixotic to make a stand as the honorable and learned member for Ballarat did. With regard to the action of the combined Opposition, or a portion of the combined Opposition to the Watson Government, I feel that the statement made by the Prime Minister, to the effect that the battle ground was selected by the leader of the Watson Government, is absolutely incorrect. I may tell honorable members that, knowing the right honorable member for East Sydney as I do, I should not have been caught in the trap—because unquestionably a trap was laid for the honorable member for Bland. I heard the right honorable member for East Sydney, in an insinuating question across the table, lay the trap, when the honorable member for Bland said that if clause 48 of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill were amended as proposed, he would take it as a vital question.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—Was not that selecting the battle ground?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No; that was a selection of the clause and not of the motion for its recommitment, there is a vast difference between the two positions. The division on the amendment, proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, was taken at a late hour of the evening, and the amendment was not debated. I am aware that some honorable members who voted for the amendment regretted that they had given such a vote, when they came to understand what it was. The honorable member for Bland desired that we should go back again to the consideration of the clause with a view to its further discussion, and to the substitution of another amendment for that agreed to on the motion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—All the members to whom the honorable gentleman has referred voted for the recommitment of the clause.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—But the point is that the recommitment was made a combined test vote against the Watson Government, in order that honorable members opposed to that Government might obtain the vote of the Chairman of Committees, the honorable member for Laanecoorie. That was not a very reputable thing for those concerned.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There was no gain in that.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—There was the gain of the vote of the honorable member for Laanecoorie.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But there was the vote of the honorable member for Barker on the other side.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—The Opposition did not know that at the time.

Mr. McCAY.—Everybody knew of it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I desire to compare the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill as introduced by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat with that Bill, as it has been amended, that we may see if there is any reason why the honorable and learned member and other honorable members should take such great exception to it. As introduced by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, the Bill contained these words—but does not include a dispute relating to employment in the Public Service of the Commonwealth or of a State, or to employment by any public authority constituted under the Commonwealth or a State.

It was on the omission of these words involved in the amendment of the honorable member for Wide Bay that the Deakin Government went out, and not on the straight question of the inclusion of State public servants. In the Bill, as originally introduced by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, I find also that there were included persons engaged in agriculture, horticulture, and other industries connected with the soil.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We know all about that.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I objected to that; but I was only one in the Cabinet.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I also objected to it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Probably the right honorable member did. The only persons excepted under the interpretation of "industry" in the Bill as originally introduced were "persons engaged in domestic service." The amendment moved by the honorable member for Wide Bay included public servants of the States, and the amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Wannon carried the exemption of agricultural, horticultural, and farm labourers generally. I voted for that amendment. It will therefore be seen that there were provisions in the Bill, as originally introduced by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, which were very much more stringent than those in the Bill as it now stands. Honorable members were supporting a Bill including farm labourers, and yet they afterwards combined to put out the Watson Government when farm labourers were no longer included in the measure.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We have not to thank the Labour Party for that.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—With respect to the now notorious clause 48, as it appeared in the Bill as originally introduced, no attempt was to be made to decide by a ballot whether an application for preference or a common rule was approved by a majority of the persons engaged in the industry concerned. There was a hard and fast provision for preference in the Bill as introduced by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, and yet it was on an amendment which modified the stringency of that provision that the Watson Government were put out.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It was upon a qualification of that clause that they were put out.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Both the qualifications of that clause submitted in the amendments proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and by the honorable member for Bland, made the clause less stringent than as it was introduced by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat.

Mr. BAMFORD.—The clause did not matter at all—the Watson Government were to be “biffed” out.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am showing the unfair attitude which was adopted by the Opposition after the promise of fair play made to the Watson Government.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Those promises are always given.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not know that they are, but I know that the right honorable member for Swan said that the honorable and learned member for Ballarat was too easy, and ought not to say those things.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I said that the honorable and learned member was too complimentary.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Let us consider for a moment the difference between the amendment agreed to at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, and that suggested by the honorable member for Bland. The clause, as it stood in the Bill originally, provided for a preference to unionists, without any proviso. The proviso, which was the cause of the trouble, reads as follows:—

And provided further, that no such preference shall be directed to be given, unless the application for preference is, in the opinion of the Court, approved by a majority of those affected by the award, who have interests in common with the applicants.

That is held to mean that in order to decide the question a ballot would require to be taken, probably from Port Darwin to the south of Tasmania.

Mr. McCAY.—Who holds that?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is generally held, and I say that if discretion in the matter is taken out of the hands of the Court, there is no other way of arriving at a conclusion than by a ballot of those engaged in the industry, which may extend from Port Darwin to the south of Tasmania.

Mr. BAMFORD.—That would be so in the case of seamen.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It would be so in the case of seamen or wharf labourers, or of any industry having connecting links in various parts of the different States.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is not fair.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am aware that the right honorable member for Swan does not desire the provision at all.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I think it is unfair.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The right honorable member did not desire that the Bill should be passed at all.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why, I introduced and passed a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill myself.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The amendment which the honorable member for Bland proposed to substitute for that agreed to at the instance of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, read in this way—

The Court before directing that preference shall be given to the members of an organization, shall be satisfied that the organization substantially represents the industry affected in point of the numbers and competence of its members.

Mr. JOHNSON.—What does “substantially” mean?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It means that a discretion is left to the Court, and after obtaining information in any way it thinks fit the Court would decide whether or not those words were complied with.

Mr. HIGGINS. — “Substantially” is a word which the Judges themselves use.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is so. The amendment suggested by the honorable member for Bland in my humble opinion is safe, is practical, and is far and away a better amendment than that agreed to on the motion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, if the desire be to tone the clause down.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The question was whether Parliament or a Judge should make the law.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — Parliament must depute some one to administer a law of this kind, and the proposal was that it should be administered by a Judge of the High Court, who would be a man not brought up in the same way as those generally employed in any industry. His education would be different, his social surroundings would be different, and he would be likely, to deal in an absolutely fair way with those making an application under the clause, certainly not to unduly lean towards them.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He would only be a human being after all.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I should be prepared to trust the Judge. I can well understand the interjection coming from a right honorable member whose desire is to destroy the clause altogether.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not believe in preference, and the honorable gentleman does—that is the difference.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is not preference, that is a misnomer. I remember that on the morning after the amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Corinella was carried the Argus came out with a cross heading in large type, "Destruction of Preference to Unionists." There is no doubt in my mind that the clause does not specially provide for a preference to unionists; that was merely a misnomer suggested to please those who are opposed altogether to a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. The right honorable member for Swan was opposed to the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I introduced and passed such a Bill, and the honorable gentleman knows it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes, and it was no good either. It was an Arbitration Bill without any force in it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Labour Unions did not say so. They were very pleased with it, and they thanked me for it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—At any rate it is not of very much use.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Did the honorable gentleman ever do as much?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think I have done a little more. I was practically the instigator of the New South Wales Arbitration Act. The Government of which I was the Premier were the authors of the measure.

Mr. SPENCE.—Hear, hear! An effective measure!

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes. There has been friction in connexion with the administration of that measure; but whenever the old order of things is disturbed, there must be friction, until the public learn to understand the new order of things.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The measure I introduced was a copy of the New Zealand legislation of the time.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It may have been a copy of the New Zealand legislation of the time, but that legislation has since been seriously amended. Probably the New South Wales Arbitration Act requires some amendment. No one who frames a measure of legislation can say exactly how it will act until there has been practical experience of its working; but after the rough knots have been discovered and planed off, I think everything will go smoothly in New South Wales. At all events, I initiated the measure, and my Attorney-General passed it into law.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is the best Act in force in the States.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have quoted certain provisions from the Bill introduced by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat which are of a far more stringent character than those in the Bill as it now stands since it was passed through Committee by the honorable member for Bland. I think that both the House and the public have come to the conclusion that the honorable member for Bland was a most temperate leader, although he adhered to the policy which he was elected to support.

Mr. JOHNSON.—He was more temperate while on the Treasury benches than while on the cross benches, because he was compelled to be so.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Probably that was the case. When a man is in office he feels the responsibility of the position. That is one reason why I should have liked to see the honorable member for Bland and his colleagues remain in power for a longer time. Their sense of the responsibility attaching to office would have increased. I should like to know what there was to complain of in their attitude, since the Bill as they have passed it through Committee is a much less stringent measure than that originally introduced by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. To my mind, the amendment proposed by the Watson Government, giving the power of decision to the President of the Arbitration Court, instead of creating an unworkable machine, was the better one of the two, and I think that the House acted most unfairly in putting the Government out of office in the way in which they did.

Mr. WILSON.—How could it be unfair if it was in keeping with the rules of the House?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—When the honorable member has been a little longer in Parliament, he will know that there are ways of doing things which are fair, and other ways which are unfair. For instance, the night before last the present Government could have been put out by a considerable majority if the Opposition had felt inclined to put them out.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They would not have gone out on a snatch vote.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—My experience of some of the members of the Government is that it would take many teams of bullocks to haul them from the Treasury benches. On one occasion I heard it whispered, when an adverse vote had been given, that they would adopt what I think is the French system, of getting a friend to move a vote of confidence.

Mr. McLEAN.—We would move a motion affirming that we had no confidence in the Opposition.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I had much more confidence in the honorable member before he joined his present leader than I have now, or than I can have again. The Watson Government did not cling to office.

Mr. LONSDALE.—They chose their own battle-ground.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No. They did not. An attempt was afterwards made to bring about a coalition. That coalition now contains a mutilated half of the old Protectionist Party.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—More than half.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Very little more—only one or two.

Mr. JOHNSON.—What does the Opposition coalition contain?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Our coalition is in earnest, and it will be loyal.

Mr. LIDDELL.—What about the Ballarat Labour League?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not know about it; but I dare say that there are a few malcontents in the honorable member's electorate, and he will probably hear from them presently. I may be wrong in my ideas of consistency, but I have tried to be consistent during my political life. I cannot understand how those who have professed to be strong protectionists could join the leader of the Free-trade Party, who has many times expressed his determination to destroy the Tariff if he gets the opportunity. Whilst they are reaping the fruits of office, what is taking place outside? What are the free-trade leagues doing? In New South Wales they are making every preparation for a free-trade fight at the next elections. Has there not been a meeting of the Central League for that purpose, and are not its agents travelling all over the State at the present moment?

Mr. WILSON.—What are the protectionists doing in Victoria?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The protectionists would be doing nothing if it were not for those who have shown loyal.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Loyal to what?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have the greatest regard for the honorable member, but I differ from him on this matter. He has allowed the Protectionist Party to be weakened and partially destroyed.

Mr. KENNEDY.—What has the honorable member done to keep it together? He was the cause of the split.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No; I have done my best to keep it together. The right honorable member for Swan was the chief cause of the split.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have done nothing.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I may be wrong in my interpretation of loyalty, but I cannot understand how a loyal protectionist can join the arch free-trader of Australia, who has said times without number that his mission in this southern world is to bring about free-trade. The Free-trade Leagues are at present working as hard as they can in preparing to sweep the weakened Protectionist Party out of existence at the next general elections.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member is joined to a party—the Labour Party—which has no fiscal faith at all.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—When I was in Western Australia, the right honorable member had no fiscal faith. He, on one occasion, inquired what arguments ought to be used by a protectionist.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Was that at Kalgoorlie?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No; at Fremantle.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not remember the occurrence to which the honorable member refers. Is he alluding to a private conversation?

Mr. McCAY.—Did the honorable member for Hume tell the right honorable member what arguments to use?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I dare say that I did, though if he listened to one of my speeches he would find there plenty of arguments. Let me quote one or two words which have been said in regard to this coalition by the Rev. Dr. Bevan—

I have no faith in coalitions. The working out of great principles is best done by means of the opposition of great parties. This is so, not only in politics, but also in the church.

That is the opinion of a man who does not keep his eyes shut to politics. Although he is a free-trader, he is an able, and, I think, an honorable and conscientious man. In the same paper is the following report of a speech made by that great free-trade propagandist, Mr. Max Hirsch:—

He admitted that the Federal crisis was touching free-trade principles most acutely. During the last three years there had been an informal coalition between the Labour Party and the protectionists. Mr. Deakin practically said, "Give me protection, and I will give you the socialistic measures you demand." That alliance would continue unless another alliance took its place. "We have," the speaker continued, "to choose between two evils, and we must choose the lesser."

Mr. Max Hirsch is diametrically opposed to the views of the Labour Party. But when reference is made to the socialistic tendencies of that party, I would ask someone to say what Socialism is. Last night the honorable member for Darling quoted some dozen claims made by the Western farmers on the Government of Victoria.

Mr WILSON.—No, the North-eastern farmers.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Our public life, and also our private life, is largely regulated by the operations of State Socialism. It is well known that I do not agree with the extreme socialistic doctrines preached by some individuals. In reference to the tobacco industry, I say unhesitatingly that I am not at present in a position to decide whether the monopoly is of such a character that State interference would be warranted.

Mr. WILSON.—What does the honorable and learned member for Indi say about it?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—He may know more about it than I do. I am not sufficiently well acquainted with the circumstances to justify me in deciding that a State monopoly should be created, but certainly I think that the fullest possible inquiry should be made, and that a Royal Commission should be appointed with that object in view. A Parliamentary Select Committee would not suffice, because the fullest authority must be given to obtain information from all sources. If the present tobacco monopoly is operating to the injury of the general public, it must be prevented. Those honorable members who complain of the attitude of the Labour Party in regard to the tobacco industry are themselves in favour of introducing legislation for regulating the operations of trusts. Therefore I fail to recognise the consistency of their attitude. The Prime Minister has shown himself to be an opportunist of the most pronounced type. After having attacked the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, and having joined with others in expressing his disapproval of many of its provisions, he is now prepared to take it with all its alleged faults, and to adopt it as a Government measure. The right honorable gentleman is apparently prepared to swallow all his own statements, and to reverse the votes which he gave when he was sitting in opposition. He says that he is anxious to put an end to all friction between the Commonwealth Government and the States Governments, but at the same time he is prepared to adopt the Arbitration Bill with the provision relating to the railway servants, which has, perhaps, caused more friction between the States and the Commonwealth than anything that has occurred in this Parliament. I voted for that provision, and I intend to remain firm in that attitude. I opposed the inclusion of farm labourers within the scope of the measure, and I shall act consistently in that regard also. The honorable and learned member for Wannon has endeavoured to show that under the alliance which has been entered into with the Labour Party, it will be necessary for some honorable members to reverse their former votes; but if he had read the terms of the arrangement he would have seen that there was no necessity for anything of that kind. The Prime Minister tells us that he has determined to re-establish responsible government upon a firm basis; but I would ask how his position in regard to the Manufactures Encouragement Bill can be regarded as consistent with that declaration. If I were the leader of a Government, and I believed in the Manufactures Encouragement Bill, I should adopt it as a Government measure at all costs. The right honorable gentleman sneered at the Labour Party because of their attitude towards that measure, but he is pursuing a similar course. The leader of the Labour Party agreed to allow me as a private individual to take up the Bill, and to afford me every opportunity for passing it through the House. I do not suppose that the present Prime Minister will extend to me a similar courtesy.

Mr. McCAY.—Does the honorable member want it?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes; of course I do.

Mr. McCAY.—I thought the honorable member said that he would not accept anything from the Prime Minister.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I said that I would not accept any favour at his hands. I was speaking of personal favours. I regard the Manufactures Encouragement Bill as a most important one, and I am glad to say that the members of the Labour Party have taken up a commendable attitude with regard to the measure. Notwithstanding all the statements of the honorable and learned member for Wannon as to their insincerity, they are prepared to loyally support the Bill. When it reaches the Committee stage, those who desire that the industry shall be nationalized, will have a perfect right to do their best to make provision to that effect. If, however, they do not succeed, they will not seek to wreck the Bill.

Mr. McCAY.—That is rather a change of front.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I hope that I am not divulging any secret when I make that announcement.

Mr. WILSON.—Will the honorable member vote for the nationalization of the iron industry?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I shall vote for the matter to be dealt with by private enterprise, but I shall not attempt to destroy the Bill in the event of that proposal not being agreed to. I desire to see the Bill passed.

Mr. WILSON.—Then the honorable member is prepared to swallow one plank of the socialistic platform?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not know that the proposal to nationalize the iron industry would commit us to any greater degree of Socialism than is involved in the nationalization of our railways, our tramways, and our waterworks. Fortunately the New South Wales tramways are in the hands of the Government.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member was in favour of selling the railways and tramways some time ago.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I was in favour of selling the railways about twenty-two years ago.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It is not so long ago as that.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes, it was; I know, because the party to which my honorable friend belongs was in power. I was a comparative novice in public life at that time, and, having watched developments since, I have come to the conclusion that it is a matter for great congratulation that the railways of Australia are in the hands of the States. In Melbourne the tramways are in the hands of a private company, and are not worked to the same public advantage as are those of Sydney, where the travelling public derive the benefit of the interest which would otherwise go into the pockets of the proprietors of the tramways. If we cannot secure the development of our iron industry by private enterprise, there is no reason why the State should not undertake the work, so that we may derive the benefit of our national resources in the shape of iron deposits. If we were involved in war at any time, and were unable to import war material from abroad, we should be absolutely helpless, because we should have no means of manufacturing our own arms.

Mr. PAGE.—We cannot make a gun barrel yet.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—We cannot yet produce a sufficient amount of steel to manufacture even one gun barrel; therefore I think it is highly desirable that we establish the manufacture of iron and steel at the earliest possible opportunity. The Prime Minister has made a declaration of the policy of the Government with regard to the question of preferential trade. When I stated that I intended to propose a resolution with reference to preferential trade, the Postmaster-General dared me to bring it forward, and threatened me that it would be kicked out of the House. The Prime Minister has also more than once expressed himself as entirely opposed to the idea of establishing preferential trade relations with the old country. Now he has accepted the principle. His promise, however, is only a piece of political padding. If we are to deal with the subject of preferential trade upon practical lines, we must impose fresh duties upon foreign goods in order to enable us to give an appreciable preference to British manufactures. If I had been in a position to do so, I should have made an offer to Great Britain without waiting for her to approach us.

Mr. FULLER.—That comes very well from the honorable member, who all his life has been in favour of imposing taxes upon British imports.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am a protectionist, and not a revenue-tariffist.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—How would the honorable member raise revenue?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If revenue cannot be obtained in one way, it can be secured in another. If it be desired to encourage the industries of Australia, we must have an effective protectionist system. We cannot encourage our industries if we sweep away our Tariff walls. I do not believe in imposing duties upon small lines of imports, but upon goods which can be manufactured and consumed here upon a large scale. The present Tariff is more in the nature of a revenue than a protectionist Tariff. Honorable members have twitted me with having stated that I was in favour of fiscal peace. The fiscal question was raised not by the party to which I belong, but by the Prime Minister. I had to fight the right honorable member, and some of his principal supporters very bitterly in my own electorate, which was simply swarming with free-trade speakers during the last campaign. Sir William McMillan, the honorable and learned member for Parkes, the Prime Minister and others, did their best to secure my defeat.

Mr. WILSON.—The honorable member said he would not raise the fiscal issue.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I said that I did not wish to re-open the Tariff, because it had been in operation such a short time that we could scarcely judge of its practical working. Therefore, I was prepared to allow matters to rest for a time. Now, however, it has been proved that the Tariff is doing infinite harm to a large number of industries, particularly in Victoria. I have investigated the circumstances connected with from twelve to fourteen of our principal industries, and I find that imports are rapidly taking the place of locally-manufactured goods. The products of cheap and prison labour in other parts of the world, are being imported to the disadvantage of our own manufacturers, and workmen, and I have been informed by one large manufacturer that, unless some adjustment is made which will prevent the present large influx of imported goods, he will have to close his factory.

Mr. THOMAS.—I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call attention to the state of the House. A quorum not being present,

Mr. SPEAKER adjourned the House at 2.4 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Tuesday, 13 September, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I desire to make a personal explanation. I had been speaking for about an hour before the luncheon adjournment on Friday last, and when I re-entered the Chamber after luncheon, and found that there was not a quorum present, I asked the honorable member for Barrier if he would direct attention to the state of the House. I did so because the leader of the Government had been away from the Chamber for the whole of the time that I was speaking. He is seldom in the House, except when he is speaking himself, and many of his followers take the opportunity—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I rise to order. I submit that the honorable member may not cast reflections upon the actions of another honorable member while making a personal explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I understand the honorable member for Hume to be explaining the reasons why he desired the honorable member for Barrier to call attention to the state of the House on Friday last. So long as he confines himself to such reasons, he will be in order.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is exactly what I was doing. The leader of the Government, as soon as he heard that I was about to speak, took the opportunity to walk out of the Chamber, and he remained away during the whole of the time that I was speaking.

Mr. REID.—I really must object to these statements.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The front Government benches were empty during nearly the whole of the time that I was speaking.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—So were the Opposition benches.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It was not so with the Opposition benches. Putting aside my personal feelings in the matter, I say that such conduct was disrespectful to the House. I had not much to say after the luncheon adjournment, and would not have taken more than about twenty minutes to conclude my speech.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member's leader was also absent from the Chamber.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I felt that in justice to the importance of the subject, and to myself, the leader of the Government should have been present in the House, instead of being at the other end of the building, as I understand he was. My object was, not to count out the House, but to bring other members into the Chamber. I regret that the House was counted out; but I could not help it. My object was to compel the members who sit on the Government side of the Chamber to attend to their duties.

Mr. REID.—Since my name has been introduced into the explanation made by the honorable member for Hume, I think that I shall not be out of order in making a personal explanation. He stated that I went out of the Chamber just before he began his speech. That may have occurred; but I wish to say that he did not influence my movements on the occasion, and that my absence from the Chamber was due to some call of public duty. My experience is that my presence influences the honorable member as a red rag does a bull, and that the only way to preserve his mental equilibrium is for me to occasionally go out of the Chamber when he is speaking.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I desired the right honorable member to hear what I had to say. I did not wish to speak behind his back.

ALIEN RESTRICTION ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I wish to know from the Minister of External Affairs whether, having regard to his declarations last year as to the six hatters case, he intends to bring in a Bill to amend the Alien Restriction Act so as to remedy the state of affairs of which he complained. If this is not his intention, why is it not?

Mr. REID.—I should like to remind the honorable and learned member of the declaration which I made upon the subject before the people of Australia. I placed the matter before them as every sensible politician places a matter before the public. If I have the power to alter the Act in a certain direction, I will do so the moment I discover the fact; but an alteration of the Act is not part of the policy of this coalition Government. I should like to say that one of my strong objections to the painful incident referred to was the unjustifiable delay which occurred in dealing with the case, during which the men concerned were kept in durance vile. I guarantee that there will be more prompt administration, so far as I am concerned, and that no such painful experience will occur in the future.

FORMATION OF THE MINISTRY.

Mr. FRAZER.—In last Friday's Herald an honorable senator is reported to have said—

Mr. Reid offered a portfolio to a Western Australian; who would not pocket his pride and accept the office.

Is it a fact that a Western Australian representative was offered a portfolio in the coalition Government?

Mr. REID.—I can understand the question of the honorable member, in view of the peculiar circumstances in which he has recently been placed.

Mr. FRAZER.—Do I understand that the right honorable gentleman refuses to answer the question?

Mr. REID.—Absolutely.

Mr. FRAZER.—And he is the self-appointed representative of Western Australia!

Mr. REID.—I absolutely refuse to enter into these matters.

MILITARY ORNAMENTS AND BADGES.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I wish to repeat the question which I asked of the Minister of Defence on Friday last. Has he yet come to a determination to have the ornaments, buttons, badges, and so forth, used by our Military Forces made in the Commonwealth?

Mr. McCAY.—I have made inquiries, and I have ascertained that, during the term of office of my predecessor, Senator Dawson, the buttons were ordered from England, but the badges have not yet been ordered. I am now making inquiries to ascertain if it is not possible, as I believe it will be found to be possible, to obtain as good an article at as cheap a price from Australian workmen as could be obtained abroad.

MINISTERIAL ATTITUDE TOWARDS SOCIALISM.

Mr. WATSON.—I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question which I presume he can answer for his better half as well as for himself. Is the statement attributed to the Postmaster-General, that it is the intention of the Government to interfere with the exploitation of the butter industry by certain gentlemen who are engaged in private enterprise, correct? If so, how does he reconcile it with his own statement that he does not believe in Socialism, or the extension of its principle?

Mr. REID.—I regret to say that I have not yet received any communication from my honorable colleague the Postmaster-General upon the subject to which my honorable friend refers. In the absence of any information as to my honorable colleague's utterance, I am not in a position to answer the question.

TENDERS FOR DEFENCE SUPPLIES.

Mr. MAUGER.—I desire to ask the Minister of Defence whether he will take steps to have applied to the other States regulations similar to those in force in Victoria, which make it imperative that the tenderers shall manufacture the goods supplied to the Department upon their own premises, and shall not sublet their contracts in any way?

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member was good enough to inform me that he proposed to ask this question, but I have not yet had time to make inquiries. I can promise, however, that the fullest inquiry shall be made, and that everything shall be done to insure that the workmen, as well as the contractors, receive every consideration.

PAPER.

Mr. REID laid upon the table the following paper:—

Report of the Royal Commission on the Affray at Goaribari Island, British New Guinea, on the 6th March, 1904, together with the proceedings, minutes of evidence, and appendices.

Ordered to be printed.

COUNT OUT OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I desire to know from the Prime Minister whether he is accurately reported in this morning's newspapers as having stated that his party, when in opposition, refrained from such tactics as attempting to count out the House; and, if so, whether he is aware that during one sitting his party attempted to count out the House no less than twenty times?

Mr. REID.—If any such thing occurred I can only say that it affords sufficient proof that I was not present.

Mr. McDONALD.—The right honorable gentleman was present.

Mr. REID.—I do not remember the circumstances referred to.

HIGH COMMISSIONER.

Mr. CROUCH.—I wish to ask the Prime Minister, in reference to his announcement that the Government did not propose to appoint a High Commissioner until after a conference had been held between the Commonwealth and the States Governments, whether he will assure the House that he will not attempt to appoint the High Commissioner without previous legislation?

Mr. REID.—I not only will not, but I cannot do so.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Yes, the Government could appoint the High Commissioner without salary.

VENTILATION OF THE CHAMBER.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I desire to ask you, Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the House Committee, if any measures have been taken to improve the ventilation of this Chamber, and, if so, what means have been adopted to increase the circulation of the air.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Immediately after the honorable member for Hunter had called the attention of the House to the subject of the ventilation of the Chamber, some time since, a meeting of the House Committee was held, and it was decided that, instead of the fresh air being forced into the Chamber at a point just above the wood-work, and thereby, as was pointed out by the honorable member, leaving undisturbed a body of vitiated air near the floor, the air should be forced in through openings beneath the seats all round the Chamber. The work was immediately put in hand, and was completed some three or four weeks ago, since which time the new system has been in full operation. As I had not heard any complaints, and as I was aware that circulation of air in the Chamber had been rendered much more complete, I presumed that success had been achieved. I was, however, informed on one occasion that in at least one portion of the Chamber the air was very bad, and I have taken steps to-day to have a further quantity of fresh air forced into the Chamber, and to ascertain whether there are any corners in which the air still stagnates. If honorable members will inform me from time to time as to the condition of the atmosphere, I shall be able to deal with the matter more thoroughly. If there are causes for complaint, and they are not mentioned to me, naturally they will remain unremedied. I shall be pleased if honorable members will mention to me any matter which, in their view, requires attention.

TELEGRAPHIST AT JERVIS BAY.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS asked the Postmaster-General, upon notice—

Whether the position of telegraphist at Jervis Bay, where messages involving the safety of life and property are frequently sent and received, is to remain "non-official," with a salary of £72 per annum?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The answer to the honorable member's question is as follows:—

The position of the telegraphist at Jervis Bay is now being inquired into, with a view to a full reply being given as soon as the necessary information can be obtained.

DARLINGTON POST-OFFICE SITE.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS asked the Minister of Home Affairs, upon notice—

Whether it is correct—

1. That the State of New South Wales is debiting the Commonwealth with £280 for land at Darlington upon which a post-office is being erected by the Government?

2. That the land in question was vested in the Darlington Borough Council, and that the said council, being desirous of getting a post-office suitable to the locality, freely ceded the rights they possessed to the land for that purpose subsequently to the control of the Post and Telegraph Department passing to the Commonwealth?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The answers to the honorable member's questions are as follow:—

1 and 2. The Municipal Council of Darlington offered, as a site for a post-office, part of the area vested in them for Town Hall purposes. This was accepted, but it was found that the council had no power to dispose of the land, and the State Government was moved to resume the part desired for postal purposes. The resumption has taken place, but the State Government now intimate that they have no power to alienate, but they will have no objection to the Commonwealth acquiring the land under the compulsory acquisition provisions of the Property for Public Purposes Acquisition Act, at a valuation of £280

CONCILIATION AND ARBITRATION BILL.

Debate resumed from 17th August (vide page 4264), upon motion by Mr. WATSON, as amended—

That the Bill be now recommitted to a Committee of the whole House for the reconsideration of clauses 4, 37, 38, 39, 46, 52, 67, 68, and 90 and Schedule B, and the consideration of proposed new clauses 52A, and 95A.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—I did not happen to speak when this debate was initiated. Possibly, by some prescience, I thought it would be more convenient that I should be in a position to make a few remarks at the present stage. I wish to say that the Government have considered the proposals embodied in the motion, and are perfectly prepared to go into Committee for the purpose of considering them. As to, I think, all the propositions but one, we are in a position practically to approve of them. Many of them are unimportant, others are intended to remove drafting difficulties, and the only one of serious importance, to my mind, is the first. We have not had the advantage of a discussion, either upon the second reading of the Bill or in Committee, upon the precise matter involved in the first proposal, and I shall be interested to hear the reasons which influenced the late Administration in suggesting this alteration.

Mr. HIGGINS.—What is the first proposal?

Mr. REID.—To eliminate from clause 4, paragraph b of the definition of "industrial dispute." The clause provides that, apart from disputes between organizations of employes and employers, or organizations on both sides, the Registrar can certify that existing disputes extending beyond the limits of any one State are disputes which in the public interest ought to be brought within the jurisdiction of the Court. The proposal of the late Administration was that this provision should be omitted.

Mr. WATSON.—Such cases are provided for in another sub-clause.

Mr. REID.—That is the point with regard to which I should like to hear an explanation by my honorable friend. I intend to suggest an alteration in the paragraph as it stands, which, I think, would effect a great improvement, but I should first like to hear, in Committee, the reasons to be advanced for omitting the provision.

Mr. GROOM.—What is the right honorable gentleman's proposal?

Mr. REID.—I think that it would be only fair to the late Administration if we were to first hear what were their reasons for suggesting that the paragraph should be omitted.

Mr. PAGE.—What do the Government propose to do with regard to clause 48?

Mr. REID.—That is not now embraced in the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER.—As a matter of practice, I would point out that, if there is no objection to the recommittal of clause 4, and if the question is simply as to what shall be done with clause 4 upon its recommittal, that matter could be most appropriately dealt with in Committee. If there is any difference of opinion as to whether the clause should be recommitted, that matter should be debated at the present stage.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I am not quite certain as to the exact stage we have reached in this debate. If the effect of my speaking now would be to close the debate, I do not wish to bring about that result.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—I desire to move an amendment providing for the recommittal of clause 32A to enable me to again bring before the Committee a new clause which was partially discussed in my absence on a previous occasion.

Mr. SPEAKER.—As there seems to be some uncertainty as to the rights of honorable members to speak to the motion, I may inform the House that the position is that the motion we are now discussing was moved by the then Prime Minister, the honorable member for Bland. The only other member who spoke to that motion was the honorable and learned member for Corinella, who concluded with an amendment, and the whole of the debate which followed, and which extended over several days, was upon that amendment. That being so, the only honorable members who cannot speak to this motion, if they now desire to do so, are the honorable member for Bland and the Minister of Defence.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I wish to move the recommittal of clause 92, in order to enable me to submit a new sub-clause, to be known as sub-clause 2. I gave notice of my amendment to the late Government, and when the Bill was originally discussed in Committee, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat supported a proposition which I then made to so amend the clause as to enable a witness to give evidence in camera if there was any danger of the disclosure of a trade secret. The then Government promised to recommit the clause if I desired them to do so, and I am glad to say that I subsequently prepared an amendment which the late Attorney-General was able to accept, and which met, not only my own wishes, but those of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. I think that when it is put forward the Committee will agree to it.

Mr. McCAY.—What is the amendment?

Mr. CROUCH.—I understood that when I first mentioned my proposal it also had the support of the honorable and learned member for Corinella.

Mr. REID.—I do not object to the recommittal.

Amendment (by Mr. G. B. EDWARDS) agreed to—

That after the word "clauses," line 5, the figures "32A," be inserted.

Amendment (by Mr. CROUCH) agreed to—

That after the figures "90" the figures "92" be inserted.

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—If the amendment of which notice has been given by the leader of the Opposition be carried, it may be necessary to reconsider clause 28, because the Bill as it now stands gives no power to an employer to submit a dispute to the Court. That evidently is due to a mistake on the part of the draftsman. The difficulty is partly overcome by paragraph b of clause 4, which it is now proposed to excise, and if that provision be omitted it may be necessary to reconsider clause 28. I therefore move—

That after the figure "4" the figures "28" be inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I move—

That after the figures "52" the words "62, paragraph b," be inserted.

My object is to secure the amendment of paragraph b.

Mr. REID.—In what way?

Mr. McDONALD.—It will be time enough to discuss the matter when we go into Committee.

Mr. REID.—I merely desire to know the nature of the proposed amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—The feeling I entertain towards these proposals and the Bill generally may be simply stated. A majority in this House has carried provisions which in my view render the Bill absolutely unworkable and valueless, and I therefore do not consider that any responsibility in connexion with it rests upon my shoulders as a friend of the measure. I contend that the Bill will not be availed of.

Mr. REID.—Will the honorable member mention in what respect he considers it valueless?

Mr. WATSON.—I hold that the amendment, carried on the motion of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, is absolutely unworkable, and, so far as I have been able to obtain any indication of the position from the unions, they are not likely to register under it. That being so, the Bill must fail in the object for which it was ostensibly introduced. It can hardly be claimed that that will be the result simply because preference is denied to them; but, as I indicated when the main question was being discussed during the late crisis, it will be rather because it is absolutely impossible in many cases to prove when a union comprises a majority of those engaged in the trade to which it relates. The honorable member for Moira, speaking in Committee, before the question was made a party one—and therefore I presume when he was free to express an opinion based on the practical knowledge which he undoubtedly possesses—

Mr. KENNEDY.—When was I in a different position?

Mr. WATSON.—When party considerations came into play the honorable member seemed to lose sight of those aspects of the matter which he had put forward whilst speaking in Committee. According to Hansard, page 2640, he said on the 23rd June last, when discussing the amendment moved on clause 48 by the honorable and learned member for Corinella—

I have said that I have not studied the amendment proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corinella; but, from what I have heard of it, it would appear to be open to objection, inasmuch as it would make it necessary to secure the opinion of the majority of the workers in any particular industry.

Although the honorable member had not studied the amendment at that time, he had become seized of the crux of it, namely, that it insisted upon a majority of those affected by an award approving of any request for preference. The honorable member is a practical man, and particular attention should therefore be paid to his opinions. On the occasion to which I have referred, he went on to say—

In the earlier clauses of the Bill we have laid it down that 100 members may constitute an organization having a right to submit a proposal to the Court. If people are compelled to go beyond that to find out the absolute number of workers in any particular industry, that they may be able to prove to the Court that they have a majority of those employed in the industry behind them, their task would appear to me to be an almost impossible one.

I said that the honorable member was absolutely right. If there is a majority of honorable members honestly anxious to pass a measure which can be taken advantage of, this provision must be altered. Honorable members have so far decided not to alter it, and it seems to me that there is now no course open to those who are in favour of an effective measure, other than to throw the whole responsibility for the failure to pass such a measure upon the shoulders of those who have put this Bill in the shape in which it now appears. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat is another witness whom I desire to call. The honorable and learned gentleman said—

The Attorney-General urged that the clause proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corinella was open to objection, because it imposed difficulties upon the Court in the way of interpretation. I admit that it does. But, I say deliberately, without any hesitation, that it imposes on the Court a smaller burden than would be imposed by the clause which the Government have asked to substitute for it.

The latter part of that opinion certainly gives some reason why the proposal submitted by the late Government should not have been accepted, but it does not at all answer the fact that the difficulty exists in regard to the interpretation of the amendment proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corinella. As one who was anxious to see this Bill passed in such a shape that it could be taken advantage of by the people generally, and believing, as I do, that, in the shape in which it now is, it cannot be effective, and that, so far as the great majority of unionists are concerned, no attempt will be made to take advantage of it, I say that our duty is to put the whole responsibility for this state of affairs upon honorable members opposite, the wreckers of the measure.

Question, as amended, resolved in the affirmative.

In Committee—(Recommittal).

Clause 4 (Interpretation).

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—The honorable member for Bland apparently does not propose to move the amendments given notice of by the late Government.

Mr. WATSON.—I propose to take no further part in it.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. WATSON.—We will not be parties to putting a fraud on the people.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member appears to have accepted what he says is a fraud.

Clause 28 (Disputes of which the Court has cognisance).

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—I mentioned this clause as requiring to be reconsidered on the assumption that the amendment, of which notice had been given by the leader of the Opposition, would have been persevered in. I do not intend to move any amendment myself, but I should like to draw attention to the fact that as the Bill now stands an employer has no power to submit a dispute to the Court—it must be submitted by an association of employers or an association of employes. It is necessary in the case of employes that an association should act for the whole, because one man could not do so; but there may be only one employer who may have a thousand hands in his employ, and as a matter of right that employer should have the power of submitting to the Court a dispute between himself and his workmen. As the Bill now stands, no such power is given.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 37—

The award of the Court shall be binding on—
(a) all parties to the industrial dispute who appear or are represented before the Court;

(b) all parties who have been summoned to appear before the Court as parties to the dispute, whether they have appeared in answer to the summons or not, unless the Court is of opinion that they were improperly summoned before it as parties;

(c) all organizations and persons on whom the award is declared by the Court to be binding as a common rule; and

(d) all members of organizations bound by the award.

Mr. REID.—In connexion with this clause I propose to adopt the amendment suggested by the late Administration. I therefore move—

That after the word "is," line 13, the words "at any time," be inserted.

Paragraph c will then read—

All organizations and persons on whom the award is at any time declared by the Court to be binding as a common rule;

There is an obvious utility in the insertion of these words, as otherwise technical objections might arise as to the powers of the Court in enforcing its own orders.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 38—

When an award or order of a State Industrial Authority is inconsistent with an award or order lawfully made by the Court, the latter shall prevail, and the former shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be invalid.

Mr. REID.—Two amendments suggested by the late Administration in this clause are, in my opinion, very proper amendments to make. I move—

That after the word "When," line 1, the words "a State law or," be inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments (by Mr. REID) agreed to.

That after the word "award," line 1, the word "or," be left out.

That after the word "order," line 1, the words "or determination" be inserted.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I point out to the Committee that by inserting this clause in the Bill we are going far beyond our powers under the Constitution. This point was previously taken by the honorable and learned member for Angas, but honorable members did not see fit to accept the honorable and learned member's view. I desire now to express my thorough agreement with the position then taken up by the honorable and learned member. I think this provision is beyond our powers and it should not be included in the Bill. I formally record my objection to the clause.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 39—

Subject to the Constitution, no award of the Court shall be challenged, appealed against, reviewed, quashed, or called in question in any other Court on any account whatever.

Mr. DEAKIN (Ballarat).—I notice that the first words of this clause, to which attention was drawn when the Bill was last discussed during the time of the late Government, have not been withdrawn. It was, I think, the honorable and learned member for Indi who first called attention to the fact that the words "Subject to the Constitution" might convey a very serious implication. The clause, without those words, is clear; and I was able to inform honorable members, when the Bill was last before us, of the circumstances under which the words were introduced. The object was to satisfy the lay members of the Barton Cabinet that there was no intention to override the Constitution. For that purpose only were the words introduced; and I pointed out at the time that the clause, as it stood, would suffice. In the subsequent discussion in Committee, it was stated that "subject to the Constitution" having been introduced, the implication on the part of the Court probably would be that it was intended that, even if the Court created under this Bill were to override, to ignore, or to contravene some of the express provisions of the Act, its action could not be called in question in any other Court whatever. In point of fact, from the insertion of these words the implication would be that the Court would not be subject to anything except the Constitution, not even to the Bill under which it was created. That was a very serious consideration, and I followed the honorable and learned member for Indi in asking that special attention should be given to the point. I presume that attention was given by the late Government; but their inaction seems to me sufficiently momentous to, at all events, call for explanation. I think it would require a good deal of argument to satisfy the Committee that, when we are passing a Bill for the purpose of creating a Court with certain very large and definite powers, we, at the same time, intend that any illegal action of the Court, so far as that action would be made illegal by transcending or violating part of this Bill, shall not be called in question in any other Court. The additions which are to be proposed at the end of the clause are a decided improvement, and with them I entirely agree; but those additions appear to be called for quite independently of the words "Subject to the Constitution." The proposal is to add two sub-clauses which allow the President, if he thinks fit, to obtain the opinion of the High Court, and authorize the High Court to hear and determine the question and remit the opinion to the President. That is a very useful and proper provision, but it does not affect the prior issue. The question is whether we intend, by the insertion of the words, "Subject to the Constitution," to set the Court free from the obligations which we ourselves have so carefully and elaborately set out in the Bill, or whether we do not mean what the clause originally said, namely, that no decision of the Court is to be challenged, appealed against, or called in question by any other Court, unless the decision is contrary to the Constitution—a restriction which, even if we wished, we could not evade or disqualify—or contrary to this Bill. I take it that the intention was—I know it was my intention when the clause was drafted—that the Arbitration Court was to possess the powers set out in the Bill, and no others—just those powers for a specified purpose, and was not to be set free from any obligation, or to be allowed to create an authority for itself without the sanction of Parliament, as expressed in the Bill. I move—

That the words "Subject to the Constitution" be left out.

Mr. REID.—It is evident that the words "Subject to the Constitution" may lead to confusion, and as they are absolutely unnecessary in any of the Commonwealth Acts, which are, every line and word, subject to the Constitution, I accept the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. REID.—In regard to this clause, the late Government made certain suggestions which I propose to adopt, if the Committee are agreeable. I move—

That the following new sub-clauses be inserted:—

"(2) The President may, if he thinks fit, in any proceeding before the Court, at any stage and upon such terms as he thinks fit, state a case in writing for the opinion of the High Court upon any question arising in the proceeding which, in his opinion, is a question of law.

"(3) The High Court shall hear and determine the question, and remit the case with its opinion to the President, and may make such order as to costs as it thinks fit."

It is obviously desirable that the President should have the opportunity to take the course which this amendment would empower him to take in the interests of all parties, so that the law may be ascertained at the earliest possible moment on perhaps some vital point.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—Although the members of the late Administration do not take any responsibility for the Bill as it stands, still I think that in courtesy to the Prime Minister, I ought to state that the words which he proposes should be inserted were adopted by the late Government in pursuance of the promise made to the honorable and learned member for Corinella in the course of the discussion.

Mr. McCAY.—I think the promise was made to the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs also may have spoken on the matter, but I was not aware of the fact. At all events, the desire was to, as far as possible, prevent litigation in the ordinary Courts with regard to the proceedings of the Arbitration Court. So far as the late Government were concerned, they did not recommend this proposal, but simply promised to submit it in pursuance of the generally expressed wish of honorable members, and, of course, as we promised so we performed. I should myself prefer to omit the words, inasmuch as the Judge of the Arbitration Court will be a member of the High Court, and it is very improbable that he will make a mistake in the law of any matter before him. However, the Committee now understand how these additional words came to be proposed.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 46—

- (c) to fix maximum penalties for any breach or non-observance of any term of an order or award, not exceeding One thousand pounds in the case of an organization or Ten pounds in the case of any individual member of an organization.

Provided that in the case of an organization of employers consisting of less than one hundred members, the maximum penalty may be fixed at any sum not exceeding such sum as would, when multiplied by the number of members, amount to One thousand pounds.

- (d) to impose penalties, not exceeding the maximum penalties mentioned in the last preceding paragraph, for any breach or non-observance of any term of an order or award proved to the satisfaction of the Court to have been committed, and to specify to whom such penalties, in whole or in part, shall be paid.

- (f) to declare, by any award, that any practice, regulation, rule, custom, term of agreement, condition of employment or dealing whatsoever determined by the award in relation to any industrial matter shall be a common rule of any industry in connexion with which the dispute arises.

- (g) to direct with due regard to local circumstances within what limits of area, if any, and subject to what conditions and exceptions, the common rule so declared shall be binding upon the persons engaged in the industry, whether as employers or employees, and whether members of an organization or not, and to fix penalties for any breach or non-observance of the common rule so declared.

Mr. REID.—I move—

That after the word "organization," line 4, the words "or an employer, not being a member of an organization bound by the order or award."

The effect of the amendment is to make a single employer liable to any penalty up to the maximum, always subject, of course, to the discretion of the Court.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments (by Mr. REID) agreed to—

That after the word "of," line 8, the words "members of" be inserted.

That after the word "penalties," line 17, the following words be inserted, "fixed (or if maximum penalties have not been fixed not exceeding the maximum penalties which could have been fixed) under."

That the words "mentioned in," line 17, be left out.

That the words "and to specify to whom such penalties in whole or in part shall be paid," paragraph d, be left out.

That after the word "award," line 25, the words "or order" be inserted.

That the word "the," line 29, be omitted with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "an."

That the words "and to fix penalties for any breach or non-observance of the common rule so declared," paragraph g, be left out.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 52—

Where any organization or person bound by an order or award has committed any breach or non-observance of any term of the order or award for which the Court has fixed a maximum penalty, proceedings for recovery of the penalty may be taken in any Court of Summary Jurisdiction constituted by a police, stipendiary, or special magistrate.

Amendment (by Mr. REID) agreed to—

That all the words after the word "award," line 3, be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "any penalties which the Court has power to impose may be imposed by any Court of summary jurisdiction constituted by a police, stipendiary, or special magistrate."

(2) Any such penalty may be sued for and recovered by—(a) the registrar; or (b) any organization which is affected, or whose members or any of them are affected, by the breach or non-observance; or (c) any member of an organization who is affected by the breach or non-observance."

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—It appears to me that this clause, even as amended, goes rather too far.

Mr. REID.—The object of the clause is to give power to the Court in a particular case to give part of the penalty to a member of an organization which comes before the Court, as distinct from giving the penalty to the organization. The object is to meet the ends of justice in particular cases.

Mr. CONROY.—Does it not go rather farther than that? I am satisfied if it goes no farther than the amendment indicates.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 62—

(1) Any of the following associations may, on compliance with the prescribed conditions, be registered in the manner prescribed as an organization :—

(b) Any association of not less than one hundred employees in or in connexion with any industry.

Provided that no such organization shall be entitled to any declaration of preference by the Court when and so long as its rules or other binding decisions permit the application of its funds to political purposes, or require its members to do anything of a political character.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I move—

That all the words after “industry,” line 7, be left out.

When clause 48 was under discussion and was carried, the general impression was that it was going to be recommitted, and in those circumstances this proviso was inserted in clause 62. In any case, the words of the proviso are only downright hypocrisy, so far as the operation of the Bill is concerned.

Mr. McCAY.—Did not the honorable member vote for their insertion?

Mr. McDONALD.—In the peculiar circumstances in which the Committee was placed at the time, I could not do anything else. I did not get a chance to vote against them. I had to accept either the honorable and learned gentleman's amendment or the other. I had to accept the lesser of two evils. It is no use to say that this is a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, when it bears upon its face the stamp of fraud and hypocrisy. I desire the omission of the proviso because it would be impossible to put it into practice; for everything which a trade organization may do, must depend on political organization. Under these circumstances, even if this proviso were carried, it would be practically useless.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella—Minister of Defence).—I must confess that I am a little at a loss to understand the proposal of the honorable member for Kennedy to omit a proviso for which he voted. He says that it was the lesser of two evils. Well, it was a proviso which the late Government accepted.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—As the lesser of two evils.

Mr. McDONALD.—They were in the same position as I was.

Mr. McCAY.—When it was being discussed the late Government did not say anything about the proviso being the lesser of two evils. Not one of them said at that time that it was anything but a good amendment.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I beg the honorable and learned gentleman's pardon.

Mr. SPENCE.—How simple the Minister is to suppose that they would!

Mr. McCAY.—I am surprised at the interjection of the honorable member for Darling, because I was certainly under the impression—obviously a false one—that at any rate the principle of this proposal was one which he favoured. I suppose that I misunderstood him.

Mr. SPENCE.—I should think so; I was strongly against it the whole time.

Mr. McCAY.—What was the position at the time this amendment was carried? There was before the Committee a proposal that I happened to move containing exactly the same words as now appear in this proviso, with the exception that it went a good deal further, and proposed practically to say to unions that they should not be plaintiffs in arbitration court proceedings as long as their rules permitted the application of their funds to political purposes, or required their members to do anything of a political character. The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs moved, as an amendment to my amendment, to substitute the words which appear in this proviso—Shall be entitled to any declaration of preference by the Court.

Honorable members will recollect that I moved, as an amendment to that amendment, to insert certain words.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable and learned member was prolific in amendments.

Mr. McCAY.—I am still prepared to stand by them all. I still believe that what I said in connexion with them was correct, and I am not prepared to abandon that opinion under any circumstances.

Mr. CROUCH.—Does not the honorable and learned gentleman think that this provision should be in clause 48?

Mr. McCAY.—I do not know whether it should be in clause 48 or not, but it does very well where it is, so far as I am able to judge. The late Administration did not propose to recommit this clause and alter the drafting.

Mr. CONROY.—I asked that it should be recommitted.

Mr. McCAY.—The late Administration, which says that it accepted this proviso as the lesser of two evils, continued to accept the evil when it proposed to recommit the Bill.

Mr. McDONALD.—What about the then Opposition and the provision relating to the railway servants? Are not honorable members on the other side now swallowing the whole lot?

Mr. McCAY.—I shall read to the honorable member something that I said on the 23rd June.

Mr. TUDOR.—The Minister of Defence is not the whole of the Government, is he?

Mr. McCAY.—I am not, any more than the honorable member is the whole of the Opposition, even though he is their whip, and a very important member of the party.

Mr. CONROY.—I asked the late Ministry to insert this in clause 48, and they refused to do so.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable and learned member is tied up; why does he not keep quiet?

The CHAIRMAN.—Order. I ask honorable members, especially those in responsible positions, to refrain from interchanging remarks across the Chamber, and to allow the speaker to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. McCAY.—I was saying, when I was interrupted, that the late Administration, although it had ample time for considering what clauses it would recommit, and decided, in accordance with its announcement, to recommit clause 48, did not propose to recommit clause 62.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Because it was a bargain.

Mr. McCAY.—I do not know why the honorable member for Kennedy, who is a member of such a solid, indivisible, and all-united party as we read about in the daily press is allowed to break away from his leaders.

Mr. PAGE.—It refutes the argument about the caucus.

Mr. FRAZER.—Because we have freedom of action.

Mr. McCAY.—One is always pleased to learn these things, however late in the day.

Mr. WATSON.—That condition of affairs has been always existent.

Mr. McCAY.—If recent events have produced that very desirable result, they have not been in vain.

Mr. WATSON.—It has never been anything different, except in the imagination of the honorable and learned gentleman and his friends.

Mr. McCAY.—It will be recollected that this particular amendment, in its present form, was carried by a majority of one. The late Prime Minister proposed to reconsider its verbiage with a view to its recommitment later on if it were thought necessary, and, from circumstances over which I presume he had no control, he decided at the last minute to accept its exact verbiage, and Dame Rumour does say that it had some effect on the division which took place a few minutes later. But, apart from that, the late Government accepted this amendment, and the honorable members who spoke on it—particularly such members as the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs, and I think the honorable and learned member for Indi, and others—drew attention to the fact that here was a plain, and a more proper, dividing line than the one suggested in my amendment. I cannot say that I yet agree with that view. But, as I said long ago, after the amendment relating to the railway servants was passed, and before even clause 48 was dealt with, whether certain proposals of mine were agreed to or not, I would support the third reading of the Bill. I have no reason to recede from the position which I then took up. I would ask the honorable member for Kennedy, who has now learned from the lips of the late Attorney-General, as well as from the honorable member for Bland, that on a previous occasion an agreement was arrived at that this particular amendment should be accepted, whether he thinks he ought to place his leaders in such an embarrassing position—

Mr. HIGGINS.—We are free from bargains now.

Mr. McDONALD.—What happened to the Minister of Defence upon a former occasion, when he left the Turner Party and joined the McLean Government?

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member is referring to some action of mine upon which my State constituents arbitrated several years ago.

Mr. McDONALD.—They decided against the honorable and learned member.

Mr. McCAY.—They did, and I did not pull a poor mouth about the matter, or utter any complaint. I trust that whenever I have the misfortune to have a spoonful of gruel presented to me I will take it with the best possible grace. I ask the honorable member for Kennedy not to place his leaders in the false position of having to vote against an amendment which they accepted, and of which they approved in the most practical way by declining to submit a proposal in favour of the recommitment of the clause.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Do not worry about us.

Mr. McCAY.—I am not worrying. The honorable member, I understand, wishes me to worry about myself, but I have not begun to do so yet. I repeat that the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs proposed this amendment, and that the late Administration accepted it. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne now declares that honorable members opposite are free from any bargains into which they previously entered. I venture to hold the view that they are not free, if they wish to be consistent. They agreed to this amendment, and they must have regarded it, individually at any rate, as a practical one. I think that the interjection of the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne was really a casual one, and that he scarcely considers himself free to vote against a proposal which he so fully accepted on a former occasion. So far as the proviso itself is concerned, I think that the Committee were practically agreed not only that it was justifiable, but that it was desirable that some line of demarcation should be drawn between political and industrial purposes in organizations either of employers or employés. The only question that arose was as to where that line should be drawn. I think it was the honorable and learned member for Indi who pointed out that here, in the progress of an industrial dispute, was reached the point at which a non-member of a union had a right to complain of being forced—by the granting of a preference to unionists—to join a union. His view was that, so long as a man was not compelled to join a union by the fact of a preference being extended to its members, he was not concerned with the question of whether politics entered into its affairs or not, but that the moment a preference was granted by the Court, he had a right to protest against politics forming any part of its platform. Here, therefore, he urged, a point was reached, at which not only was it permissible, but absolutely proper, that a line of demarcation should be drawn. I thoroughly agree with that view. Personally, I thought that the point should have been reached earlier. I know that the leader of the Opposition agrees with me that no man should feel that he is bound to join a union in order to obtain work, if that union exists for political purposes. Under this provision, therefore, if not at an earlier stage, the purely industrial character of the Bill should begin.

Mr. SPENCE.—Does the Minister know any union that has not political objects?

Mr. McCAY.—Upon a former occasion the honorable member himself made a long speech to show that unions were not political organizations. I recollect very well when he spoke from the Government benches, because I occupied a seat in the Ministerial corner.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—Why was the Minister there?

Mr. McCAY.—I occupied that seat in order that I might hear the honorable member to better advantage. I wanted to hear what he had to say. After he had resumed his seat I had the honour to rise and to address myself to the same question. I remember that I discussed the question of whether trades unions were political organizations, and in doing so I referred to the Australian Workers' Union. The honorable member thereupon handed me their deed of association, in order that I might read for myself, and learn that it was not a political body. I read a number of the objects of that union, and it seemed to me that it did partake of the nature of a political organization.

Mr. SPENCE.—Nobody has ever denied that.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member wished us to believe that it was not a political body.

Mr. SPENCE.—No; I pointed out that in New South Wales a certain portion of its funds were devoted to political purposes.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member urged that, except in New South Wales and Queensland, trades unions were not political organizations. I am sorry that I have not had time to obtain a few quotations from Hansard upon this point, but it was only when the honorable member for Kennedy proposed the recommittal of the clause that I realized it would be raised, and even then I did not anticipate that the Opposition would take up such an unfriendly attitude towards the Bill. The position is that after long debate, and earnest consideration, this Committee, by a majority of one, accepted the amendment in its present form, as compared with the amendment in a stronger form. If parliamentary procedure means anything, I may therefore claim that the whole Committee were then agreed that some limitation was desirable.

Mr. FRAZER.—The amendment was only carried by a majority of one.

Mr. McCAY.—But those honorable members who constituted the minority, desired to obtain a still greater measure of restriction. The amendment in its present form represents the minimum restriction which the Committee would sanction. If the honorable member for Kennedy insists upon pressing his proposal to a division, I venture to say that honorable members will practically unanimously confirm the decision at which they formerly arrived, after a prolonged debate which extended over two or three days. I have no doubt that honorable members who then pointed out so clearly that this was the proper point at which to draw the line of demarcation, still entertain that opinion.

Mr. ROBINSON (Wannon).—I have just spent two or three minutes in looking up the Hansard report of the discussion upon this amendment, and I must say that I am astounded at the attitude which has been taken up by honorable members opposite. No doubt the Committee will recollect the debate which took place upon a former occasion. The honorable and learned member for Angas moved an amendment to limit the organizations which could register to organizations which were constituted solely for the purposes of the Act. The honorable and learned member for Corinella moved a lesser amendment, prohibiting organizations which had political aims or objects from coming before the Court. Then the honorable and learned members for Darling Downs and Indi prepared an amendment to the effect that no organization should be allowed to ask for preference if it were a political organization. The reasons which they gave are fully set out in Hansard. The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs is reported on page 2918 of that record to have said—

For my part, I should prefer that unions should not have political rules. At the same time, I say that if there is a large organization, composing nearly all the employes engaged in a specific trade, and if they have political objects in view, I do not believe that when they come before the Court for a decision in an industrial dispute the Court will be actuated in any way by a consideration of the politics of the union.

Later on, he said—

I again point out that the difficulty can arise only in connexion with the giving of a preference to unionists. I should like to ask the Minister of External Affairs, who is at present in charge of the Bill, if he will consider the advisability of dealing with this difficulty. Could we not provide that, where unions are political bodies, no preferences shall be given them until the objectionable political features are removed from their rules?

So that the first suggestion came from the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs. He continued—

The honorable and learned member for Indi and I have given this matter considerable consideration. We have tried to see whether we could not meet what is the substantial objection against the clause.

Later on, he said—

When we come again to deal with the question of preference to unionists, what I desire to see carried is an amendment which will provide that no preference of any description whatever shall be given to a union if by rule its funds may be appropriated in whole or in part for political objects.

Mr. LONSDALE.—They could be political up to the last moment, and then be dropped.

Mr. GROOM.—So long as they do not ask for preference as a political organization, no harm will be done.

The then Prime Minister spoke on the subject on the same day. His remarks, as reported on page 2945 of Hansard, are most interesting. They are as follows:—

The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs put forward an idea in regard to preference for unionists. In my opinion these two matters are largely bound up, as was rightly indicated by the right honorable member for East Sydney, and I think I am therefore justified in saying a word or two in regard to them. As I understand it, the view put forward by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs was that we should make some attempt to safeguard the non-unionist from preference to unionists being granted to his detriment, and that would obviate the necessity for the amendments which are now before the Committee.

Then he is reported, on page 2946, to have said—

I am quite prepared to meet the position by agreeing to an amendment that will secure that no preference shall be granted to a union while there is anything in its rules to which reasonable objection can be taken.

Mr. FRAZER.—Why does not the honorable and learned member quote the extract at the top of the page?

Mr. ROBINSON. — He said that he would much prefer that there should be no limitation whatever on preference. Then he told the House that he was prepared to accept an amendment to the effect that no preference should be given to a union, if there was anything of a political character in its rules. The next person to come on the scene was the honorable and learned member for Indi, who is reported on page 2956 to have said—

I see no reason for denying them—the trades unions—access to the Court, no matter what their political faith may be. But the moment they ask for an advantage or a preference; the moment they say, “We want something more than a non-unionist can get,” then coercion commences, if they get it. If the Court gives it to them it says to other workers, “You shall not get equal rights unless you join an organization.” If that organization has a compulsory political platform it is not giving political freedom to the outsider, and we should prohibit preference under any circumstances, so long as that political platform exists.

I think that that is a position which every honorable member on this side of the Chamber indorses. He further said—

The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs has been good enough to associate himself with me in trying to frame an amendment which I intend to propose, and which I understand the Prime Minister is willing to accept.

He quoted the amendment, which is as follows:—

No preference shall be declared to any organization under this Act if its rules, decisions, or practices, or any of them provide for or permit either the application or appropriation of its funds, or any part thereof, for any political purpose whatever, or any political action on the part of the organization.

That is going as far as any honorable member on this side of the Chamber wishes to go at the present time. On page 2957, he is reported to have said—

I should much like to see no preference, if it could possibly be avoided. I think that preferences ought, in any case, to be most sparingly dealt out.

Mr. ISAACS.—If it were possible to have no evasion of this Act, I should be glad to see no preference, but preference is necessary in some cases to prevent the evasion of the Act.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Most of us would agree to that. On the night when the division was taken, the then Prime Minister said again that he was prepared to accept the amendment. The present Prime Minister chaffed him for surrendering his principles, but he became indignant, and denied in the most vigorous language that he had surrendered his principles. To quote from pages 3028-9 of Hansard, he said—

I say that the proposal put forward by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs, and the spirit of which was accepted by me last evening, is quite in consonance with the views which I expressed in Sydney, I think, eighteen months ago, when a matter cropped up affecting this particular question, or affecting the aspect of it now under consideration.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Is he rejecting it now?

Mr. ROBINSON.—He is giving a good deal of covert support to the proposal to reject it. I, therefore, say that the twin leaders of the Opposition were in harmony in support of this particular sub-clause, and that it was prepared by the two best friends in the Opposition corner possessed by the then Government; and as it was exhaustively debated, the conclusion come to upon it is one upon which I do not think the Committee should go back, more particularly as the then Government did not propose to recommit the clause.

Question—That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause—put. The Committee divided.

Ayes	31
Noes	16
			—
Majority	15

AYES.

Chapman, A.	Lonsdale, E.
Conroy, A. H. B.	McCay, J. W.
Cook, J.	McColl, J. H.
Deakin, A.	McLean, A.
Edwards, G. B.	McWilliams, W. J.
Edwards, R.	Reid, G. H.
Ewing, T. T.	Skene, T.
Forrest, Sir J.	Smith, B.
Fuller, G. W.	Smith, S.
Gibb, J.	Thomson, D.
Glynn, P. McM.	Turner, Sir G.
Johnson, W. E.	Willis, H.
Kelly, W. H.	Wilson, J. G.
Knox, W.	Tellers:
Lee, H. W.	Kennedy, T.
Liddell, F.	Robinson, A.

NOES.

Brown, T.	Poynton, A.
Carpenter, W. H.	Ronald, J. B.
Fisher, A.	Thomson, D. A.
Fowler, J. M.	Watkins, D.
Frazer, C. E.	Webster, W.
Higgins, H. B.
Maloney, W. R. N.	Tellers:
O'Malley, King.	McDonald, C.
Page, J.	Tudor, F. G.

PAIRS.

Harper, R.	Isaacs, I. A.
Phillips, P.	Lyne, Sir W. J.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
Amendment negatived.

Clause 67—

(2) The Court shall hear the application, and if it is of opinion that the registration should be cancelled, it shall so order, and thereupon the registration of the organization under this Act shall be cancelled, but so that the cancellation shall not relieve the organization or any member thereof from the obligation to comply with any award, or from any penalty or liability incurred prior to the cancellation.

Amendment (by Mr. REID) agreed to—

That all the words after "shall be cancelled" be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the following new sub-clauses:—

"(3) Where the Registrar has, on application made to him, refused to make an application for the cancellation of the registration of an organization, the Court may, if it thinks fit, on the application of any organization or person interested, order that the registration of the first-mentioned organization under this Act be cancelled, and thereupon the registration of the organization shall be cancelled.

"(4) The cancellation shall not relieve the organization or any member thereof from the obligation to comply with any award, or from any penalty or liability incurred prior to the cancellation."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 68—

During the pendency of any dispute or matter before the Court, no application to cancel the registration of an organization which is a party thereto shall be made or received, and no resignation of or discharge from the membership of any such organization shall have effect.

Amendment (by Mr. REID) agreed to.

That the words "no application to cancel the registration of an organization which is a party thereto shall be made or received, and," be left out.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 90—

No person shall wilfully insult or disturb the Court, or interrupt the proceedings of the Court, or use any insulting language towards the Court, or by writing or speech use words calculated to improperly influence the Court or the members thereof, or any witness before the Court, or to bring the Court into disrepute, or be guilty in any manner of any wilful contempt of the Court.

Amendment (by Mr. REID) agreed to—

That the words, "the members thereof," be omitted, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "any assessor."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 92—

No evidence relating to any trade secret, or to the profits or financial position, of any witness or party, shall be disclosed except to the Court or published without the consent of the person entitled to the trade secret or non-disclosure.

Penalty: Five hundred pounds or three months' imprisonment.

Amendment (by Mr. CROUCH) agreed to.

That the following new sub-clause be added:—

"(2) All such evidence shall, if the witness or party so requests, be taken in private."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Schedule B—

The name of every registered organization shall contain the name of the industry in connexion with which it is established, and shall also contain the word "employers" or "employees" as the case may be.

Mr. REID.—I move—

That the words "and shall also contain the word 'employers' or 'employees,' as the case may be," be left out.

We quite agree with the late Government, that, if this requirement were insisted upon, in every case, it would cause inconvenience.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment (by Mr. REID) agreed to—

That the following new clause be inserted:—

"52A. Where the Court, or any Court of summary jurisdiction, imposes any penalty for any breach or non-observance of any term of an order or award, it may order that the penalty, or any part thereof, be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, or to such organization or person as is specified in the order."

Mr. REID.—I move—

That the following new clause be inserted:—

"95A. For the purposes of this Act, a State Court or Magistrate, whose jurisdiction is limited, as to area, subject-matter, or parties, to any part of a State, shall be deemed to have jurisdiction throughout the State.

Provided that on the hearing of any proceeding in a Court of summary jurisdiction for the recovery of any penalty, fine, fee, levy, or due, the Court, if in the interests of justice it thinks fit, may adjourn the hearing to a Court of summary jurisdiction to be held at some other place in the same State."

I may explain that the object of this new clause is to destroy the rigidity of States boundaries, in order to promote the elasticity of Federal administration.

Proposed new clause agreed to.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).

—I move—

That the following new clause be inserted:—

"32A.—(1) Whenever the President or Court shall so require the parties to any industrial dispute shall each supply written proposals for the settlement of the different points in dispute, or offers of compromise, stating the full extent of any compromise which they are willing to make on any such points. Penalty: £100.

"(2) If any proposals or offers are supplied pursuant to the preceding sub-section, and the Court afterwards proceeds to an award, then the award on each point in dispute shall be one or the other of the proposals for settlement or offers of compromise so supplied, unless the Court shall, for special reasons, see fit to expressly decide to the contrary."

The proposed new clause embodies a principle which I have endeavoured from the first to have inserted in the Bill. I have somewhat recast my original proposal, owing to certain strictures passed upon it by the honorable and learned member for Indi, when it was previously before the Committee. It does not often happen that I am absent from the House, but, unfortunately, I was not present on the occasion to which I refer, and I do not think that the principle underlying my proposition received that consideration which it merited. It is for that reason that I have again submitted it. The proposed new clause, as originally framed, dealt merely with efforts at compromise. It was drafted by the right honorable member for Adelaide, and carried out entirely what I had in view. Any effort at settlement made under the direction of the Court would necessarily be in the direction of a compromise, even if it did not recede one iota from the original effort which the party in question might have made. To do away with the criticism to which my first proposal was subjected by the honorable and learned member for Indi and several others, I have so re-cast the clause that it will cover, not only an effort to compromise, but any effort that may be made subject to the conditions of the clause. It is, to my mind, a complete refutation of the charge levelled against me by the honorable and learned member for West Sydney, that a vote given by me on another clause showed that I desired to destroy the Bill. I think that this proposal, which has been before the House from the first, must show that I am a friend of this class of legislation—a greater friend than are many of those who have denounced my advocacy of the measure as political hypocrisy. I should like to briefly review some of the main provisions of the Bill in order to show why my proposal should be adopted. It does not involve the fate of any Ministry. It has been brought forward by an obscure member of the House, and I am afraid on that account that it will not receive that consideration which it deserves; but I feel sure that some such principle as that underlying my proposal will ultimately be embodied in legislation of this class, or it must necessarily break down. It is for this reason that I desire, carefully and sincerely, to point out what are my reasons for endeavouring to secure the insertion of this principle, or something as closely akin to it as the Committee will accept, in this Bill. The Bill is entitled, "A Bill for an Act relating to Conciliation and Arbitration," and honorable members should be sufficiently aware of its contents to know how much of it really deals with conciliation. The word "conciliation" appears in the title of the Bill, and also in the introductory provisions contained in clause 2, sub-clause 3—

To provide for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the Court by conciliation with a view to amicable agreement between the parties.

No further reference to conciliation is to be found in the Bill until clause 32 is reached. The intervening provisions deal entirely with arbitration, but in clause 32 we have this reference to conciliation—

The Court shall, in such manner as it thinks fit, carefully and expeditiously hear, inquire into, and investigate every industrial dispute of which it has cognisance, and all matters affecting the merits of the dispute, and the right settlement thereof.

Then in sub-clause 2 there is a further reference to conciliation—

In the course of such hearing inquiry and investigation the Court shall make all such suggestions and do all such things as appear to it to be right and proper for reconciling the parties and for inducing the settlement of the dispute by amicable agreement.

If this Bill were consistent, part with part, one would expect a clause like this, declaring the general scope of the Court, to be followed by further provisions relating to conciliation, and providing for regulations dealing with the subject. But so far from that being the case, we find that there is only one further reference to conciliation in the Bill. It is to be found in clause 42, which provides that—

The Court may temporarily refer any matters before it to a Conciliation Committee consisting of an equal number of representatives of employers and employees, who shall endeavour to reconcile the parties.

Seeing that outside the title of the Bill itself only two definite references to conciliation are to be found in the measure, I think it has no right to the name which it bears, unless we make provision for something in the direction at which my proposal aims. Setting aside for the moment the scope of the Bill itself, and referring to the operation of such legislation in New Zealand, New South Wales, and elsewhere, we find that unless it provides some means to induce the settlement of disputes so far as possible by conciliation, the Conciliation and Arbitration Courts become congested to such an extent as to make the legislation under which they exist inoperative and, indeed, a perfect farce. There are disputes now awaiting settlement in the Conciliation and Arbitration Court of New South Wales with which the parties are unable to do anything, because they know that in some cases it is impossible for the Court to take any step towards their settlement for a period of about two years. My desire is to bring about a settlement of disputes by some rough and ready means of natural justice. During the discussion of another clause, the honorable and learned member for West Sydney inquired what was "natural justice" in the view of the honorable member who was using that term? By the term "natural justice," in its application to the proposed new clause, I mean that we should endeavour to put the parties to a dispute in such a position that they cannot attempt to gain any benefit for themselves that will not involve a corresponding benefit to the other side should they fail in their endeavour. Although this may seem a somewhat novel proposition to introduce in the statute-book of the Commonwealth, I may point out that the main principle underlying it can be found in legislation in force elsewhere, and that it is embodied more or less in many of the enactments of the States Parliaments of Australia. I have previously pointed out that we find it in the old law of the Athenian democracy. A party charged with an offence during the fierce democratic struggles which prevailed in those days, had a right to plead guilty or not guilty, and to have his case decided accordingly, or to go further, and to name a minor penalty as compared with that affixed by the complainant, who acted the part of public prosecutor. It is well known to honorable members that Socrates, the philosopher, when charged with an offence against the laws of his State—the offence of corrupting the youth—had the penalty of death nominated against him by the parties who had instituted the proceedings. It was then open to him to plead guilty, and to nominate a far less drastic penalty, and that having been done, the dycastery, or jury, might have extended mercy to him, knowing that the prosecution was more or less a political one. In that way Socrates might have saved his life, but in a spirit of philosophical contempt for the prosecution, he nominated a penalty so low that the dycastery refused to accept it, and he went to his death.

Mr. G. B. Edwards.

Mr. DEAKIN.—He demanded to be treated as a public benefactor.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS. — That is so. He demanded to dine at the Prytaneum at the public cost. That is an instance of the introduction of a principle, very similar to that which I advocate, in the criminal law of a very advanced state of civilization, and of resort being had to it for a very good purpose: to mitigate the severity of the political strife which, in some instances, led to the institution of these criminal prosecutions. I desire to refer to one of the features of the oldest legislation of which we know. A book entitled The First of Empires, which has recently been placed on the shelves of the Parliamentary Library, gives a description of a system of leasing, under improvement, which prevailed in olden days, and in which the very principle I am now advocating was observed. These Laws of Kammurami, the first known laws that have been recovered from the ruins of ancient empires, embodied a principle under which a man took a lease of land to lay out as an orchard, under all the circumstances in which land is taken up to-day for improvement purposes. The condition in most of the leases was that in ten years' time half the land was to revert to the original holder. In order that the original holder might have the full benefit of the improvements effected upon the land it was left to the lessee to divide the land in halves, and then the original holder selected which of the halves he would take. There, again, there was applied this principle of a rough natural justice, under which the parties concerned were able to compose their disputes without going through the formality of fighting them out in a court of law.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But it was a very bad code of law; they had no cure, no pay for doctors.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—It is true that they had that rule; but that does not affect my present line of argument. Coming nearer to our own times, in fact to the legislation of the various States forming the Commonwealth, honorable members are aware that we have a similar principle embodied in the Customs Acts of many of the States, though I do not know that it is to be found in the Commonwealth Customs Act. Under many of the States Customs Acts it was left to the importer to value his own goods. The only check upon him was that if the State authorities chose they could say, "We think you are undervaluing your goods," and they could then put a 10 per cent. advance upon them, and take over the goods at the importer's valuation, plus the advance. This, again, was a rough and ready natural way of securing a just valuation of the goods by putting the importer in such a position that unless he put a fair valuation on his goods he ran the risk of incurring the injustice he was endeavouring to inflict upon the State, by having his goods taken from him at a slight advance upon his valuation. The same principle has been adopted in the matter of land tax assessments in Australia, and in the neighbouring Colony of New Zealand. The land-owner is allowed to assess himself at what rate he pleases. If the State authorities consider that he has grossly undervalued his property, they can add a slight percentage to his valuation, and take over the property. Though I have not seen the Act, I am told that some fourteen years ago, in New South Wales, when it was found necessary to resume many of the extravagantly large leaseholds that had been given to people in the early days, it was decided that, although the total area should not be resumed, it would be wise in the interests of the State to resume at least half. Here, again, it will be understood, that if the State decided to cut the leases in halves and take one of the halves, the greatest injustice might, in some cases, have been done to the lessees. Instead of that, the enactment provided that the lessee might halve his holding in any way he thought fit, and then the State stepped in, through its officials, and decided which of the two halves it would resume. It will be at once seen that, when it was left to a man to divide his estate, and he knew that the State would step in and take one of the halves, he would take precious good care to see that they were equal. I desire to include this principle in the Bill. I believe that it would have the effect of settling many disputes in a far better way than by Arbitration. A settlement which is likely to be arrived at after a long contested fight under arbitration, and with all the bitterness likely to be created in that way, is one which is not likely to be the most desirable. The whole scope of our consideration now should be not to create trouble by leaving the settlement of all cases to the Court, and thus occasioning bitter disputes, but to put the law in such a position that the desire to take advantage of it will not be so great as it is at the present time, and that litigants may come to the conclusion that it is better for them to accommodate their differences, under the supervision of the Court, than to fight them out. I direct the attention of the Committee to the precise terms of my amendment. It will be seen that I do not propose to make it compulsory on the Court to require that the parties shall put in their best offers. That is left to the discretion of the Court. Throughout the discussion upon this Bill we have heard the argument used that we ought to trust the Court, and I think that if there is anything on which we should trust the Court it is on a principle of this sort, when we know that already the Arbitration Courts in New South Wales and in New Zealand have intimated a desire to have some such a power as I suggest. They may not have said so in so many words, but, over and over again, they have told litigants, "This is not a matter with which you should trouble us; you should be able to settle it amongst yourselves. This is not a matter of great importance, and our time is required for the consideration of matters of much graver import. You can surely settle this amongst yourselves." If the Court had the power I propose, not only would it use it in cases where plainly in the best interests of the operation of such legislation it should use it, but litigants themselves would see that by adopting this line of action they would have a better chance of settling their disputes, under the supervision of the Court, in such a way that the Court would register the decision arrived at, and it would be carried out with all the formalities of law attached to an award by the Court—the finding being registered in the Court as an award of the Court. I should like to refer as briefly as I can to the report of the Royal Commission on Strikes in New South Wales. I am sorry to think that the volume in which it is contained has not been largely made use of by those who have devoted their attention to the legislation now before us. There is in this volume, and in the evidence obtained by the Commission, very much that would greatly assist those designing such legislation as we have now before us. In paragraph 8 of the report, having used the word "conciliation," the Commissioners say—

In using the term "conciliation" for the first time in this report, it is convenient to remark here that the terms "conciliation" and "arbitration" are often employed somewhat vaguely as if they were interchangeable, and yet they represent two distinct things. The function of any conciliation agency is to get the parties to a dispute to come to a common agreement voluntarily without any opinion being pronounced on the merits or any instructions given. The function of arbitration is distinctly to determine the merits, and to give a positive decision to be abided by. If the declaration of such a decision can be avoided it is well that it should be, because decisions are generally more or less adverse to both parties, for even splitting the difference is an equal censure upon both. But conciliation, if it is a success, allows of a friendly settlement on a mutual agreement, and leaves no opening for discrediting the understanding or impartiality of the arbitrators. That being so, the practical question that arises is, how should this primary remedy of conciliation be applied.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—All the same, conciliation always means splitting the difference.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Yes; but I hope to be able to show the honorable member that the object I have in view is to entirely do away with splitting the difference. Further on in the report, the Commissioners state in paragraph 12—

Taking all these things into consideration, we recommend that, in the first instance, at least, and until circumstances justify some further differentiation in the constitution of the labour tribunal, there should be only one board, but that this one board should be empowered in some form to discharge, as occasion may require, the double duty of conciliation and arbitration. That is to say, that its first effort should be towards bringing about a voluntary agreement between the parties, and failing that, that the board, or the permanent part of it, should discharge the duty of adjudication, and pronounce a decision.

The object I have in view is to give effect to the principle reported upon by this Royal Commission. We here have a Court, whilst the Commission speak of a Board, and I desire that our Court should use all the powers with which we can invest it to have these disputes settled at the conciliation stage before the parties are forced into litigation at the arbitration stage. Dealing with the evidence submitted to the Commission, it will be found that on page 60 of the appendix to their report, an account is given of the Wallace Act, passed in the State of Pennsylvania—a measure framed to facilitate arbitration in industrial disputes. There are letters in connexion with this evidence from representatives on both sides, commending the operation of the Act, and anticipating advantageous results from its development. Since those letters were written, there have been serious strikes in the coal-mining industry of Pennsylvania, as honorable members are aware—the very industry to which these letters refer—and a glance at the results of the early operation of the law discloses a sufficient reason for the failure of the Pennsylvania legislation. It is another case of attempting to settle these matters by "splitting the difference." The coal trade tribunal of the fifth judicial district of Pennsylvania was licensed under the Wallace Act, to which I have referred, in 1883, and consisted of five representatives of each side, and an umpire chosen by them as a body. A strike was on, and the operators—which is the name they have for masters there—offered 3 cents. per bushel for mining, whilst the miners demanded 3½ cents. After several lengthy discussions, it became apparent that an agreement could not be arrived at without considerable delay, and as an earnest of good intentions it was ordered that the miners should resume work immediately, at a price to be thereafter fixed by the tribunal—the price to date back to the time of the resumption of work. The umpire had to be called in, and he awarded a price. Honorable members will know at once what his award was. As usual in these circumstances, the price he awarded was 3½ cents. The men wanted 3½, the masters offered three, and the umpire gave an award of 3¼ cents. This award, whilst it was apparently a disappointment to both parties, was accepted and concurred in for a few months as arranged, but before the expiration of that time the tribunal met to fix the price for a further period. This time the masters offered 3½ cents., and the men demanded 3½ cents. Again the services of the umpire were requested, and he again split the difference, and awarded 3½ cents. This award did not appear to be satisfactory to all, but it was accepted. Since then we have had great strikes amongst the coal miners in Pennsylvania. What I say in this connexion is that if the award ultimately given in this case had been given at first instead of the original decision it would have satisfied one of the parties, whilst the other would have been in no worse position, and work would have been resumed. But under this system of splitting the difference the demand is always increasing and the concession is always lagging tardily behind.

Several of the witnesses before the Royal Commission on Strikes in New South Wales anticipated the friction that would arise over the principle of "splitting the difference," which the new clause is designed to remedy. One of the witnesses was Mr. W. E. Abbott, a gentleman well known to the representatives of New South Wales; and the following is an extract from his evidence, as reported on page 114:—

If we cannot enforce the decisions of the Court, do you think, as a rule, the decisions of the Court would be acquiesced in?—No.

Then what would be the use of it?—The Court, as a means of settling disputes of that kind, would be no use, but as a means of registering agreements between the employers and employes or their unions it would be valuable.

Then the best thing to be done is to have some arrangement for a written agreement to be registered in Court, at which either party can sue and get damages?—Yes, that is the only point I see on which the law can interfere in any way. If a Court undertook to interfere in any way, in such questions as whether a shearer should be paid 20s., or 25s., probably the Court would split the difference in some way; they would not give the 25s., and they would not give the 20s. At least that is the rule in most Arbitrators' Courts. Either side can then reverse the decision of the Court. If a Court said that 22s. 6d. was a fair thing, then the shearers would take the 22s. 6d. for the time being, and then go for 30s., in which case they would get (say) 24s., or the employer would say that 22s. 6d. is not right, and he will go for 17s. 6d.

My contention and that of Mr. Abbott is that in the whole course of our legislation all we are doing, unless we have some means to induce conciliation, is to absolutely constrain the men to make the largest demands, and absolutely constrain the masters to yield the smallest concessions. By this system of splitting the difference, which we see in so many of the decisions, the parties to these great industrial and social disputes, which are so dangerous to our material welfare, and our internal peace, are forced further and further apart, whereas the design of legislation should be to induce them to come nearer and nearer—so near, in fact, that, in many instances, it will not be worth while to proceed further. I have read an extract from the evidence of one of the witnesses who represented the employers before the Royal Commission; but honorable members may accept my assurance that there is evidence to the same effect on both sides. One of the witnesses examined was Mr. Peter Joseph Brennan, president of the Trades and Labour Council, Chairman of the Australian Labour Conference, founder of the Stewards' and Cooks' Union, and secretary to the Butchers' Union. Surely an occupant of all those positions ought to be able to speak of what was anticipated as the result of legislation, so far as unions and workmen are concerned. Yet Mr. Brennan, on page 99, is thus reported:—

In any Court one side or the other is bound to be dissatisfied with the decision, but the rule has been with arbitrators to split differences; if in Courts of law they do not split differences, in Courts of Arbitration they have always split them; not only in the case of private arbitrators; Mr. Oliver was not a private arbitrator, and Mr. Barton was appointed by a County Court Judge; I will not go into the technicalities of the matters sent before Mr. Oliver, but I will say generally that the miners were willing to submit to competent arbitration.

This man, representing unions of workmen, says that the whole tendency in Arbitration Courts is to split the difference; and I go further, and say that if there is this tendency, this legislation will intensify and increase the number of disputes which we are setting forth with such good intentions to prevent. I should like to draw the attention of the Committee to the case of the Monumental Masons' Union against the Master Monumental Masons, heard in the New South Wales Arbitration Court. The men claimed that the price of cutting and blacking letters on free-stone tombstones should be 12s. per 100, whereas the respondents contended that the price ought to be 10s. 6d. The Judge considered it utterly absurd to suppose that reasonable men could not arrange whether 10s. 6d. or 12s. 6d. should be paid for the work. I cannot say that, personally, I see that the Judge's remarks were called for, because the difference between 10s. 6d. and 12s. 6d. was the difference in the wages for the day, and many other disputes heard before the Court do not involve quite so much. However, this is what the Judge is reported to have said—

The Court having power to dismiss any matter at any stage of the proceedings, where it thinks the dispute trivial, considered this absolutely trivial and dismissed it.

I do not know whether we are justified in reflecting on the conduct of the Judge, but if His Honor be correctly reported, I do not think that the men had their case properly inquired into. What I do say is, that the men ought to have had an opportunity such as I desire should be given, to submit their case to a primary or preliminary proceeding of conciliation; and, if it were impossible to have the dispute settled in that way, then, no Judge's time is too precious to be devoted to the work. Again, in the dispute between the Barrier Branch of the Amalgamated Miners' Association and the Broken Hill Proprietary Co., the men asked for a 10 per cent. rise, and the masters wanted a 10 per cent. reduction in the wages; and the decision of the Court was practically that the parties should continue on the terms which had hitherto prevailed. I am not going to say whether the decision of the Court under the circumstances of the miners at the time was reasonably sound or not; but I do say that questions of that character, decided on those lines, will inevitably give rise to further litigation, and increase the number of great industrial disputes rather than tend to decrease them and bring about easy settlements. But there is another and a most flagrant case of settling disputes on the principle of splitting the difference. Some time ago in the New South Wales Court, the case of the Hotel, Club, Restaurant, and Caterers' Employés Union was dealt with, and it is referred to on page 37 of the reports of the Arbitration Court. These men demanded sixty hours per week of six days, and the offer of the masters was seventy-one and a half hours for cooks, and seventy-eight for other classes of employés. The decision of the Court was in the first case seventy hours per week of seven days, and in the second case seventy-seven hours per week of seven days. The demand in regard to wages was for chief cooks, £3, the offer of the masters was £1 10s., and the decision was £2 5s.; for second cooks the demand was £2 5s., the offer was £1 5s., and the decision was £1 10s.; for third cooks the demand was £1 15s., the offer was £1, and the decision was £1 5s.; for general hands, the demand was £1 5s., the offer 12s. and 15s., and the decision was £1; for casual employés, the demand was 15s., the offer was 10s., and the decision was 12s. 6d. In each of these particular cases, which involved the wages in different branches of this business, it will be seen that the demand and the offer were very wide apart indeed, and the only way which the Court could find to settle the dispute was to add the two sums together, and divide them. If that is to be the principle on which disputes of the kind are to be settled, we do not want a learned Judge, versed in British law, and a good deal of other law, and with a large salary, to settle such matters, because any ordinary, common-sense individual would be able to arrive at decisions of this character. I do not deny for a moment that the Judges of such Courts give decisions involving points of very much greater importance than those which I have instanced; but I protest against that system of settlement for the reason, as I have said, that it must tend to increase litigation, and that it leaves behind it a more bitter and troublesome spirit amongst masters and men. If my proposal were adopted, we should say to the masters, in effect, "What is the best you can offer?" and to the men, "What is the least you are prepared to accept?" The difference in the amounts would be reduced, and the parties brought so close together as to make it certain that the Arbitration Court would come to a satisfactory decision, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the parties themselves would deem it advisable to come to an agreement and have it registered in the Court. A similar plan is attempted in other countries. The honorable and learned member for Indi, in the early stages of the discussion on this Bill, made some reference to the Conseils de Prudhommes in France—an institution which has much more limited jurisdiction than it is intended to give the Court under this Bill, but which works satisfactorily. I understand that in connexion with this organization there is a principle adopted, which, however, I cannot find referred to in any book dealing with the subject, in the Parliamentary or other library. But a witness before the Royal Commission, whose evidence I give for what it is worth, stated that in the Conseils de Prudhommes five of the arbitrators are selected by the masters from among the men and another five are selected by the men from amongst the masters. If that be the case, the principle is the same as that of the clause which I propose. Under such a system the masters would select moderate and reasonable men, who are not likely, for any purpose, political or otherwise, to carry matters to extremes, and similarly the men would select employers whom they knew to be the most honest and the best-disposed towards their employés. Such a plan would result in a set of arbitrators more likely to come into accord than would be the case if each side appointed their own arbitrators. We here have the principle of natural justice, for which I have been contending all through my remarks, and which has been attained elsewhere. The facts will be best known to the particular masters and men selected as arbitrators, because they will be connected with the dispute; and, under the clause which I propose, the Court might be empowered to allow each party power to select a man from the other side. Above all, the clause would relieve the congested state of the Arbitration Courts. We know that, at the present time in New Zealand, and, perhaps, to a greater extent, in New South Wales, it is almost impossible to get disputes settled owing to the large amount of work with which the Courts have been rushed; and the number of cases, so far from decreasing, is increasing. I do not, as some other honorable members do, hold the opinion that the Arbitration Courts create litigation. In many instances, after having once got an award registered, parties will not apply for another award, though they may ask for a variation to meet changing circumstances. The fact remains that both in New South Wales and New Zealand, the Courts are overburdened to the point of breaking down. In the principle of the new clause I have proposed, we have a means of making this class of legislation much more perfect than it is in the two States I have mentioned. I do not know to what extent honorable members consider that the Court will be occupied with disputes in different parts of the Commonwealth, but it is inevitable that if the High Court, in deciding as to the extent of our power to interfere, should be in favour of the Arbitration Court under this Bill having very full, almost plenary powers to deal with the labour disputes of Australia, the Court will have an immense body of work—work which not one Judge, nor even six Judges, will be able to do. For that reason, more than any other, if we desire this legislation to be successful in carrying out the objects which we wish to attain, and to remedy disputes, we must provide beforehand for preventing the Court being choked with applications, and so making it break down by the very weight and quantity of litigation. I say again, as I said in opening, that I desire this legislation to be successful. I wish to see it successful to the extent of ending our industrial warfare from one end of the Commonwealth to the other. In this clause, which I recommend to the consideration of honorable members, we have a means of making the Bill more perfect, and of carrying it into effect with less chance of disastrous failure than I fear will exist if some such principle is not adopted.

Mr. G. B. Edwards.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I have listened to the honorable member for South Sydney during a part of his address with a great deal of interest and with a desire to bring my mind to support his proposal; but I candidly confess that while there is much to be said in favour of the amendment, I do not think, on the whole, that the balance of the argument is in favour of it. For instance, one of his contentions is that this proposal will do away with the congestion of business which exists in the Courts as at present conducted. I do not think there is any analogy between the Courts as at present conducted and the Court proposed to be established by this legislation. We are proposing to set up, for the first time, a Commonwealth Conciliation and Arbitration Court. I venture to say that that Court will deal with and settle many matters which now go to the Arbitration Courts as at present constituted. Speaking with a great amount of practical experience on this subject, I do not think that a proposal of this kind would shorten the operation of such cases by one minute. I rather think that it would have a tendency to lengthen them. It often happens that a compromise is hit upon through sheer exhaustion or through disgust at the way in which the Court is spinning matters out. But if the alternative were to accept one proposal or the other, the issue would be fought out to the bitter end, particularly if there were a margin between the two offers which might make it worth while to conduct the argument with strenuousness, and at length. Therefore, the amendment would not save time, but would rather tend to lengthen proceedings before the Court. Neither would the honorable member's proposal do away with the splitting of the difference about which so much has been heard. Remember that in all these cases proposals will emanate from both sides before the matter goes before the Court at all. It is only after failure to agree that they will go to the Court for a final verdict. If the parties do make minimum offers to the Court, it would be a splitting of the difference on their own part, as compared with their previous offers to each other. Because, if they could agree upon a basis of settlement themselves, there would be no necessity to go to the Court. It is only when they have made offers to each other and have failed to agree that they go to the Court and ask the Judge to split their differences for them, or to settle the case in any way he chooses. If they make fresh minimum offers to the Court, it will simply be doing what the honorable member has been deprecating—splitting the differences themselves prior to their being argued in Court. But to my mind the Conciliation Court will unmistakably tend to promote good feeling as between the combatants. That is my experience of conciliation. It is different from arbitration. It often happens, as a result of splitting the difference and coming to an agreement around a table, that a good feeling is brought about between the parties. I fear that under a proposal of this kind good feeling would not be the result. Rather I should imagine that the party whose claim has not been accepted would leave the Court with a very bitter taste in its mouth. I do not think that in this respect the proposal of the honorable member has much to commend it. In view of the fact that we are setting up a Conciliation Court, I do not think that what he proposes [would be any better than the Court proposed to be set up.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Can the honorable member show me any provisions for conciliation in this Bill?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is the intention of the Bill, although it may have been carried out clumsily. The intention is to preserve and promote good feeling between the combatants. The very process of splitting the difference settles a great many more strikes than it provokes, and it does more than anything else I can think of at the moment to promote that good feeling which we all desire to see between employer and employé. On the whole, therefore, I think we had better stick to the proposal of the Bill, which leaves the matter to the discretion of the Court, and allows the President to step between the combatants and to reach the point of justice, no matter how difficult it may be.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—My clause also leaves it to the discretion of the Court. I trust the Court fully.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Only in cases where special reasons appear. Ordinary cases would not be within the discretion of the Court. I have no doubt that the Judge would often, in any case in which he desired to step in, find special reasons. It is an easy matter to say that certain reasons are special. But that phrase itself is very vague, as applied to industrial disputes. What does the honorable member mean by "special reasons"?

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—I can show the honorable member much more vague expressions in other parts of the Bill. What, for instance, is a "substantial majority"?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am not carp- ing at the honorable member's drafting. Personally, I cannot see what special reasons he is alluding to. I fancy the honorable member had something in his mind when he was drafting this proposal. But I fear that it would lead to the protracting of cases, and to more strenuous and bitter argument, while it would not be provocative of that good feeling which the Bill aims at promoting.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella—Minister of Defence).—The Government have a great deal of sympathy with the object of the honorable member for South Sydney. His idea is, of course, that each side should be induced to state the minimum of what it wants, and not the maximum, which it hopes it might squeeze out of the Court. That is an object which it is always desirable to attain in connexion with litigation of any kind. But I am afraid that the amendment might, if adopted, lead to results that the honorable member himself does not contemplate. I listened with a great deal of interest to the illustrations which he gave of the application of similar proposals. But I was not in the Chamber during the whole of his speech, and I do not know whether he quoted the case of the wise old man who had two sons, to whom he left his property. He directed that the elder son should divide the property, but that the younger son should have the first choice. He made that direction with a view of having the property divided as equally as possible. The instances which the honorable member gave are more in the nature of analogies than of parallel cases. In the first place, I should like to point out to him that the Arbitration Court is called into existence not merely to do what an ordinary Court does—that is, to settle a dispute arising between two parties, in which the rest of the public are at most very remotely concerned. It is called into existence to consult as far as possible the interests of the public as well as the interests of the parties to the dispute. It is more in the public interest—or, at any rate, as much in the public interest—as in the interest of the parties, that it has been thought desirable to create Conciliation and Arbitration Courts. In the second place, I do not think that this proposal would meet the objections raised by the honorable and learned member for Indi, where one side makes a claim in which it thinks that it is absolutely right—and possibly may be almost absolutely right—and consequently cannot see its way to make any concession whatever.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Then it stands on its rights.

Mr. McCAY.—I think that is not exactly the idea that is conveyed by the honorable member's amendment. I also think that a proposal of this kind might possibly lead to what I may call experimental disputes. A dispute would be raised with a view of each side getting a knowledge of what the other side desired.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS.—Are we going to avoid that under the Bill, as it stands?

Mr. McCAY.—I do not think that we should encourage it. Possibly we may have a great many disputes specially raised for settlement by the Court.

Mr. POYNTON.—Not under this Bill.

Mr. McCAY.—That is harping back to a matter about which we have had a great deal of discussion. I venture to say that the Bill will be operative, in spite of the fears of some honorable members. I am sorry to hear the honorable member take up such an attitude. I do not think that any party in a great public matter of this kind—I do not mean necessarily a party in politics—has a right to say that it is going to make legislation ineffective because there happens to be some one thing introduced into it which that party does not like. That seems to me to be a very unwise proceeding.

Mr. POYNTON.—There are a number of objectionable things in this Bill. There is too much lawyer in it, for instance.

Mr. McCAY.—There is not much lawyer in the Bill as it stands. There is no lawyer at all in this clause, so that I am afraid I would be distinctly out of order in discussing that point.

Mr. POYNTON.—It will be an absolute dead letter.

Mr. McCAY.—I think that the honorable member for Grey will admit that his interjections are not quite relevant to the clause under discussion.

Mr. POYNTON.—They are pertinent to what the Minister was just saying.

Mr. McCAY.—Has the honorable member quite finished?

Mr. POYNTON.—No, I have not.

Mr. McCAY.—Then, I am exceedingly sorry, because I have refrained from answering his two or three interjections, in the hope that I might thereby pacify his perturbed spirit. I would point out to the honorable member for South Sydney, in regard to the quotation which he made from the report of the Royal Commission on Strikes, relating to conciliation, that his amendment after all is not very relevant to this particular proposal, in that so far as I can see the Bill introduces conciliation rather than arbitration. Human nature being what it is, and not what it ought to be, I am afraid that this may not so conduce, and I agree with the honorable member for Parramatta that, if each side is compelled to name its minimum, and knows that unless its minimum is accepted, that of the other side must, practically speaking, under this clause, be accepted, they will fight it out to the bitter end. Once each party has named what it regards as a proper minimum, there will be no hope of a compromise, and the parties will fight to win all for fear of losing all. That does not, I think, encourage the spirit of compromise. I would point out to the honorable member for South Sydney, that this whole Bill is in one sense, novel, that, at any rate, no such Courts as are here proposed are of any long standing, and that if in addition to the new Court dealing with new subjects, we provide new methods of settling disputes, we may introduce too many experiments, and consequently, injure, rather than help the cause that we all have at heart. I would, therefore, ask the honorable member to be content with having brought this matter under the notice of the Committee. I may mention that the Government did try to see its way to accept the whole, or a portion of the new clause; but in view of the novelty of the proposal, and the objections to its adoption, we could not accept it.

Mr. RONALD (Southern Melbourne).—I sincerely hope that the Government will see its way to accept the amendment. I think that the honorable member for South Sydney has made out a good case for the creation of a special Court. This is called a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, and it seems to me that it makes a great deal of provision for arbitration and very little for conciliation. The constitution of these Courts provides for a preliminary inquiry into the question as to whether there is a case or not. In my own country there is an official called the Procurator Fiscal, who holds an investigation, and says whether there is a case or not, and that function which is of very great value in Scotland has its parallel in France in the court which has been quoted by my honorable friend, and which serves a very great and useful purpose. It saves endless litigation, and, above all, brings in that principle of master and men meeting face to face and comparing their grievances, and thereby attempting to come to a just settlement. Moreover, the principle exists under the Factories Act of Victoria, in the shape of Wages Boards. I believe it will be found that if the men and masters come together and state their case to one another, they will see that very little litigation is required, and that the arbitration stage—an expensive one to both sides—need not be reached.

Mr. FRAZER.—That is not the experience of such Courts.

Mr. RONALD.—I have been quoting instances to show that it has been.

Mr. FRAZER.—It is not our experience in Western Australia, anyhow.

Mr. RONALD. — In Victoria the great value of the Factories Act lies in the fact that it has brought the men and masters face to face before the Wages Boards. The principle of conciliation is at work. The minimum of demand on each side is made, and when the men see that the masters are reasonable, and the masters see that the men are rational, the dispute is half settled. But if an appeal can be made to the Court, and the lawyers are allowed to state the case from their point of view, they will prolong the dispute, and the result will be disastrous. I am always in favour of exhausting the lay element, which is common-sense, before we reach the technical and intricate element. I hope that reasonable men will look upon this proposal as a very useful supplement to a Bill which may be licked into shape and made of some use in settling those disputes which we all profess to be so anxious to settle.

Proposed new clause negatived.

Bill reported with further amendments.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—There are two comparatively unimportant amendments which I forgot to move in clause 4, and I ask the House to allow me to go back into Committee in order to make them. I move—

That the Bill be recommitted for the reconsideration of clause 4.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

In Committee (Second recommitment).

Clause 4—

In this Act, except where otherwise clearly intended—

“State Industrial Authority” means any Board or Court of Conciliation or Arbitration, or tribunal body or persons, having authority under any State Act to exercise any power of Conciliation or Arbitration with reference to industrial disputes within the limits of the State.

Amendments (by Mr. REID) agreed to—

That the following definition be inserted :—

“Special Magistrate” means a magistrate appointed by that name under the law of a State.

That after the word “State,” line 9, the following words be inserted :—“or any Special Board constituted under any State Act relating to factories, or such other State Board or Court as is prescribed.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported with further amendments; report adopted.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—With the concurrence of the House, I desire to move the third reading of the Bill, so that it can reach the Senate to-morrow when it meets.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is it the pleasure of the House that the Prime Minister have leave to move the suspension of the Standing Orders?

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Motion (by Mr. REID) agreed to—

That the Standing Orders be suspended so as to allow the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill to be passed through its remaining stage this day.

Bill read a third time.

KALGOORLIE TO PORT AUGUSTA RAILWAY SURVEY BILL.

In Committee (Consideration of Governor-General's message resumed from 9th June, vide page 2243), on motion by Mr. BATCHELOR—

That it is expedient that an appropriation of moneys be made for the purposes of a Bill for an Act to authorize the survey of a route for a railway to connect Kalgoorlie, in the State of Western Australia, with Port Augusta, in the State of South Australia.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON (North Sydney—Minister of Home Affairs).—I do not desire to weary the Committee with any long argument in favour of the motion. The project for the construction of this railway has already been discussed, and there will be further opportunities for discussion when the Bill is brought in. I shall only say that the proposal has found favour, not merely with the last Administration, but also with its immediate predecessor, and the present Administration see that the duty of bringing it forward is imposed upon them. I am sure that honorable members will all recollect that at an early stage of the Federal movement an opinion was current that Western Australia was not likely to enter into the proposed union of the Colonies.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Why was this proposal not put into the Constitution?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am coming to that point. We were quite prepared to believe that if Western Australia did come into the Union she would put forward certain conditions in return for certain disadvantages which it must be admitted she would suffer. One of these conditions—the permission to impose a tariff of her own on a gradually decreasing scale—was embodied in the Constitution.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Was the construction of the railway made a condition?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—And the question of constructing this railway was also raised.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—That was not a condition.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am going to state the case exactly as I know it from making inquiries.

Mr. PAGE.—This railway is not provided for in the Constitution.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am aware of that. That question was raised, and whilst it was not agreed to, consideration was promised, after due inquiry, by at least some of the Premiers, and more especially by some of the Ministers in South Australia, to this request from Western Australia.

Mr. ISAACS.—Does the Minister mean the Premier of Victoria?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I mean some of the Premiers who attended the conference at which the question of the Transcontinental Railway was discussed. As the Prime Minister—who was a party to that gathering—has already stated, whilst no agreement was arrived at that the line should be constructed, consideration was promised to the project, and to that extent the expectations of the people of Western Australia were raised. Further than that, certain correspondence took place between the Governments of South Australia and Western Australia upon which I do not intend to enlarge. That correspondence went much further than did the members of the Premiers' Conference, in the direction of attempting to connect Western Australia and the eastern States by rail, and it also gave rise to legitimate expectations, on the part of the people of Western Australia, that this matter would receive earnest consideration. That is the situation as I find it. I approached this question with a mind entirely unbiased. Upon one occasion, it is true, I did attempt to check discussion upon this proposal, but I stated my reasons for doing so. I said later—

I took objection to this measure at a similar stage on a previous occasion, but for the sole reason that I considered that, owing to the important business—practically a vote of censure—then before Parliament, it was not proper to interpose the motion. To-night, when I was questioned as to my attitude, I stated that I would make no objection to the motion being passed as formal.

I took no objection whatever to the proposal as such. What I did object to was that it should be interposed when there was practically a motion of censure before Parliament.

Mr. MAHON.—Does not a very similar position of affairs exist at the present time?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Not that I am aware of. I have not yet observed any motion of censure.

Mr. MAHON.—It is coming all right.

Mr. PAGE.—Does the Minister know of any instance in which the other States have contributed towards the building or the survey of a railway in New South Wales or Queensland?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I am not aware that they have been asked to do so.

Mr. PAGE.—Queensland is just as impecunious as is Western Australia.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It is not a question of impecuniosity. We know that in Western Australia very considerable discontent exists owing to the non-fulfilment of what was regarded as a promise that the proposal to construct the Transcontinental Railway would receive earnest inquiry and examination. That discontent, if illegitimate, it might be our duty to ignore, although it would be very unfortunate if any substantial sense of injustice were allowed to exist in any of the States when we had the power to remove it. In view of what has taken place, and realizing what has led to the anticipations of Western Australia, I say that if we refuse to expend one penny in inquiring whether this important railway connexion should take place, we shall be justifying that discontent, and each representative of that State will have the fullest warrant for supporting the indignation of its people.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—What will the survey cost?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The expenditure in this connexion is limited to £20,000. If the line be constructed, I understand that Western Australia is willing to pay her portion of any loss upon it—that is, upon its own length. But the people of that State claim that the understanding under which they joined the Federation was that the Federal authorities would inquire into the feasibility, the payability, and the desirability or otherwise of constructing that railway.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Would the line be owned by the Commonwealth Government?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—If it were constructed by the Federation, undoubtedly it would. But I would point out to honorable members that at the present stage the question of construction is not under consideration. The whole point involved is, "Do we think that Western Australia has such a legitimate case for inquiry that the Federal Government, which would own the line, if constructed, should expend a limited sum in making that inquiry?"

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Then the £20,000 is really to be spent upon an inquiry?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Yes; by adopting this resolution, Parliament will not be committed to the construction of the line in any way.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Who has to pay the £20,000?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The Commonwealth Government.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—What is the use of saying that the expenditure contemplated is for the purpose of making an inquiry?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—What is the use of urging that the survey cannot partake of the nature of an inquiry, because an expenditure is involved? Perhaps the honorable and learned member for Parkes has not read the terms of the resolution. I do think that a sufficient case has been made out by the people of Western Australia to warrant an examination being made into the cost of the proposed railway and the route it should take, if constructed. If the resolution be adopted, Parliament will still retain the power to sanction the work or otherwise, according to what, on the information gained, honorable members deem themselves justified in doing. I do not intend to enlarge upon the matter. I will only add that the justice of the claim of Western Australia has impressed itself upon three Administrations. Surely that is some indication that there is reason for the request which is made by that State. I can quite believe that at a later stage reasons may be advanced in favour of the construction of the railway—such, for example, as its value from the stand-point of defence, and the desirability of having an approach to that important part of Australia by a means which could not be interfered with by any Power, which might be at war with Great Britain, placing fleets upon our coast. There are other reasons which might be urged in its favour—many reasons. But I quite admit that, despite all those reasons, we may find, after this survey has been made, that it is not desirable to construct the proposed railway. Nevertheless, I ask the Committee to give to Western Australia at least that consideration which is now asked, and to sanction a limited expenditure, so that we may know what the construction of the railway will involve, and so that we may be in a better position at a future date to decide whether that portion of the continent should be connected with the more thickly populated, and more favorably situated, eastern shore-line of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Do the Government propose to ask Western Australia to contribute anything towards this expenditure of £20,000?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Western Australia will contribute.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—How much?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—She will contribute her proportion according to population.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Do the Government propose to ask Western Australia to contribute anything more than her Federal proportion?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That State will contribute the proportion for which she is liable. The honorable and learned member knows that if we pass a measure authorizing the expenditure of £20,000 that expenditure must be allocated in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Do the Ministry intend to ask Western Australia to contribute more than her proportion?

Mr. FOWLER.—Would it be fair to ask Western Australia to contribute to a proposal which may condemn the line?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The proposal to construct the railway, I would remind the honorable and learned member for Parkes, is not now before the Committee. The matter immediately under consideration is a proposal to expend £20,000 upon a survey of the line. That money will be allocated under the provisions of the Constitution just as other expenditure is allocated. If we consider that the claim of Western Australia is altogether baseless, that she has no title to consideration in this matter, that she should never have put forward her proposal, and that no encouragement should have been given to it before she joined the Union, we might put it on one side, and we could then deal with the question entirely from the stand-point of the desirability or otherwise of constructing the proposed railway. But I think that the western State has established, at any rate, a good case for inquiry, and as the Commonwealth Government, and not the States, will own the railway, if it be eventually constructed—because the undertaking affects not only Western Australia, but also South Australia and the eastern States—we should at least elicit the facts necessary to enable us to decide whether the work should be undertaken or not. I therefore commend the proposal to the consideration of honorable members.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I intend to support the proposal of the Government, though I do not wish it to be understood that, because I shall vote for a survey of the proposed Transcontinental Railway, I shall, therefore, if I am in Parliament when subsequent action is taken in regard to it, consider myself committed to vote for the construction of the line. I am endeavouring to keep an absolutely open mind in respect to the main question involved in the project we now have before us. One cannot look with indifference upon the proposal to connect by rail the extreme western State of the Commonwealth with the more thickly populated eastern States. Such a connexion must eventually be of immense importance to Australia.

Mr. FOWLER.—It must come sooner or later.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The later the better.

Mr. WATSON.—It must come some day. To my mind, it is important, for commercial as well as for strategic reasons, that there should some day be this connexion; but whether, with our comparatively small population, we are at present justified in expending between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000 upon the work, depends altogether upon the probability of its returning, within a reasonable time, at least a fair proportion of the interest on the cost and the working expenses of the railway. The evidence we have on the subject so far is somewhat meagre. Optimistic statements have been made by the representatives of Western Australia as to the possibilities of the line, and I am sure we all sympathize with their patriotism, but there is comparatively little evidence upon which an unbiased observer can form an accurate opinion of its prospects. I have seen the reports of the engineer who made a flying survey of the route as to the character of the country passed through, and they have rather surprised me. He admitted that the opportunities for the conservation of water, which are so necessary to make the country reproductive, are not apparent; but he seemed to have the firmest opinion that the land would, in a large measure, eventually prove profitable for pastoral settlement. The question of water supply would be an immediately pressing one, if the railway were constructed, but we have recently had rather encouraging reports as to the possibility of obtaining artesian water within the areas that would be traversed by the line. We have, therefore, I think, sufficient evidence to justify us in expending the comparatively small sum asked for in obtaining a proper survey of the proposed route. I take it that that survey will not be an investigation merely of the country within, say, a few hundred yards on each side of the direct route, from a point at the head of Spencer's Gulf to Kalgoorlie, but that cross-sections will be made to determine the nature of the country north and south of the proposed line. If that is done, we shall have a more comprehensive idea of the character of the country that will be served than can be obtained from a mere flying survey of the direct route. In regard to the question asked of the Minister of Home Affairs by the honorable and learned member for Parkes, I may say that, immediately on assuming office, some months ago, I entered into communication with the then Premier of Western Australia, Mr. James, to ascertain whether his Government would guarantee to bear a larger share of any loss that might accrue from the construction and working of the proposed railway than would have to be borne by the State in proportion to its population, and, after a number of communications had passed between us, some of which have been laid upon the table of the House, he stated that he was prepared to promise, on behalf of his Government, a liberal contribution over and above what the State would have to pay on a population basis towards meeting any loss which might accrue during the first ten years after the line was constructed.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Was anything said about the increment in value which would be given to the land along the route of the line?

Mr. WATSON.—No; but seeing that it is State-owned land——

Mr. KENNEDY.—And seeing, moreover, that the State is not to pay for the railway!

Mr. MAHON.—At any rate, private individuals will not obtain the benefit of the added value given to the land by the expenditure of the Commonwealth.

Mr. WATSON.—As the State owns the land through which the line would pass, the interjection of the honorable member for Moira adds force to the contention that Western Australia may be expected to make a special contribution towards meeting any possible loss; and the Premier of that State met my suggestion in a most liberal spirit.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—His promise was a rather vague one.

Mr. WATSON.—He very properly pointed out in the correspondence that, as it is not known what the railway would cost, and as it is impossible to make any proper estimate of its cost until a survey has been undertaken, it is rather premature to state definitely what contribution the State would make; but I regarded his offer as one made in the most generous spirit, and I am given to understand that the present Government of the State is willing to carry out the undertaking arrived at between us.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The point I wish to emphasize is that the Federal expenditure will increase the value of State land.

Mr. FOWLER.—That is so with all Federal expenditure. Even the erection by the Commonwealth of a post-office increases the value of the adjacent State land.

Mr. WATSON.—I have always been a believer in the idea that persons through whose land a railway is made, should give to the State some guarantee against loss on its construction and working, and, when a member of the New South Wales Parliament, I was one of those who moved to get the principle adopted in connexion with some of the railways constructed by the State of recent years. What I speak of is not a betterment tax, as the term is ordinarily understood, but a guarantee against loss to the authority constructing the railway. The principle was adopted years ago in the Irish Light Railways Act, and has been found to work most satisfactorily ever since—the land-owners guaranteeing to the constructing authority, whether it be the State or a private company, a certain proportion of any loss that might accrue from the construction of a line.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—More than half of the proposed railway will be in South Australia.

Mr. WATSON.—I was successful in getting the principle I speak of incorporated in some of the measures passed by the New South Wales Parliament of late years sanctioning railway construction, and the result encouraged me to ask of the Premier of Western Australia the question to which I have referred—Whether his State would be prepared to bear a proportion of the loss, if any, which might accrue in connexion with the construction of the line? As I have said, I was met in a most generous spirit.

Mr. KELLY.—Did the honorable member ask the same question of the Premier of South Australia?

Mr. WATSON.—No; but I asked the Premier of South Australia if he would be prepared to ask the State Parliament to pass a Bill to sanction the construction of the line.

Mr. KELLY.—Why did not the honorable member ask the same question of both Premiers?

Mr. WATSON.—In arrangements between Governments, just as in business arrangements, it is well to proceed step by step, and the first step to take was to get the Government of South Australia to consent to ask the Parliament of the State to sanction the construction of the line through its territory. Up to the present time the South Australian Parliament has not given that sanction; but, under the Constitution, it must be given before the railway can be constructed by the Commonwealth.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—South Australia has agreed to the survey being made.

Mr. WATSON.—The Government of the State when in communication with me raised no objection whatever to the survey being made, but they refused to commit themselves on the main question as to whether they would or would not ask the Parliament of South Australia to sanction the construction of the line.

Mr. EWING.—The honorable member regards the motion merely as one to provide for an investigation. It does not bind him in any way.

Mr. WATSON.—Quite so. I have already said that. I hold myself free, if the evidence seems to warrant such action, to vote against the proposal to construct the line if it is ever brought forward, and I happen to be here at the time.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The question is whether the investigation should not be undertaken at the expense of the people who would chiefly benefit.

Mr. FOWLER.—The whole Commonwealth would benefit.

Mr. WATSON.—The question asked by the honorable and learned member for Parkes is a matter for argument. It is not one upon which one can dogmatize. There is more reason why the Commonwealth should take some share of responsibility in connexion with this proposal than would apply to any other railway proposal that might come before us, since it is one which has in view the giving of communication to a State which is widely separated from the other States.

Mr. EWING.—Does the honorable member think that there was a tacit understanding on this matter?

Mr. WATSON.—I do not attach very much importance to the promises or semi-promises made on the subject by those who at the time had no authority to speak for Australia. The people of Western Australia may have been led into looking upon Federation more favorably because of the statements of certain leading politicians of the other States than they would otherwise have done.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is no doubt about that.

Mr. WATSON.—Still that fact does not bind the people of Australia as a whole, though it should bind those who made the promises to exercise their influence and to give their votes for the construction of the line.

Mr. WATKINS. — Why should not the Commonwealth also build a bridge to Tasmania?

Mr. FOWLER.—The suggestion has been made that the Commonwealth should subsidize a line of steamers between the mainland and Tasmania.

Mr. WATSON.—If the honorable member for Newcastle would furnish designs for a bridge which could be constructed at a reasonable cost, I, for one, should be prepared to consider the matter. I am glad that the Government have seen fit to introduce this Bill at an early stage, and I shall support the proposal it contains.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH (Parkes).—I do not think that there is any necessity to emphasize the proposition that, although the Committee may agree to this motion, no honorable member will in any way be bound to subsequently vote for the construction of the proposed railway. There is no need to look so far ahead as that in any criticism of the proposal now before us. I think that this is a very serious matter, and although I have every desire to assist the Government in their legislation, the explanation which we have had does not seem to me to recognise the seriousness of so novel a proposal.

Mr. FOWLER.—It is not a novel proposal, because it has been before two Governments.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Although a comparatively small expenditure is involved, the principle at issue is a very large one. The Commonwealth is, for the first time, being asked to undertake the first stage in the construction of a railway primarily for the benefit of one State, and we should therefore consider what principle is to be observed in these matters. The Minister, in explaining the proposal to the House, said that we must remember that the railway would ultimately belong to the Commonwealth. Now, in the history of railway construction in Australia, the consolation of Governments which have constructed railways which gave no immediate return has been that they are increasing the value of their landed estate. I admit that the sum now asked for is a comparatively small one.

Mr. HUME COOK.—What is to be the cost of the proposed survey?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—£20,000.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The amount is not mentioned in the motion.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—No, but I understand that that is to be the maximum expenditure.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That is the sum provided for in the Bill.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Although the sum provided for is comparatively small, we are now being asked to take a preliminary step which involves a very great principle. We are being asked to construct a railway at the expense of the Commonwealth, while the whole of the increment in value which it will give to the land through which it passes will go, not to the Commonwealth, but to a State.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That will always be the case when the Commonwealth constructs a railway.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Yes, but as this is the first instance in which we have been asked to sanction such a railway, the Committee should consider very carefully the precedent which we are establishing.

Mr. FOWLER.—Do we not establish that principle every time we build a post-office?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—No; because the principle was established when we built our first post-office. The honorable member is a most enthusiastic supporter of this project, and naturally so, not only in its preliminary, but in its ultimate, stages, and I wish him to recognise that an important principle is involved in the proposal now before us. I do not wish to single myself out as an opponent of it, but, years ago, when Federation was being advocated, I opposed the idea of the Commonwealth constructing this railway at an expenditure of many millions of money.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—This railway?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Yes.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It was never proposed before.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—It was mentioned at the Federal Conventions, and, during the Federal campaign, the representatives of Western Australia contended that ultimately that State must be connected with the eastern railway systems, in order that it might be brought into close union with the State in which the Capital was to be established.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—And reasonably so, too.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The right honorable gentleman can advance that view when he addresses the House. The fact that previous Governments have been in favour of making the proposed survey affords no argument why the work should be undertaken by the present Government.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—At all events, it is an evidence of unanimity on the part of those who have been in power.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—It shows that we are entitled to expect the Government to call upon the people who are going to be so largely benefited by the construction of the line to contribute to the initial cost. Surely it is fair to say to the people of Western Australia—"We are perfectly willing to embark upon a preliminary survey, with a view to the ultimate construction of this line if, in view of the fact that you are to be specially benefited, you will contribute something more than your pro rata or per capita share towards the cost." The Government might very well say to the people of Western Australia—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—And also to the people of South Australia.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Yes, and also to the people of South Australia—"In the report furnished by certain engineers upon this line, it is represented that it is likely in ten years to produce very satisfactory results, and, inasmuch as these results cannot be produced until this preliminary expenditure of £20,000 is incurred, you should contribute more than your share per capita." It might be very fairly said—"This railway will primarily benefit you both, by establishing a trade so large that the profit resulting from it will defray the interest upon the large capital outlay involved, and by enormously increasing the value of your territories, and, therefore, we shall expect you, in the first place, at all events, to find the money to defray the cost of the preliminary survey. If the Commonwealth should ultimately decide to construct the line as a Commonwealth property, we shall return you the £20,000 expended upon the survey."

Mr. MALONEY.—A very good suggestion.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I do not expect honorable members representing Western Australia to sympathize with my attitude upon this question. It is very natural that they should desire to have the work carried out in the interests of their State. I wish them to accept my assurance that I am taking up my present position only because I think that it is fair and equitable to the other States that the expenditure involved should come primarily out of the pockets of the two States to be specially benefited, even though it may ultimately be recouped by the Commonwealth.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Would the honorable and learned member apply the same principle to the expenditure upon the Federal Capital?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I should be very sorry if any representative of Western Australia were to think that I offer my criticism in any spirit of Inter-State rivalry. I have all along been disposed—if I have not actually manifested that disposition—to deprecate the practice of constantly setting up State against State, and it is because I endeavour to look at this question in its preliminary stage from the Commonwealth point of view, that I should have liked to see some principle laid down by the Government to justify the proposed expenditure without first making a strong demand upon the two States which are to be specially benefited to contribute the money in the first place.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We all have to contribute towards the expenditure upon the Federal Capital, which is to be located in the New South Wales territory.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I should like the Committee to consider this proposal in the light of a precedent. It will be said by—and by that the precedent does not depend upon the proposed work being a railway, but upon its being a public work; and I can quite foresee that in the future attempts might be made to place more enterprises of this kind upon the shoulders of the Commonwealth, on the ground that Western Australia was receiving this advantage. As I pointed out, the two chief advantages, if not the only ones that are likely to result from the construction of the line, apart from the fact that it will bring the western State into closer union with the eastern States, will be the establishment of commercial traffic between Western Australia and the eastern States, and the great increment in value of territory which will accrue to Western Australia and South Australia. At the present time this Committee is very ill-informed as to the character of the country through which the line is to pass.

Mr. FOWLER.—We admit that.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I have read the report of the committee of engineers who were appointed to inquire into this matter, and I say that, although a flying survey is a work which is peculiarly within the province of an engineer, a member of that profession is one of the last men in the world to be considered qualified to estimate the commercial results of a proposed railway. I had the honour of being the Minister for railway construction during the three years that I occupied the position of Secretary for Public Works in New South Wales, and I know very well that one never thought of asking the engineers who made the flying survey in connexion with a new line to express their opinions upon its commercial prospects. All the engineers were asked to do was, in the course of their professional business, to make their flying or their ultimate survey, as the case might be, and the Railway Commissioners were called upon to report upon the commercial prospects of the line. It is provided in the Public Works Act of New South Wales that no proposals shall be submitted to the Standing Committee on Public Works for investigation until the Railway Commissioners have added to the information supplied by the engineers, by reporting upon the commercial prospects of a project. Of course, this may be considered a mere side issue here, but it is important that we should recollect that the Committee is not at the present time in a position to form any clear conception with regard to the character of the country through which the railway will pass.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Oh, yes; we have the reports furnished by the surveyors who travelled over the proposed route.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I have read most carefully the reports of the engineers. Mr. Henry Deane, Engineer-in-Chief in New South Wales, travelled over a portion of the route, and he was one of the engineers who made the estimate of the probable cost, and stated that the line was likely to produce satisfactory results in ten years. I am not, for a moment, attempting to criticise the line as a commercial undertaking. That would be premature. But the fact that we are not committing ourselves to the construction of the line affords no reason why we should in silence, and without full consideration, pass a proposal—the first of its kind in the Commonwealth—to spend £20,000 upon the survey of a line which is to benefit primarily two States which are not being asked to contribute one copper, beyond their per capita proportion, towards the expenditure. That is my point, and I contend that my position is a sound one. I am not speaking in any spirit of antagonism to Western Australia, because no one would be more pleased than I should be if the commercial prospects were such as to justify the construction of the line. I think that it is one of the most unfortunate circumstances in connexion with the Commonwealth that the centres of population are so wide apart that it is almost impossible for men who do not give up the whole of their time to political work to attend Parliament, and take part in its deliberations. I should be one of the first to rejoice if the commercial prospects could be shown to justify the construction of the line. I would most strongly impress upon the Committee that it is only fair that we should ask the Government for an assurance that all the necessary steps have been taken to obtain from the States which are likely to be primarily benefited by the construction of the line, some substantial contribution towards the proposed expenditure.

Mr. MAHON.—It is hopeless to expect South Australia to make any special contribution.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I do not know that. I can hardly conclude that it is hopeless to make such a request, even in the case of South Australia, because we know that some hundreds of miles of the present South Australian railways would be upon the route of the proposed transcontinental line. The traffic upon the Port Augusta railway at present is limited, and every one must recognise that if a through line were ultimately constructed, and a large trade such as would be necessary to justify the proposed work became an accomplished fact, South Australia would benefit very largely from the increased traffic over her existing line. Therefore, it ought to be very easy to demonstrate, not only to the Western Australian Government, but also to the South Australian Government, that a very great future would be in store for them. It would surely be reasonable for us to say, "We are perfectly willing to take this preliminary step, but we are not going to do it at the expense of the Commonwealth if the project should not be undertaken. If you, between you, will contribute this comparatively small sum—because it is a comparatively small sum—we shall undertake—"

Mr. MAHON.—If the States wished to incur the expense of the survey, they need not ask the consent of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Is not the fact that there is no movement for the construction of the proposed railway in those States a very strong argument against the present proposal?

Mr. MAHON.—There is a movement in Western Australia.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH. — Then let the movement go on!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We can do nothing except with the consent of the South Australian Parliament.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—One honorable member for Western Australia says there is a movement in that State in favour of the construction of the railway, but when I turn to the right honorable member for Swan, who has infinitely greater experience, he says, "We can do nothing without South Australia."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Nor can we, because the proposed line would pass through 550 miles of South Australian territory.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I am perfectly well aware of that. That is my reason for pointing out that the Government might well have approached these two States, and have asked them to contribute a large part, if not all, of this expenditure of £20,000, subject to one condition. If the line be ultimately constructed, it will undoubtedly be Commonwealth property, although if the sanguine accounts we hear about the land are true, it will add enormously to the increment of Western Australian State property. The Prime Minister is now present, and I would submit to him that the Commonwealth should have approached the Governments of South Australia and Western Australia, and have said, "We are perfectly willing to embark upon this preliminary survey—"

Sir JOHN FORREST. — The two States could embark on it, even if we were not willing.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I would answer that interjection by asking why they do not embark upon it? If Western Australia and South Australia are going to benefit to the extent to which my right honorable friend says they will by the construction of this line—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have not said anything.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I have heard my right honorable friend speak of the merchandise which is to be carried over the line, and of the passengers who will be in such a hurry to reach the eastern States, that they will leave the comfortable and snug decks of a Pacific and Oriental or Orient steamer for a three days' railway journey across a stretch of country—

Mr. MAUGER.—Was the honorable and learned member ever in a storm?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—In many, both political and natural. It would have been a very fair thing, from a business point of view, had the Commonwealth Government said to the two States concerned, "This is a scheme which, if it results in the construction of the line, will enormously benefit you. The preliminary survey will involve an expenditure of £20,000. We are perfectly willing to embark on this survey, provided that you will pay the cost, on the understanding that if the railway be ultimately constructed, and become Commonwealth property, we will recoup you in respect of it."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—A tremendous expenditure! The honorable and learned member has such small ideas.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I have impatience manifested in front of me, and behind me. I need only an exhibition of it on either side, to allow of my pointing out my position by paraphrasing a well-known poem. What I am endeavouring to do in the midst of these frequent interruptions, is to consider this matter from a business point of view. We are bound to have regard to that consideration in dealing with the finances of the Commonwealth. We should say to the two States concerned, "This undertaking may result ultimately in the construction of the line; the railway will be of enormous benefit to you in view of the increment in the value of the land which will take place on both sides of it." It might be said to South Australia, "It will put you into much closer touch with Europe," and to Western Australia, "It will put you into much closer touch with the eastern States. We are perfectly willing to take this preliminary step, provided that you bear the expenditure in the first place, on the understanding that if the line be ultimately constructed, and owned by the Commonwealth, it will recoup you in respect of this outlay, as being part of the total cost of the scheme. If, on the other hand, the survey results in demonstrating the practical impossibility of making this line, by reason of its great cost, as compared with its commercial prospects, we shall expect you to bear this cost." I think that is a very fair proposal. The late Prime Minister has told us that he approached the Premiers of Western Australia, and South Australia with regard to the ultimate cost. He seems very satisfied—although I confess that I should not have been, had I occupied his position—with the promise of generous treatment which he received.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That was in regard to the loss on the line.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The leader of the Opposition said that he had received promises of the most generous treatment from the Premiers of the two States.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—No; from the Premier of one State.

Mr. ROBINSON.—From the Premier of Western Australia; they are a prodigal lot over there.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Let me argue the matter from the point of view that he received the most generous offer from the Premier of one State. That generous offer however, was of a very vague, non-committal character. It was simply this: "If the line is ultimately carried out, we shall be prepared to enter into some liberal arrangement with regard to the loss upon its maintenance." That is just about as definite as the promise which a Minister has frequently to make to deputations that he will give the subject-matter of their request "careful consideration." I have made that promise hundreds of times, and know very well that it left me just as free as I was before I made it. This reliance on the generous offer of the Premier of Western Australia to contribute a fair share to the loss which may occur when the line is open to traffic, seems to me very much like shutting the stable door after the steed is stolen.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Western Australian Government offered to contribute the loss on their own length of line.

Mr. MAHON.—For the first ten years.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—That loss could not be ascertained until the line had been constructed, and it would be too late then to take exception to the degree of generosity which the State Government—and there might be half-a-dozen or a dozen different Governments between now and then—might show. I submit that my suggestion is a fair one. I urge, quite irrespective of the Government proposal, that it would be reasonable for the Commonwealth Government to say to the people of Western Australia—"We should like to discount your generosity of ten years hence; we should like a little cash. We should like you to join with South Australia in bearing the cost of this preliminary survey, and if the line ultimately becomes ours, inasmuch this is a necessary preliminary expenditure—very much like an architect's fees for the plans for the construction of a house—we will take it off your hands, and recoup you for what you have done." We are creating a precedent with regard to the construction of a new kind of public works in the States—works which ultimately admittedly in an increment of wealth to the State in which they are constructed. The circumstances of a proposal of this kind are unique. The Commonwealth is asked to expend money that will add largely to the wealth of Western Australia, and we shall be perfectly justified, therefore, in approaching the Governments of the two States in the way I have suggested.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—South Australia would say that she would not do anything of the kind.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Then she would show her want of bona fides in the matter.

Mr. MAHON.—She has already done that.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—If the Western Australian Government said, "We are not prepared to pay anything beyond our per capita contribution on the Commonwealth expenditure," they would also show a want of bona fides. I think that this is a very fair test. The right honorable member for Swan, who has been accustomed to throw hundreds of thousands of pounds about in connexion with water schemes and other works, should now realize the enormous importance which attaches to the construction of the proposed railway. I offer my comments not in any spirit of antagonism, but in the belief that the people of the Commonwealth are entitled to have this matter considered from a more business-like point of view. The hands of the Government would be materially strengthened if they were able to tell the House that they had approached the Government of Western Australia, and either that they had refused absolutely to contribute a penny to the cost, or that they had undertaken to pay the whole cost in the first case. If the Western Australian Government refused absolutely to contribute to the cost, I believe it would lead this House to say that it showed their want of confidence in the proposal; because, after all, the cost of the preliminary survey, in proportion to the ultimate cost of the construction of the line, is much less than that of a mere rough sketch of a proposed building. If I were about to construct a building for some relative, and he said to me, "I will not even pay for the cost of a rough plan at the first stage," I should say "Well, you take very little interest in the matter, and I think that you are scarcely justified in asking me to put my hand in my own pocket to pay the cost of even a rough sketch for your building."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—A fine Federal spirit!

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The interruption is of sufficient importance to justify an answer. I hold that I am advocating the true Federal spirit, and I challenge the right honorable member to point to a single instance in which I have ever encouraged in this House any spirit of rivalry between the States. I have endeavoured always to forget the landmarks of the States, and to treat the funds of the Commonwealth as the funds of the people of all Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member forgets that the States are now federated.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I know that we are.

Mr. SKENE.—What about the implied promise?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I am deprecating a proposal on the part of the Government to spend £20,000 on a preliminary survey, without first endeavouring to obtain the money from the States. The expense is to be incurred in carrying out a work which is to ultimately benefit, not the Commonwealth, but the States concerned, because it is admitted that we cannot expect any profit from the railway during the first ten years of its existence. It would, therefore, be a huge expenditure on the part of the Commonwealth, for the benefit of the States. I admit that the desire to join Western Australia with the other States by railway evidences a Federal spirit; but to say that we should look upon this proposal as if it had been provided for in the Constitution—to say, as we have been told, that there was a sort of implied agreement between Western Australia and the other States—that although the Constitution did not provide for the construction of the line, there is an obligation on the part of the Commonwealth to make it—is, in my opinion, to very materially strain the situation which exists between the different States; and I do submit that what I have said to the Committee is by no means in prejudice of that Federal spirit, which jealously guards the expenditure of the funds of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan).—I regret that the debate upon this matter should take place in Committee. I have no doubt that the course adopted is in accord with the Standing Orders, but it is not in accord with the practice to which I have been accustomed. Resolutions founded on messages from His Excellency the Governor, with reference to the expenditure of public money have in my experience, generally been agreed to as formal matters, and the debate upon the measure covered by the message has been reserved for the second reading of the Bill dealing with the subject. I think that is a more convenient practice than that which has been followed on the present occasion, as, under the practice now followed, a long discussion may be initiated upon the Governor-General's message, and there may be another long debate upon the second reading of the measure. I do not know who is responsible for this course of procedure, but I think the motion now before us might have been allowed to pass as a formal matter, and we could have taken the debate on the second reading of the Bill, which would have been at once introduced. The message in this instance covers a recommendation to appropriate funds for carrying out a survey of a railway to connect Eastern and Western Australia. Such a railway has been long talked about, much desired, and, in my opinion, and in the opinion of those who think with me, is absolutely essential to the real federation of the Australian States. Honorable members are, of course, aware that Eastern Australia is separated from Western Australia by a large extent of unoccupied country, and that there is no practical means of communication by land between the two except by several months of travel between the settlements on the eastern and those on the western side of the continent. The whole of the traffic, the whole of the trade between the eastern and western States of Australia, is conducted by sea, and it has been the desire and the hope, not only of Western Australians, but of all who take a broad view of the ultimate prospects of the continent that the connexion of the eastern and western States by railway should be undertaken. I very much regret that my honorable and learned friend, the member for Parkes—I think I may refer to him as such, because he is my friend personally—should have made the speech he did just now. I have been accustomed to listen with pleasure to the honorable and learned member. There is no member of the House to whom I have listened hitherto with greater pleasure, even when I did not agree with him, than the honorable and learned member. But to-night he seems to have wandered away from those broad statesman-like views he has so often uttered, which were not limited by considerations for any parish, town, or city, and not even by the ocean that surrounds Australia. To-night I could hardly believe that I was listening to the honorable and learned member for Parkes. The views he enunciated seemed to me to be more fitted for the consideration of a matter affecting a small township or parish, and were certainly altogether out of place in dealing with a matter which affects the whole continent of Australia. We are not here dealing with the interests of Western Australia, or any particular State, but with the greater question of the Federation of continental Australia, and with what is embodied in spirit, if not in words, in the Constitution under which we live. I do not suppose that there is any one in Australia, or out of it, who will be found to argue that the Federation we are enjoying at the present time can be considered complete when one-third of the continent, with a quarter of a million of people forming a very progressive State, remains separated from the rest of Australia, without any means of communication except by sea. Any one who takes the trouble to visit Western Australia will find that the voyage will occupy him four days, during the greater part of which time he will probably be out of sight of land, and when he reaches Fremantle I find it difficult to believe that there will be foremost in his mind a feeling that he is still within the boundaries of the Federation he left four days before. He would rather be inclined to believe that he had reached some island in the Indian Ocean separated altogether from the country he had left on the eastern side of Australia.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—How much nearer to Europe is Western Australia than are the eastern States?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I say on my own behalf, and on behalf of the people of Western Australia, of whom I am one of the representatives in this House, that Federation as at present existing is not the Federation that we understood it would be when we entered into the compact of union. I know what were the feelings of the people of Western Australia—no one should know them better—at the time we entered the Federation. The one belief throughout the length and breadth of that State—a belief encouraged by the utterances of the public men of Australia, and by the terms of the Constitution, as I shall show before I sit down—was that the condition of isolation that existed between Western Australia and the rest of the continent would within a short time—within a reasonable number of years—come to an end. The honorable and learned member for Parkes will probably appreciate my remarks when I say that the existing condition of isolation interferes very much—and to a larger extent than in the case of any other State in the Commonwealth—with the representation of Western Australia in the Federal Parliament. It is not every one, and in fact there are only a few people who are able to leave their homes for several months, and perhaps for a year, in order to attend to parliamentary duties. I have little doubt that, by the time I return to my home at the conclusion of this session, I shall have been absent from it nearly a year, and this will not be the first time that that has occurred. There can therefore be no doubt but that the isolation of Western Australia interferes very largely with the representation of the State, because there are very few persons who have the necessary means and leisure to devote the whole of their time to public affairs.

Mr. KELLY.—Would the construction of the Transcontinental Railway practically remedy that difficulty?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It would remedy it to a very large extent, because a Western Australian representative could go back to his State any and every day, and return any and every day by railway, as is done by members representing the other States.

Mr. KELLY.—It would take him about three days to get there.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If the honorable member will think for a moment he will admit that the long adjournments we have had occasionally during this session would have enabled Western Australian representatives to visit their homes, and spend perhaps a fortnight there before again returning to their duties in Parliament. That could not be done under existing conditions, as although the steamers communicating with Western Australia are good, and regular, they leave for and from that State only on certain days.

Mr. HUME COOK.—How many days' travelling would be saved by the construction of the railway?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Two days' travelling, at any rate, but it is not only the saving in the time occupied in travelling, but in the waiting for an opportunity to travel. If we had railway communication we could travel every day. I say again that the present condition of affairs largely interferes with the representation of Western Australia in this Parliament. We shall never obtain the same representation that may be obtained by the other States of the Commonwealth, because we shall never have the same number of persons willing to come forward to represent the people of Western Australia, so long as they are without an easy and rapid means of getting backwards and forwards. If the difficulty were impossible of remedy, if the ocean divided us, and we could not help ourselves, we should have to make the best of it, but seeing that we can remedy the difficulty, I can see no reason why we should not set about it. I make this statement in the face of honorable members, and of the people of Australia, that, if the people of Western Australia had thought that Federation would mean to them a continuance of the isolation to which they had been subjected in the past, they would never have thought of entering it. Why should they have entered the Federation if it was not intended to be a real union, a closer union than it had been previously?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The right honorable member is speaking after the event; now he is sorry for it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I spoke before the event. The honorable and learned member for Parkes has made statements this evening which show that he has not studied this subject sufficiently. I knew all about it before, but I advised the people of Western Australia to sink all minor differences, and to have faith in the justice and reasonableness of the people of Australia. Perhaps some people may say that my views did not largely influence the result, but at all events they helped to induce the people of Western Australia to consent to Federation.

Mr. STORRER.—Western Australia retained her Customs duties.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That was settled in the Convention long before, and if

I had chosen to ask for the Transcontinental Railway in the Convention I should probably have got it too.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Why did not the right honorable gentleman ask for it?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Because I did not think it necessary. I knew the terms of the Constitution, but I shall not now anticipate what I propose to say later on. The principal lever used by myself, and by every other person in Western Australia, who advocated Federation, was that the union would result in the early establishment of railway communication between all the capital cities of Australia. That was the great lever used by us all in inducing the people of Western Australia to join the Federation. The honorable member for Wentworth smiles, but perhaps he does not understand the motives that I and others had in advocating Australian unity. We were not thinking only of ourselves, or of the present—we desired to strengthen the Empire; we desired also to strengthen the bonds that unite us to the mother country. To present my arguments in proper sequence, I shall show what were the views submitted to the people of Western Australia by myself as Premier when I sought to induce them to enter the Federation. There was naturally a great desire that Western Australia should enter the Union, it being felt that Federation with one-third of the continent not included would not be the Federation to which we looked forward. It was realized that any one who from selfish or parochial motives endeavoured to prevent or retard the true Federation of Australia, in the interests of the Empire, was taking a tremendous responsibility. No doubt that feeling influenced many of us in trying our best to set aside, as far as possible, all minor considerations in order to consummate the Union. What did the right honorable member for Adelaide, Mr. Kingston, who was then Premier of South Australia, write to me on the subject of this railway being constructed, and with the sole object of inducing Western Australia to join Federation? He wrote—

We hope that it will not be long before Western Australians and South Australians are co-operating in the Parliament of the Commonwealth to bring this about, and we repeat that you can rely on South Australia's sympathy and support.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—That is about as substantial as was the promise of the Premier of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It was reported to me by one of my colleagues who had visited South Australia, before Western Australia had agreed to enter Federation, that he had heard remarks in Adelaide which tended to show that some people there were not in favour of the construction of the line, and on this the right honorable member for Adelaide wrote—

Cannot understand references to probable reluctance of South Australia to permit Federal construction of railway connecting colonies. We have no fear of any such anti-Federal "dog-in-the-manger" policy.

What did our present Speaker, Sir Frederick Holder, when Premier of South Australia, write to me on the subject, and with the same object? He wrote to me on the 1st February, 1900—

Following our conversation as to the possible blocking of the construction of a railway line from Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta by the Federal authority, by South Australia refusing the consent rendered necessary by section XXXIV. of clause 51 of the Commonwealth Bill, to the construction of the line through her territory, I regard the withholding of consent as a most improbable thing, in fact, quite out of the question. To assure you of our attitude in the matter, I will undertake, as soon as the Federation is established, Western and South Australia both being States of the Commonwealth, to introduce a Bill, formally giving the assent of this province to the construction of the line by the Federal authority, and to pass it stage by stage simultaneously with the passage of a similar Bill in your Parliament.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Western Australia must have been up for sale, and that must have been her price.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Western Australia had not then entered Federation.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—That is why I say that must have been the price.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not see much sense in the interjection. There is no doubt that, as I shall show, the other States were looking after themselves, and the honorable member could not have been in public life at the time, or he would know that the State which he represents was not eager to enter Federation, and held back to the last.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Queensland had no price.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Yes, Queensland had; there was black labour.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—And that is costing all the States, including Western Australia, a good deal of money just now.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Does the right honorable member not think it premature to discuss the merits of the railway claimed by Western Australia?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In my judgment it is not premature. I want to show that there were inducements held out to Western Australia to enter Federation, and that one of those inducements was that it would not be long before the railway, for the survey of which a sum of money is now asked, would be completed. How can my remarks be said to be irrelevant?

Mr. WEBSTER.—Why did the Western Australian people not stipulate that the railway should be provided for in the Constitution, as was the Federal Capital?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Sir Frederick Holder merely said that the South Australian Government would authorize the railway going through their territory.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What was the object of the letter of Sir Frederick Holder? The object of the letter was to do everything possible to induce Western Australia to enter the Federation, and the people of that State accepted the promise, which formed one of the chief reasons, the lever in fact, which induced them to join. The Western Australian people realized that with the railway, Federation would to them be a reality, because their State would then be joined to the rest of Australia, and not, as in the past, an isolated State—to all intents and purposes an island in the ocean.

Mr. KELLY.—How does the letter read?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I shall hand the letter to the honorable member who may then read it for himself. The offer to construct a railway to join States is not without precedent, as a means of bringing about Federation. In Canada we have the instance of British Columbia, which refused to enter the Union on the original terms. It was not until years afterwards that British Columbia undertook to enter the Union, and that was only on condition that the Dominion Parliament should construct a railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and run trains daily from either end. If the Western Australian people had been less trustful of the people of Australia, and had insisted on a similar condition, there is not the slightest doubt that long ere this a resolution would have been passed by the Commonwealth Parliament asking that State to join. We can hardly imagine a patriotic Australian believing that the Commonwealth would be complete if one-third of the continent were not included. As a Federalist, I looked closely into the question, with the object of showing that some material gain would accrue to my State from Federation, but, so far as I could see, we had then nothing financially to gain; so far as the pounds, shillings, and pence aspect of the case was concerned, there was no advantage at that time to be gained by Western Australia. The railway, however, provided an inducement which could be placed before the people, as it would provide for daily communication with the rest of Australia. When we were holding up before the people of Western Australia the prospect of this railway communication, and the question was discussed from one end of the State to the other—when the adhesion of that State was one of the most important topics of the day, and was discussed in all the leading journals of the eastern States, and the public men of Australia showed intense anxiety that the Union should be complete—was anything said in the South Australian or the Victorian press, or indeed the press of Australia, or in Parliament, adverse to the proposal? Were the views which I and others placed before the people of Western Australia, and which were published in the eastern States daily, ever criticised adversely? Were the proposals, which I was then suggesting, described then by the press of Victoria as a “gigantic fraud”? Nothing was said to lead any one to believe that what was being promised to the people of Western Australia was not likely to be accomplished.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—When Sir Edmund Barton announced the policy of the Government at Maitland, great disapproval of the scheme was shown throughout New South Wales.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That was after Federation was established.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Was Federation a matter of barter between the States?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I admit that there was even a little barter.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Western Australia got a special Tariff.

Mr. CARPENTER.—And New South Wales got the Federal Capital.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Any one would think that the honorable and learned member for Parkes and his constituents paid for the special Tariff, whereas the fact is that the people of Western Australia paid for it themselves, and it did not cost New South Wales, or any other State, one farthing.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The right honorable member is very much magnifying my criticisms.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member should not criticise if he does not know the facts.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I do not mind; the right honorable member is paying me a compliment.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not entirely rely on my own observations and opinions in regard to this railway, and would like to quote what the present Prime Minister said in regard to it.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Was that when the Prime Minister was on a visit to Western Australia?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think so. I wish the honorable and learned member would not interrupt. Before he finds fault, the honorable and learned member ought to make sure I am stating the circumstances incorrectly. Perhaps the honorable and learned member enjoys hectoring me, though I do not think he ought to do so, because I have a duty to perform which I ought to be allowed to carry out, without ridiculous interruptions from anybody. The Prime Minister, in a press interview he gave at that time, is thus reported—

Mr. Reid pointed out that it would not be of advantage to Western Australia alone, but also to the rest of the Commonwealth. It would shorten the journey between the eastern States and Europe, and be useful for defensive purposes. "Western Australia," said he, "is at the furthest end of the Continent, and hopelessly removed from the eastern States, so that it should receive consideration, especially in the direction of uniting it by rail with the other States."

Prior to the first Federal election the Prime Minister, commenting on Sir Edmund Barton's Maitland speech, said—

There is one part in the general statement of Mr. Barton's to which I would like to refer, and that is the construction of the Transcontinental Railway. The work is one that must be carried out. It is absolutely necessary from a commercial, military, and national point of view. Although I, for one, will hold the Ministry to strict acts in all matters anticipating approval, I think the Government might take upon themselves the responsibility of undertaking the initial work of exploring the best possible routes.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The Prime Minister meant the Government of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Prime Minister did not mean anything of the sort, and the honorable member for Bourke does not think that the Government of Western Australia was meant. If the honorable member is going to misrepresent in his interjections, I shall take no notice of him. The report of the press interview proceeded—

"You can tell them a good deal more than the plain fact that I am in no way opposed to the construction of the railway to Western Australia. You can say that I am very strongly in favour of it; furthermore, I am in favour of its being constructed at the earliest possible moment. I do not expect it to pay at first, and I think the Commonwealth should be prepared to cover any margin of loss. According to the estimate prepared by Mr. O'Connor, and lately published, the loss will not be great. If I had anything to do with it I would, of course, endeavour to reduce that loss."

"Don't you think that the rest of the Commonwealth is, to some extent, morally bound to build the line?"

"Whilst there has been no legal compact yet," replied Mr. Reid, "there is some obligation inasmuch as the belief that the line would be constructed was one of the main reasons why Western Australia joined the Federation. Many of the representative men of the East I know pledged themselves to support the building of the railway, if Western Australia came into the Commonwealth."

Mr. WEBSTER.—Was that before the referendum?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No, it was after the Maitland address, and before the first elections. The question is often asked—"Why does not Western Australia build this railway herself? The other States have built their own railways, and why should not Western Australia do the same in this case? Why should the Commonwealth be called upon to build it?" If Western Australia had another State alongside, occupying the same position as she does, probably some arrangement would have been made by which the railway would have been built. But honorable members must recollect that for more than half the distance the railway would traverse South Australian territory. The shorter distance by 100 miles or so is in Western Australia. So that if we were to build the railway to the border, we should still be from 550 to 600 miles away from the nearest railway station in South Australia. That is one reason. But, apart from that, the object of this railway is not to open up the lands of Western Australia, although it may have some effect in that direction. My honorable and learned friend, the member for Parkes, spoke of the great value that would be given to the lands through which the line passed. For my own part, I do not think that there will be any difficulty in getting as much land on each side of the railway from the Western Australian Government as the Commonwealth desires to obtain. But I do not think that that is of great importance. It is not the value of the land, but what comes off the land, that is of value. All that comes off the land would be available as traffic for the railway. It does not seem to me to matter twopence who owns the land, so long as it is utilized. The railway would insure the utilization of the land, and whether it belongs to the Commonwealth or to the State is, to my mind, of very little importance.

MR. BRUCE SMITH.—I spoke of that point to show that the State is going to get all the increment.

SIR JOHN FORREST.—I do not think that the land would be very valuable to the State. It was not well watered. In fact, there is no surface water upon it. The capital value of the land would be small. It is the facilities afforded by the railway that would insure the improvement and utilization of the land. That is another point which shows that the honorable and learned member for Parkes has not worked this matter out so thoroughly as he usually does. Otherwise he would not have used an argument like that. In entering Federation, every State of the Commonwealth was actuated, in some degree at any rate, by the hope of material gain. Every one of the States expected that Federation would bring about greater prosperity to its people. I do not know that they were wrong in thinking that. At any rate such is the case. But in Western Australia we were unable to show the people, although we had every desire to do so when we were advocating Federation with all our might that there was any material gain in sight. The only way in which we could show the people of Western Australia that they would gain was by expressing the belief that their State would soon be connected by rail with the rest of Australia. What we promised the people of Western Australia was that, as a result of Federation, this railway would certainly be built, that their isolation would be removed, and that a higher political life would be brought about. We used the latter argument for all that it was worth. I have often doubted since Federation was accomplished whether we have reached that higher political life. But, at any rate, we believed that it would come about, and that we should be on a higher plane, occupy a better position in the world, and be better able to assist the mother country in maintaining the Empire.

Those were the arguments which we used in order to induce the people of Western Australia to join the Federation. In all these noble sentiments, creditable alike to those who used them and to those who believed them—there was nothing about material gain. How could Western Australia build a railway from Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta? It is a very large undertaking for a State with a small population. We do not own one-half of the territory which would be traversed by the railway. The other half belongs to South Australia. We have no power or right whatever to enter upon such a project. Of what greater advantage will this railway be to Western Australia when it is built than to South Australia and to the rest of the Commonwealth? Perhaps some of the honorable members who have been interrupting me so much will be able to tell the Committee what material advantage over the other States Western Australia will derive. If I were thinking only of the advantage to Western Australia, and of the profit that might come into the pockets of the people of that State, I should be acting a selfish part. I cannot see that great gain will specially come to us from the construction of the railway. On the contrary, it must be remembered that some of the gold-fields' trade that now goes to Perth and Fremantle will be diverted to other States. An honorable member has said that the railway is desired for the purpose of assisting the people of Perth and Fremantle. But they must recollect that Perth and Fremantle at present get the advantage of the whole of the trade of the eastern gold-fields. Will any one venture to say that they will get all that trade when the railway is built? Is it not evident that much of the Coolgardie and Kalgoorlie trade, instead of going to Perth, will go to Adelaide and Melbourne?

MR. JOHNSON.—Land speculators in Western Australia will get an advantage.

SIR JOHN FORREST.—I do not know that they will get any more advantage than land speculators get in the honorable member's own constituency.

MR. JOHNSON.—I only want to see that the public interest is considered.

SIR JOHN FORREST.—Our land laws in Western Australia are very much in the interests of the small holder, and not of the capitalist. All town lands have to be submitted for sale by auction. The land system of Western Australia is, I believe, as good and liberal as that which obtains anywhere.

Mr. FOWLER.—Our land laws are as good as any in the world.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — But I quite agree with the honorable member for Lang that we must take care not to allow land speculators to come in and reap great advantages for themselves. I have tried to show reasons why I take so much trouble in the advocacy of the construction of the railway. The conclusion at which I have arrived is that I believe that it will be a good thing for Western Australia, and a good thing for the whole Commonwealth, not on account of the trade that exists now—not because of things as they are—but because of the developments which will take place. I look forward a little. I look forward to this Commonwealth being built up on a safe, broad, and sound basis, and I know very well that Federation never can be a reality for the people of the West until this railway is constructed. I feel that I have a responsibility for having assisted to bring the Commonwealth into existence, and that, consequently, my duty is to see that Federation is made a success, so that it may live in the hearts and minds of the people. It can never do that—it can never be a success—it can never come home to the people of Western Australia—so long as we are separated from the eastern States by 1,000 miles of unoccupied country. It must always be merely an idea—something which cannot be felt, which cannot be seen. Federation will be a delusion and sham—will remain so, and always must be—without this connecting link; and those who were responsible for persuading the people of Western Australia to join the Federation will not have done their duty if the existing state of affairs is allowed to continue for an indefinite length of time. Now what sort of a place is Western Australia? Any one would think from listening to some honorable members that it is nothing but a little suburb, situated somewhere, with a little trade of its own, conducted by a few people. I should like to tell honorable members what is the real position of Western Australia, in order to remind them of its value to the Commonwealth. Western Australia has a population of 250,000, and a trade of about £17,000,000 per annum. Although we have not half the population of Queensland, we have as large a trade, and our trade is much larger than that of South Australia. We have a trade of £72 per head of the population, which is double the value of the trade of any other State in the Commonwealth.

Mr. MAUGER.—How much of that is whisky?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not care whether it is whisky or what it is. I know that the duty on alcohol is very considerable.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is what I was thinking of.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The important point is that our trade per head is double that of any other State. This little State has produced £51,000,000 worth of gold.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Yet she cannot afford £20,000!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Last year Western Australia produced gold to the value of £9,000,000. We have never been asked to do this work. No one has ever previously suggested that the State should pay for the survey for a national work of this sort. If it had been suggested I have no doubt that there would have been no reluctance on the part of Western Australia. We are not always thinking of a few pounds as some people seem to think. Any one would think to hear the honorable member, who represents a suburb of this city, that he and his district owed nothing to Western Australia. If there is one State in the Commonwealth that owes a great deal, and that ought to be for ever grateful to Western Australia, and ready to assist us in every way, it is the State of Victoria. The working men of Western Australia have during the last eight years made a present to their relatives in Victoria of nearly £2,000,000—a free gift to the people of Victoria. If any support to that statement is required let honorable members ask Sir George Turner, the present Treasurer. I am quite surprised at the narrow views I hear expressed, generally by honorable members who represent places near Melbourne. I do not know why they express these views. They seem to forget altogether what Western Australia has done and is doing for Victoria. They are parochialists, and ungrateful ones, from the soles of their feet right up to the crowns of their heads.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Does the right honorable member remember that Senator Playford said that this line would traverse 600 miles of a God-forsaken waterless desert?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Senator Playford knew nothing about the country. I may tell the honorable member that if we want to make Australia a great country, there is no room for the petty ideas he is interjecting. I have always looked upon the honorable and learned member for Parkes as a well-informed man with broad ideas, whose vision goes far beyond the limits of Australia, and embraces the interests of the Empire at large. But when he says that we should enter into negotiations with the two States about the repayment of this money, and makes a lot of fuss about an item of £20,000 in connexion with a great national project, I must say I am both astonished and disappointed. Does he know that Western Australia has spent a large sum, I should say quite £20,000, in examining this country, boring for water, and doing all sorts of things? Does he know that an expedition was sent out at the expense, not of the Federal Government, but of the State Government?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I do.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does the honorable and learned member know that for years boring operations have been going on there?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I do.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member talks about the expenditure of this sum as if it would ruin Australia. I do not look upon £20,000 as anything in a Federal matter of this kind.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I am quite sure that if the right honorable member were Premier of Western Australia to-day he would not ask the Commonwealth for this £20,000.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is not the granting of £20,000, but the beginning of this great national work that we ask for, and the first step is to get the information desired. We might have done without this stage if South Australia had been willing, but she said that she was not prepared to pass a Bill authorizing the construction of this railway through her territory until she was provided with full information in regard to the cost and the route. It is, perhaps, a reasonable request, and it necessitates the making of a survey.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I should have thought that Western Australia had got all this information by now.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It did not satisfy South Australia.

Mr. HUME COOK.—It is not the expenditure of this £20,000, but the expenditure of the £5,000,000 behind it that we have to consider.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In voting for the survey, the honorable member will not pledge himself to vote for the construction of the railway, unless it is one which will commend itself to this Parliament. The voting of this money will not bind any honorable member. I wish to make my position quite clear. I am acquainted with this country, and I know that there are no engineering difficulties, but other people do not, and it is reasonable that they should get the information asked for. I am quite convinced that this project as a commercial undertaking will be favorably reported upon. But my conviction has nothing to do with any one else here. I shall be perfectly frank with honorable members. I look upon this survey as the beginning of the carrying out of this great project. If I did not believe that it would lead to satisfactory reports and estimates, that it was the first step in the direction of connecting the east and the west by railway, I should not ask any honorable member to have anything to do with the proposal. If I did not believe that the work could be undertaken on a commercial basis, and would meet with the approval of the people of Australia, I would not advocate the spending of a single sixpence on it. But that is no reason why honorable members should think as I do. They are only asked to say, "We are going to get information, and when it is obtained we shall judge. We are not going to prejudge the case from the point of view of the honorable member for Swan. But we shall go this far—we shall get the information, and in doing so we in no way pledge ourselves." From my point of view the position is altogether different. My belief is that the obtaining of this information will only be the forerunner to the carrying out of this great work. If ever there has been a project brought before the Australian people, which has been most grossly maligned by unjust criticism, it is this one. It has been said in the press of this State that the railway would not pay for axle grease. I would refer honorable members to the report of the late Mr. C. Y. O'Connor, Engineer-in-Chief of Western Australia. He reported upon this project with a full sense of responsibility, because under all ordinary circumstances, he might have fairly expected to live to see its completion. He had undertaken gigantic works in Western Australia which he honorably served, and had been proved to be right in regard to works of greater magnitude and involving far greater risk than this one. Therefore, he knew what he was talking about, and had no motive to serve. I had resigned the Premiership, and had come here to join the Barton Government, before he made his report; so that it was made free from any influence I might be supposed to have had upon him had I remained there. His opinion was that the line would not pay immediately, but that the loss would be slight, in fact, that in ten years it would pay. He had carried out the great Fremantle Harbor works at a cost of £1,500,000. Every one said that that undertaking would never pay, but at the present time it is not only paying all working expenses, but also providing for interest and sinking fund. He had also carried out the great Coolgardie water scheme, and without his assistance and knowledge it could not at that time have been done, for my Government were fortified in undertaking that work by the confidence we had in his ability and knowledge. What is the result of its construction? Every one said that it would be a pall hanging over the country; that it would ruin everybody. But for the half-year ending 30th June, it paid not only all working expenses, but also the interest on a capital expenditure of £2,600,000. I cite these facts to show that Mr. O'Connor was an able and reliable man. He had had experience of great works, first in New Zealand, and then in Western Australia. He built all our railways, harbor works, and water schemes. In a lengthy report which, unfortunately, I have not with me, he pointed out exactly what he believed. His verdict was, that after ten years the line will be a paying concern, and that even in that interval there will not be very much loss. I predict that it will pay within three years of its construction, I believe that it will pay even sooner, but I fix the period at three years. If I did not believe in this project I would not advocate it. I believe that it is necessary, not only in the material interests of this country, but also in the interests of the Federation of Australia.

Mr. ISAACS.—Is the object of this trial survey to prove whether the late Mr. O'Connor was right or wrong?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No.

Mr. ISAACS.—If his report can be depended upon, why does the right honorable member wish us to spend £20,000?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We require a survey to be made in order to obtain information, so as to satisfy the House as to what the railway will cost. Mr. O'Connor had not been over the whole of the ground. In my opinion, his estimate is not very far wrong; but South Australia, which is another party to this project, says that she will not even authorize the building of the railway until a survey is made and proper estimates are formed, in order that she may know exactly the position.

Mr. KELLY.—Could not that be done by Western Australia?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have become accustomed to the croaking of some Victorians. I have been accustomed to men like the honorable and learned member for Indi all my life. I have had to fight them, and I am ready to do it again. I used to call them "little Australians" and "croakers."

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—The right honorable member does not mean to say that there are many men of that type in Western Australia?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There are plenty of them, and generally they have very little practical experience of the affairs of the country.

Mr. ISAACS.—When the right honorable member asked for the right to frame a special Tariff for Western Australia, he was the croaker.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I was doing what the honorable and learned member was doing to his utmost, but I did not squeal and croak as much as he did. I was trying to do the best I could for my own State, as he was trying to do the best he could for Victoria, and he squealed a good deal about it, when he did not get his own way.

Mr. ISAACS.—I did not squeal loudly enough to secure a special Tariff.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That was proposed by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat as a means of inducing—or making it possible, as it was said, for Western Australia to enter the Federation.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—How did he know what Western Australia wanted?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We had the reports and the statistics from Mr. Coghlan and others, and the outlook seemed then very dark for Western Australia. The opposition of my honorable friends to this project is only a murmur compared with the opposition I had to overcome in regard to many great works carried out in Western Australia. In Western Australia my opponents said, "Every one will be ruined, and the whole place will collapse"; but there has been no collapse; we seem to have flourished. Those who croaked most about the impending ruin cannot be found now. They have quite forgotten what they said. And so it will be with the honorable and learned member for Indi and the honorable member for Bourke. In a few years' time when they see thousands of persons going backwards and forwards, and hear of Victorians reaping the reward of their industry on the gold-fields and on the lands of the West, they will conveniently forget that they ever opposed the construction of this railway.

Mr. HUME COOK.—When we see that we shall admit that we were wrong.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member is like one of the apostles mentioned in the Scriptures, who would not believe until he had seen. It must be remembered that the proposed railway is one to connect the eastern and western States of a great continent, and that it will pass through a temperate clime. The construction of such a railway could not be said to be a retrograde step; it must be a step in advance, a step in the direction of union and progress. Five Commissioners, who were engineers, and who represented the States of Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, New South Wales, and Western Australia visited the last-named State, the gold-fields, Eucla, and Port Augusta. They had before them the reports of the survivors who made an examination of the country which the proposed line would traverse, and the report of the late Mr. O'Connor, and they reported that the railway, if constructed, would pay at the end of ten years. It is not expected of engineers, who are hard, business men, that they should indulge in flights of imagination. They are rightly very careful in their estimates.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—They will all be out of their positions ten years hence.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The reputation of a public servant is more to him than his position. If his good name is taken from him, he becomes a very poor man indeed. My own opinion is that the railway would pay after three years; but the secretary to the Commissioners, Mr. Gwynneth, who has had large experience as a contractor's engineer, estimated that, instead of a loss of £249,435 in the first ten years, which is the estimate of the Commissioners, there would be a profit of £173,850 if the shorter route through the Gawler Ranges were taken.

Mr. POYNTON.—The shorter route is the worse track.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I think that it is the better route.

Mr. POYNTON.—I know what it is like, because I have been over it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have been over the shorter route through the Gawler Ranges.

Mr. POYNTON.—I have been over it a dozen times.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I was closely observing the country when I crossed over it, though it is now thirty-four years ago. The Commissioners estimate that, after ten years, the profit from the line will be £18,219 per annum, but Mr. Gwynneth estimates it at £72,515 per annum.

Mr. ISAACS.—Is that making allowance for interest and working expenses?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is making allowance for everything. I am not now in a position of responsibility in regard to Western Australia, but I have not the slightest doubt that any reasonable proposal made by the Government of the Commonwealth to the Government of that State will be fairly considered. The people of Western Australia do not wish to take any advantage of the Commonwealth. Western Australia has been most generous in the matter throughout. We know that South Australia will do nothing, but Western Australia has offered to indemnify her for any loss that she may sustain, for, I think, ten years after the construction of the line. Even if there were a loss, it ought not to be taken unduly into consideration, when weighed in the balance with the great advantage which would accrue from the cementing together of the peoples of Australia in a firm Federation. What is the loss of a few pounds compared with the achievement of such an object as that? There has been no more unjust or untrue criticism levelled at any project than that which has been levelled at this. It has been published of me personally in a Melbourne newspaper that I wish to force a gigantic fraud on the people of Australia. In the first place, I have no power to force anything upon the people of Australia.

Mr. WEBSTER.—In what newspaper were those words published?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I shall not give the name of the newspaper, but they were hard words to apply to one who has never done anything to cause him to be ashamed to hold up his head. I hurl them back at the writer of the article. They were untrue, unjust, and disgraceful words. Would it suit me personally to associate myself with anything which would bring disaster upon my State or upon the Commonwealth? It would not. Fifty transcontinental railways are not as much to me as is my honour. Furthermore, I have been associated hitherto with successful enterprises, and would I knowingly now associate myself with a project which would be likely to be a burden on the people of Australia? I repudiate the idea. It would be altogether contrary to my interests to do anything of the kind. Those words were not fair, they were not honest, and they should not have been used in regard to a public man who, whatever may be his faults in the opinion of his opponents, has always been credited with a desire to do what was right. I ask honorable members who are opposed to this small expenditure of £20,000, and who seem to have pre-judged the case because they are unwilling to wait for the information which we wish to give to them, if its cost is their only objection to the construction of the proposed railway? If so, the sooner they say so the better, because then we shall know how we stand.

Mr. ISAACS.—The cost is a very great objection to the proposal.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What other objection can there be?

Mr. WEBSTER.—Would the proposed railway compete with the coasting vessels?

Sir JOHN FORREST. — I hope so. Otherwise it might not pay.

Mr. WEBSTER.—That may be a reason for the opposition to the proposal.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I hope not; but it must be remembered that it is our duty to open up this great continent, and to make it prosperous. I have an object in asking if the cost of the proposed railway is the only objection to its construction. There is no other objection that I can think of. Are honorable members afraid of losing a few pounds on a railway which will bind Australia together in a manner in which it cannot otherwise be bound? Are those who hold the cost to be an objection prepared to allow a private company to undertake the enterprise, and to run it for all time under the conditions on which the railways of the States are run, or do they wish to leave the country through which the line would pass in the occupation of the kangaroos and native dogs? I hope that the honorable and learned member for Indi, who, I see, is taking notes, will refer to this matter when he speaks. I am not a company monger, nor do I know of any company willing to undertake this work; but I believe that a private combination would construct the railway if it were granted a monopoly.

Mr. HUME COOK.—If it is such a good thing, why do not the States construct the line?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I believe that a private company would construct the line, if it were granted a monopoly, and were relieved from taxation for a long term of years.

Mr. ISAACS.—If it were also allowed to charge what it liked?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No; I do not contemplate any such condition. I suggest that it should be required to carry passengers and goods at rates similar to those prevailing upon the Government railways. I have never advocated the construction of the line on account of the character of the country through which it would pass. The land is, no doubt, capable of improvement and development, but if that were the only prospect before us, I should not support it. My advocacy is based upon the fact that the great western State would be brought into direct communication with the rest of Australia. If the country through which the railway would pass is as bad as it is represented to be by a Melbourne newspaper, no one need have any compunction about giving away large areas of it to any company that might be willing to construct the line, nor need they hesitate to give them the most excellent terms for a hundred, or even a thousand, years. This newspaper states, with reference to the country between Port Augusta and Kalgoorlie, that—

Out of the 1,100 miles of railway which it is now proposed to construct at Federal expense, very nearly, if not quite, 1,000 miles is to run through territory which has no appreciable chance of being inhabited for generations, if ever at all.

If that were true, the country would be of very little value to any one; but the statement is not correct. The whole of the country from Port Augusta, through the Gawler Ranges, past Fowler's Bay and Eucla, right on to Kalgoorlie, would be suitable for pastoral settlement when water supplies are made available.

Mr. HUME COOK.—How much permanent water is available along the route of the proposed line?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is no doubt that water could be made available along the whole length of the line.

Mr. GROOM.—Does that apply to both routes?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not know the northern route, but I have travelled over a large part of the southern route, and am well acquainted with it.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—I understood that efforts had been made to obtain water for years past, and that they had failed.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No. Water has been obtained by sinking wells on the limestone tableland. Brackish water has been struck at a depth of 500 feet.

Mr. POYNTON.—For 270 miles the country is already settled, and the settlers there were not driven out during the drought period.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes, the country, as far as the head of the Australian Bight, is already settled. Western Australia is prepared to leave the determination of the route, the gauge of the line, and everything else to the Commonwealth Parliament. The State Legislature passed an Act, the preamble of which is so well written, and represents so clearly the objects in view, that I shall read it to honorable members. The Act was assented on the 29th September, 1903, and the preamble reads as follows:—

Whereas the people of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, and Western Australia, being desirous of securing closer union, and the benefits of mutual protection and defence, and being desirous also of enjoying the advantages of freedom of trade, commerce, and reciprocal intercourse, have, by the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, formed one federal and indissoluble Commonwealth: And whereas, in furtherance of these objects, power has been conferred upon the Parliament of the Commonwealth to make laws for the construction and extension of railways in any State with the consent of such State: And whereas, on the faith of the early construction of a railway to connect the Western and Eastern portions of the Commonwealth, by means whereof they could enjoy the full benefits of such union, the people of Western Australia did agree to the said Constitution, and to form part of the Commonwealth. And whereas, to enable the Parliament of the Commonwealth to execute and maintain those essential provisions of the Constitution which were intended to confirm the people of this portion of the Commonwealth in that assurance of protection and defence, and the advantages of postal and commercial intercourse, and of freedom of trade by land and by sea, which are enjoyed by members of the Commonwealth elsewhere, it is desirable to authorize such Parliament to construct a railway as aforesaid. . . .

Mr. HUME COOK.—There is not one word of official warrant for that preamble?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not agree with the honorable member, and his assertion is not justified.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I say that there is no official warrant for the statements contained in the preamble.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why does not the honorable member remain quiet until I have finished? The second section of the Act from which I have been quoting reads as follows:—

Subject to section six hereof, the Commonwealth Parliament may make laws for the construction and maintenance—

- (1) Of a railway from Kalgoorlie to the eastern boundary of Western Australia, commencing at the termination of the existing railway system of the State at Kalgoorlie, and proceeding thence to the said boundary by such route as the Commonwealth Parliament may determine, and
- (2) Of a railway from the Port of Eucla running due north to a point intersecting the route of the railway aforesaid.

The latter part of the section refers to a small railway from Eucla, which might be required for construction purposes. Then there is provision for empowering the Commonwealth to acquire land, and another important section which shows the bona fides of the Western Australian Government. It indicates their willingness to incur a very large expenditure, which will probably amount to £750,000. It is provided that—

Not later than the time when the Commonwealth Parliament commences the construction of the first-mentioned railway, the State of Western Australia will commence the construction of a railway from Kalgoorlie to Fremantle, on the same conditions as to gauge and rails as those laid down by the Commonwealth Parliament in connexion with the work undertaken by it, and shall complete the same by the time the Commonwealth has completed the railway aforesaid.

Then it is enacted that the Act shall be void unless the Commonwealth Parliament shall have agreed to, and shall have commenced, the construction of the railways within five years from the passing of the Act.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—That is really an Act to permit the Commonwealth to construct the line.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes; but the honorable and learned member cannot have failed to notice that the Western Australian Government undertake to alter the gauge of their own railways in order to make their gauge uniform with that adopted by the Commonwealth Government. That would probably involve the alteration of 387 miles of railway from Kalgoorlie to Fremantle from the present 3-ft. 6-in. gauge to the 4-ft. 8½-in. gauge, and a very large expenditure, amounting to at least £750,000 would have to be incurred in effecting the necessary changes in connexion with station buildings and sidings, and in widening the permanent way. Therefore, whilst the Commonwealth are asked to undertake the survey and construction of the proposed line, they must not forget that Western Australia is willing to incur an immense expenditure in order to secure a direct and uninterrupted means of communication from Fremantle to Port Augusta.

Mr. ISAACS.—What is the reason of the limitation as to time in section 6?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The reason is that the Western Australian Government cannot consent to have the matter "hung up" for ever. They have undertaken to change the gauge of their line from Fremantle to Kalgoorlie, and they cannot allow matters to stand in abeyance for more than five years. At present all alterations and additions on that line are at a standstill, and they must remain so until the Western Australian Government are in a position to know what the Commonwealth Parliament intends to do.

Mr. KENNEDY.—They will become annoyed, and construct the railway themselves.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Personally, I think that five years is too long a time to allow.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—That Act is a threat to the Commonwealth that if it does not undertake the construction of the line within a certain time it will not be permitted to do so at all.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Surely the honorable and learned member does not mean to say that?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—It looks very much like it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does not the honorable and learned member see that some limitation as to time is necessary, because whilst the matter remains in abeyance no improvements can be carried out upon the existing line from Fremantle to Kalgoorlie.

Mr. ISAACS.—What is to happen if the Commonwealth does not commence the work within five years?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I cannot say what Western Australia will do; but probably she will despair of Federation conferring any benefit upon her.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Probably she will secede from the Union!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No doubt she would have very good cause for dissatisfaction. In this matter, Western Australia has not acted the part of the dog-in-the-manger. Her Legislature leaves the whole questions of route and gauge to the Commonwealth Parliament, and undertakes to alter 387 miles of existing line, in order to make its gauge uniform with that of the railway constructed by the Commonwealth. I do not think that any one can argue that in anything Western Australia has done in this matter she has shown any narrow or parochial spirit. All through the negotiations she has acted in a Federal spirit, not in her own interests only, but also in the interests of the whole of Australia. If honorable members compare the action of that State with that of South Australia, they will probably come to the conclusion that Western Australia has some great benefit to gain to make her so urgent in her advocacy of the railway, whilst the sister State is so apathetic. The more the matter is looked into, however, the more clearly it will be seen that the contrary is the case, and that the greater advantage will lie with South Australia. No advantage will be gained by Western Australia that will not also be conferred upon the sister State. Even in connexion with the construction of the railway itself, South Australia will gain more largely, because if the Gawler Range route is adopted, large quantities of railway material will probably be landed at Streaky Bay, Denial Bay, Fowler's Bay, and Eucla. Western Australia cannot deliver her railway material to similar advantage. Before a single spike can be driven on the Western Australian side, it will have to be carried for 387 miles from Fremantle to Kalgoorlie. Then, again, a great portion of the traffic which now goes to Fremantle will probably be diverted over the new line to South Australia and other States, and will not benefit the coastal settlements of Western Australia, which at present enjoy the whole of the trade with the gold-fields.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Did the right honorable gentleman say that to the people of Perth?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes; and I told them that notwithstanding that at first sight it might appear that the proposed railway would operate against their interests, in my opinion it was certain that where one man travelled now a hundred would travel when it was constructed, and that for every ton of goods that now passed in or out of the State, hundreds of tons would be forwarded. I further represented to them that if they adopted a broad, liberal, and patriotic view of this question, they would gain rather than lose by their action. I think that that is a perfectly sound position to take up, and I thoroughly believe that the people of Western Australia, as a whole, will benefit by the establishment of direct and rapid means of communication between the western State and the larger centres of population in the east, and by the encouragement which will be given to trade and commerce with all parts of the Commonwealth. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne at once sees that, on the face of it, the proposal does not appear to be largely in the interests of the people of Perth and Fremantle; but on reflection he must agree with me that the broader and wider view which I have indicated is the sounder and nobler one to adopt. I think I have already said that I feel a responsibility in this matter, because I took a very prominent part in the Federal campaign, and in recommending the people of Western Australia to join the Union. I feel that it is my duty to do all that I can to make the Union satisfactory to the people of the State of which I am a representative. But my hands are tied. We have no means to do anything. There is no means of communication between Western Australia and the eastern States, except the sea route. There has been no true realization of Federation, so far as the people of Western Australia are concerned. They realize the inconvenient side of it, when a request for a post-office is refused, or when a proposed telephone extension has to be referred to Melbourne for decision. On the other hand, if we had a railway running daily between the east and the west, and hundreds of people travelling to and from upon it, Federation would then be a reality to all parts of the Commonwealth. If no railway existed between Melbourne and Sydney, between Sydney and Brisbane, and between Melbourne and Adelaide, we should have these States wholly apart, and their peoples knowing scarcely anything of one another. Such a condition of affairs would be almost beyond endurance. The representatives of Western Australia cannot reach their homes except by means of a sea voyage. As I have already said, that state of affairs very materially interferes with the representation of Western Australia in the Federal Legislature, because but few men can afford to leave their homes and their business for many months in order to devote their whole time to their parliamentary duties.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The construction of this line would not improve the position in that respect.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It would, because it would improve our means of travelling to and from our homes.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But it could not improve the present representation of the State.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not wish to say one word adverse to my colleagues in the representation of Western Australia, but for the reasons I have mentioned, the isolated condition of Western Australia certainly interferes materially with the choice of the people of that State.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The railway journey would annihilate the representatives of that State.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It would do nothing of the kind. I have had some experience of travelling long distances by rail. I have travelled across America on several occasions. The railway journey occupied eight days when I first crossed it, and yet after alighting at a railway station I was very glad to get into the train again, for I found that the railway carriage was more comfortable than any other place. The present state of affairs, so far as Western Australia is concerned, is not Federation, but isolation. It makes Federation a sham. I distinctly say once more that I should not have advocated Federation had I thought that this state of isolation would continue indefinitely. But it cannot remain as it is. The people of Western Australia will never rest content while it lasts. The only thing that makes them apparently content is the hope that the existing position may soon be brought to an end. Is it reasonable that they should remain isolated from and unknown to the people of the other States; that they should have no means of communication with those States except that which the sea affords? Why did they agree to enter the Union? Does the Parliament of Australia intend to refuse to carry out the obligation to build this railway? Some one has said there is no such obligation. I assert that there is. The Commonwealth is under an obligation to protect every State from invasion. How is it going to protect Western Australia? That State might as well be an island in mid-ocean as a State separated from the rest of the Union by many hundreds of miles of unoccupied country, and without railway communication with the other parts of the Commonwealth. Was it ever intended that Western Australia should depend upon its own resources for its defence? Why was it provided in the Constitution that the Commonwealth shall protect every State from invasion when, as long as the present state of affairs continues, we cannot defend Western Australia, or send a single man to protect it?

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Captain Mahan says that a naval base —

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am speaking of the Constitution.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—But the right honorable member should listen to what Captain Mahan says —

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member should not interrupt me. The Commonwealth has undertaken to "protect every State against invasion," and unless every effort is to be made to carry out that obligation, those words in the Constitution must be idle and meaningless. I would even say that those words are worse than meaningless, for they are fraudulent, if they do not mean what they say. In my opinion, however, they do mean what they say. I believe that the people of Australia are on my side—that they are on the side of Western Australia. I have never addressed a public meeting on this question in any part of Australia without receiving encouragement for the views I have expressed in regard to it. On one occasion I addressed a public meeting in South Australia, consisting of over 1,000 persons, a large majority of whom, I was told, were hostile to the project; but I never was better received in my life than when I was advocating before that meeting the construction of this railway. The same remark will apply to the feeling in Victoria. The honorable and learned member for Indi believes that his constituents are opposed to the construction of the line, but I very much doubt if they are. I am prepared to prove the sincerity of my belief by going to his constituency and asking for the support of his constituents, even with the eloquence of the honorable and learned member against me. The people of Australia are not mere time-servers; they are not going to break their word, or disregard the written Constitution to which they have agreed. They have undertaken to protect each State from invasion, and they must set about the work of putting themselves in a position to do so.

Mr. ISAACS.—But the construction of this line is not provided for in the Constitution?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The people of Australia desire a Federation that is not a sham. They want something real. They believe more in the importance of Western Australia than does the honorable and learned member for Indi.

Mr. ISAACS.—Oh, no!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The people of the rest of the Commonwealth know that Western Australia has been a good friend of Australia, and carried them safely over a period of distress, and helped them when they needed assistance. They are not ungrateful. I rely upon the people of Australia to a larger extent than I rely on some of their representatives. I am quite certain that the people of Victoria, and, indeed, of all Australia, will adhere to the understanding arrived at in regard to this matter, and will adhere to the spirit of the Constitution. They know that a moral understanding exists that the line shall be constructed, and they will see that it is carried out. Who are our opponents? Have they ever done anything for this country? Let them stand before us in a row, and point to any great work that any one of them has carried out—to one monument that reflects to their credit?

Mr. HIGGINS.—They are sitting behind the right honorable member.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am not speaking of any honorable member of this House in any personal sense, but I assert that our opponents are merely the “do-nothings.” The pessimists and the croakers of former days in Western Australia cannot be found now, because all the works which they opposed and decried have been successful. They have subsided, although many of them would now take credit for the construction of works which they did so much to prevent. I would say to the people who are opposed to this undertaking that they may delay this great work, but not for long. It is not a paltry little railway to run through one solitary town or district, but a line which is going to connect the eastern and western sides of Australia, and bind the people of the Commonwealth together. They may be able to delay the work, but it will not be for very long, for I firmly believe that Federation and broad-mindedness will, in the near future, in this and all other great national matters, conquer and subdue the “little Australians,” the pessimists and the parochialists.

Mr. ISAACS (Indi).—I think we can all very heartily congratulate my right honorable friend, who has just resumed his seat, on the genuineness with which he advocates this project. I believe that no honorable member could throw more personal fervour into his advocacy of any proposal than the right honorable member has thrown into this, but I regret, for his sake, that I feel compelled to oppose the motion. I am sorry that my right honorable friend refers to those who, like myself, believe that as trustees of the money of the people whom we represent, we are not justified in looking at an expenditure of £5,000,000 as a mere nothing—

Sir JOHN FORREST. — It is not £5,000,000. Our opponents always add a million, but never think of taking one off.

Mr. ISAACS.—£5,000,000 has constantly been referred to in this House as the probable cost of the railway. But let us take it at £4,000,000; a million is nothing to the right honorable member.

Mr. McCAY.—At present we are concerned with a proposal to spend only £20,000.

Mr. ISAACS.—If there is to be a survey, is it to be made with the genuine intention to proceed with the work, should it be favorably reported upon?

Mr. FOWLER.—Does the construction of a line always follow the making of a survey? How many surveys of projected lines have been made in Victoria without the work of construction following?

Mr. ISAACS.—I agree with the honorable member's suggestion that surveys ought not to be made unless it is intended to proceed with the actual work, should the report of the surveyors be favorable.

Mr. FOWLER.—It is not my suggestion.

Mr. McCAY.—The object of the proposed survey is to obtain necessary information.

Mr. ISAACS.—My honorable and learned friend will surely agree that if we secure the necessary information, it should be with the honest intention to proceed with the work provided that the information proves favorable.

Mr. McCAY.—If the information turns out to be favorable.

Mr. ISAACS.—However roseate the report might be, I hold that we are not in a position to spend £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 in the near future. On that ground alone, I am prepared to object to the proposal. Whatever may be the eventual prospects of this gigantic work—and it is a gigantic work—however desirable it may be, and I admit it is desirable that at some time or other the iron band of union should exist between east and west—I think that at present we are not at all in a position to spend out of our revenue, or to borrow with advantage on the credit of the Commonwealth, the huge sum of £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 necessary to make this railway. When we look at the Act of Parliament which has been forcibly brought under our notice by the right honorable member for Swan, we find that it is to expire in 1908. We are told, in effect by Western Australia, “If you do not undertake this work by 1908, you are not to do it at all.” That is the limit. I, for one, am not prepared to say that Australia is, by some means, to raise £4,000,000 or £5,000,000, and to expend it in making a railway within the period named. What the distant future may bring is another matter; but I am not prepared to say that even £20,000 is in our present condition a mere trifle. I do not know that any one will dispute the proposition that, in the future, population will require and justify the construction of the line. I am not in a position to offer any opinion on that phase of the question, but I do say, that whatever the future may bring forth, the present is not the time for us to embark on such a great undertaking. If we are not prepared to enter upon it within a reasonable time, then we have no right now to expend £20,000, because by the time we should be able to undertake the enterprise, conditions might have materially altered for the better or the worse—I hope and believe for the better. We are told by the right honorable member for Swan that, after all only a few pounds are involved, and he wishes to know why “these croakers” should object to the expenditure of a few pounds. That is a very light way to talk of a large sum of money. If we were to propose the expenditure of £20,000 on some projects, I am sure that we should be told that it was not a small sum. It seems to me that to expend £20,000 in the way proposed would be to throw it away. I deny that it was any part of the bargain between Western Australia and the rest of the Commonwealth that this railway should be constructed. I never heard of it as a bargain, but I do not deny that it was a laudable desire and ambition on the part of Western Australia—and a desire that I can heartily reciprocate—that the eastern and western States should be united by easier and more facile means of communication than at present exist. The question is whether we can afford at the present time to provide that means of communication, or whether the prospects now justify it, or will do so within the immediate future. I do not think it is an answer for the right honorable member to say that, if the only objection be the cost, we should allow a private company to do the work. That is a most fallacious argument. If the Commonwealth or any State is going to say that because a project, however inviting it may look in the future, is not one which the financial condition of the Commonwealth or of the State concerned will justify at the present moment, it is therefore to be handed over to a private company as a monopoly, we shall find ourselves at no great distance of time in a very perilous position. If that position were taken up, we should fetter our hands in a way from which we could not hope afterwards to free ourselves. I do not think that that argument is a sound one, however alluring it may be for the moment. I cast my mind back, and recall a time in our history when Brisbane was not connected with Adelaide. We see that they are connected to-day, but it requires time and patience to give effect to these undertakings. We must wait, in my judgment, for some further development of our population and territory before we can justify the expenditure of the very large sum of money we are now asked to expend. I should like to have heard the present Minister of Trade and Customs upon this subject, and should have been pleased if he had followed the right honorable member for Swan. I know that his views, if expressed, would not be found to be in accord with those which have been announced by the right honorable member for Swan. I think it is wrong that the right honorable gentleman should refer in the way he has done to those of us who, in Victoria and in other States, feel that they cannot support this proposal, which, if it means anything at all, is only the thin end of the wedge for the largest expenditure of money proposed since the Commonwealth came into existence. I take this opportunity of saying that, whatever may be our desire for closer union and quicker communication with Western Australia, well disposed as we all are to that State as to the other States of the Commonwealth, we feel regret that the circumstances of the Commonwealth to-day do not justify us in supporting the proposal of the Government.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—I do not propose to take up much time in dealing with this matter, but it is strange to me to hear the right honorable member for Swan put so much force into his arguments in the endeavour to impress the Committee with the splendid thing it will be for this Parliament to embark upon railway construction at this particular time and in this particular locality. The right honorable member has given us to understand that this is not a matter of convenience or of advantage to the people of Western Australia. He holds that it will be of enormous benefit to the people of the Commonwealth if this railway is constructed at their expense, but to my mind the project will be of benefit only to the people of Western Australia. The right honorable gentleman said that he would tell us what an eminent engineering authority, to whom the question was referred, had to say with respect to the railway, and the country through which it is proposed to be constructed. I regret that the right honorable gentleman did not quote the opinion of Mr. C. Y. O'Connor, the authority to whom he referred.

Mr. FOWLER.—I think the right honorable member for Swan said that Mr. O'Connor had not been through most of the country, and he did not regard that gentleman as an authority.

Mr. KENNEDY.—He has not been through it, and, strange to say, we can find no one who admits that he has been through the country, or knows anything about it.

Mr. FOWLER.—Hence the necessity for further inquiry.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The right honorable member for Swan has, I believe, been through the country, but even he cannot speak authoritatively concerning it.

Mr. FOWLER.—Honorable members will not take the right honorable gentleman's word on the subject.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Yet we have estimates submitted as to the probable cost of the railway. I am surprised that the right honorable member for Swan did not quote Mr. O'Connor's views, after telling the Committee that he proposed to do so. On the very best information available to date, Mr. O'Connor writes in this way in paragraph 2 of his report—

In an undertaking of this magnitude, traversing 11,000 miles of country, which is mostly uninhabited, uncultivated, and waterless, although there are no engineering difficulties to contend with, there is necessarily a good deal of uncertainty as to its probable cost.

It is not to me a matter of surprise to find that a State Government should be most anxious that some authority other than itself and its taxpayers should embark in such a national work as this—because a national work it surely is, as we understand national works here, that is to say, works in connexion with which there can be no possible hope that they will pay, or that there will be a justification for the expenditure involved in them.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is merely the honorable member's opinion.

Mr. KENNEDY.—If this undertaking is to be such a wonderfully good thing commercially and generally for the development of Western Australia, how is it that the Government of that State is so anxious that somebody else should embark in the construction of the railway and control the enterprise?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have explained that only half the line would run through their territory.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I take objection to the proposal, on the ground of the underlying principle with regard to the Commonwealth embarking in railway construction at all. The conditions under which we can embark upon railway construction, as laid down in the Constitution, are clear and distinct. A first essential is the authority of the States through which the railways proposed to be constructed must pass. Up to the present time, no assent has been given by one of the States concerned in this proposed railway.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is consent to the survey.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am reminded of the wiles of the artful trapper, endeavouring to snare the last remnants of the warrigal. All the skill and ingenuity of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat and his successor in office have been applied with the utmost ability in a vain attempt to get the Premier of South Australia to say something definite on this subject.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—To keep his word, in fact.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No, not to keep his word, but to keep the word of, or some promise made by, a predecessor in office.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He was a member of the same Ministry.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That does not matter. Even the valiant right honorable gentleman is not going to side-track me on this occasion.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does the honorable member contend that a Minister is not bound by a promise given by the Premier of a Government of which he was a member?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I propose to tell the Committee exactly what the position is with regard to the correspondence which appears to go back to 1900, and which was initiated by Sir Edmund Barton when leading the first Federal Administration. We have been reminded that three Governments have favoured this proposal, and have introduced it to this House.

Mr. POYNTON.—Four Prime Ministers have supported it.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Let us say four. Three of them never succeeded in reaching anything definite with regard to their proposals.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member would not allow a Prime Minister to do so on one occasion.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I propose to-night to show why I think we have gone far enough, so far as action by the present Administration is concerned. I propose to put this matter from my point of view. It is a strange feature in connexion with the subject that, with the exception of the right honorable member for Swan, the only ardent and enthusiastic supporter of this proposal is the right honorable gentleman who at present occupies the position of Prime Minister. That is an extraordinary position. I should like some little information, which I have no doubt is available if we could get the benefit of it, to explain how it is that the position which an honorable member may occupy in this Chamber, or the party he happens to support, should have some peculiar influence upon the attitude he is likely to assume with regard to this proposal. I should be delighted if some of the honorable gentlemen, who were recently sitting in this corner, and some who were in Opposition, and who have now been elevated to the Treasury bench, would explain how the judgments which they previously formed have been influenced by the atmosphere of Ministerial responsibility.

Mr. MAHON.—To whom does the honorable member refer?

Mr. KENNEDY.—To the Minister of Trade and Customs, for instance. That honorable member has always posed as an economist of the first water, and I have always looked to him for light and leading in matters of economy.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member will be quite right if he sticks to that.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I should like to have some information to show what has influenced honorable gentlemen. Even from the honorable gentleman who is in charge of this matter to-night, we have heard nothing very definite in the way of justification for the position the Government are taking up. Not, perhaps, from anything on record, but from the general trend of his views politically, and his actions in Parliament, the Minister of Defence led me to believe that he was opposed to any proposal of this sort, practically committing the Federal Parliament to an expenditure of £5,000,000.

Mr. McCAY.—This does not commit Parliament; it is intended only to secure information.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is the first step in the affirmation of a principle. We are being asked to establish a precedent that is going to influence us for all time.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Remember that the present is a Coalition Government.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Coalitions are responsible for a great deal. We saw one effect of a coalition this evening, when a division took place in this chamber. Certain honorable members have gone into alliance with others, and on the very first opportunity those who held out the olive branch to them were deserted by their sworn friends. Are we to have a repetition of the same kind of thing on this side of the House?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY.—If so, I am made only the more chary of these coalitions. In one vote this evening, we saw sworn allies running away from their brethren-in-arms.

Mr. McCAY.—They ran away from their own bridge.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Surely that kind of thing is not going to happen on this side of the House on this question? This is why I am most anxious, with the honorable member for Indi, to know what really is the opinion of the Ministers of Trade and Customs and Defence. I had some little hope that the Minister of Home Affairs, who introduced the subject this evening, would exhibit a desire to proceed on more economical lines than appears to be the case. It did, however, seem to me that the honorable gentleman's heart was not in this matter. I honestly believe that the right honorable member for Swan could have stated a much better case in support of the proposal than did the Minister of Home Affairs. I have been for some time diverted from the delightful correspondence that has taken place between the Prime Ministers of the Commonwealth and the Premiers of South and Western Australia. I find that a letter passed from Sir Edmund Barton to the Premier of South Australia, in 1903, referring to correspondence which took place in 1901. It would appear that a period of two years had been allowed to elapse before the attack on this subject was renewed. Sir Edmund Barton wrote, in 1903:—

I have the honour to invite your attention to the correspondence on the subject of the trans-continental railway that passed between us in 1901, and particularly to your letter of the 31st July of that year, in which you enclosed a communication from Mr. Holder, then Premier of South Australia, dated 1st February, 1900.

That, I assume, is the historic letter referred to in which the Premier of South Australia made a promise that he would put no obstacles in the way of future negotiations with regard to the construction of this line. But, so far as I understand, he certainly did not pledge his Parliament in any particular way.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He said, "I undertake."

Mr. KENNEDY.—We shall deal with the letter later on. Then the Premier of South Australia replied to this effect:—

In reply to your letter of the 10th inst., I have the honour to inform you, as I have previously informed the honorable the Premier of Western Australia, that it would not only be unjustifiable, but useless to submit to Parliament a Bill for the construction of this railway (of which this State's share of the cost would amount to a very large sum) without being in a position to give Parliament information as to the cost of the scheme.

That was in 1903. Then we have that able exponent of the English language, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, coming on the scene in his capacity as Prime Minister. In a very long letter, addressed to the Premier of South Australia, the honorable and learned member made every effort to pin down the former to something definite, but he absolutely failed to do so. The honorable and learned member even made an appeal, which is evidence that there was no intention at that time on the part of the Commonwealth Parliament, so far as he was concerned as Prime Minister, to embark on any cost whatever until it was known exactly what the position of the Commonwealth was—until the assent of both States had been given to the proposal. This is the appeal he made in a letter under date 16th October, 1903:—

The approximate cost of the work is expressly set out in the reports of the Board of Engineers-in-Chief, dated 12th March and 27th July, 1903, which has been presented to the Federal Parliament. That Board consisted, as you are aware, of the best authorities on railway construction to be found in Australia. Its members were nominated by the several States, including South Australia. They devoted much time to the consideration of their subject, and their estimate may be taken to be the most definite that could be obtained until the line is marked out.

That is the pointed reply of the Prime Minister to the Premier of South Australia. The letter proceeded—

The request for further information comes unexpectedly at this stage, when all the knowledge that could be expected prior to a detailed examination of the route has already been acquired. Even that would probably alter the sum quoted, but very slightly, if at all. To make a complete survey might cost £20,000, and before asking the Commonwealth Parliament to approve of this expenditure, it is only reasonable that the consent necessary under sub-section 34 of section 51 of the Constitution should be obtained.

Why is it that as Prime Minister he never departed from that principle? He refused, and never did submit to this House a proposal to spend one single shilling even on a survey until that consent, which was not given during his reign as Prime Minister, was obtained.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He never repudiated the consent given.

Mr. KENNEDY.—But he never got the consent which was laid down as a stipulation. The letter went on—

Your Government and Parliament have much better information now as to the probable cost of the work than when Mr. Holder's promise to the Government of Western Australia was made in 1900, and I should be glad if you could see your way to consider this sufficient for present purposes, and at the earliest date pass an Act authorizing the Federal Parliament to proceed with the work. This has already been done by the Legislature of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is all right.

Mr. KENNEDY.—What I want the Committee to note is that, having made this request to the Premier of South Australia, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, as Prime Minister, refused, and never did submit to the House a proposal to spend one single shilling.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Prime Minister did so, before his Government went out of office.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Certainly not.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—This same message was laid on the table.

Mr. KENNEDY.—But it was never dealt with in Committee.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member may remember that I submitted the motion, which was opposed by the other side for the reason that there was a political crisis. But the message and the Bill were before the House.

Mr. KENNEDY.—But that was as far as we got.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The proposal of the Government was made.

Mr. KENNEDY.—This brings me to May, 1904, when, apparently, there had been a change of Government, and the following telegram was sent on the 7th, by the then Prime Minister to the Premier of South Australia:—

Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta railway under consideration. Shall be glad to be advised whether, in event Commonwealth Parliament favorably considering question, you will be prepared to pass Act authorizing Federal authority to proceed with work of construction. As you are aware, this has already been done by Legislature of Western Australia. Greatly obliged if you will favour with early reply.

The reply to that telegram is to this effect:—

Replying your wire 7th instant, Kalgoorlie and Port Augusta railway, I advised your predecessor on 22nd February that if it was considered necessary for the State to pass an Act to give the Federal Government power to make the proposed survey, we would be agreeable to ask Parliament when next assembled to pass a short measure with that object. I do not suppose you intend to ask your Parliament to pass legislation providing for the construction until survey is made and some reliable estimate prepared of probable cost.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is right.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Honorable members will observe the diplomacy and tact with which the leader of the Government of South Australia evades the point which was put to him point blank; he does not answer the question, but simply dodges it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He wanted more information.

Mr. KENNEDY.—There is a subsequent message from the Prime Minister, which is as follows:—

Your wire 10th instant, Kalgoorlie-Port Augusta railway. Shall be glad if you will kindly advise me disposition of your Government towards question of authorizing construction. The possession of your views upon this specific point will be of considerable value to Government in considering question of survey. Will you kindly favour me early reply?

The reply to that is to this effect:—

Replying your wire 11th, Kalgoorlie and Port Augusta railway, when survey is made and reliable estimates of probable cost are prepared, we should be pleased to advise you as to what action we shall then ask the State Parliament to take.

The Premier of South Australia was beginning to make up his mind in a certain direction, but he had certainly decided that he was not going to commit his Parliament or people in the slightest degree to this line.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He repudiated the promise made by the present Speaker when Premier of South Australia.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Premier of South Australia says that he is not tied by that promise.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We do not agree with him.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is a matter of opinion; and we know we are tied by nothing but Acts of Parliament.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That may be a Victorian, but it is not a British idea.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Is the honorable member for Moira not tied by the caucus?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I do not acknowledge any caucus. The Premier of South Australia goes on:—

The question of making survey has already been decided by your predecessors in office. Unless you intend to repudiate their obligations you need no further information in order to justify you in asking your Parliament to provide necessary funds for that purpose.

Honorable members will see the ingenuity of this gentleman, who refuses to be tied himself in any way, or committed to anything in particular, but who attempts to impress the Prime Minister with the idea that the latter, by some decision of his predecessor in office, was committed to a survey. That, however, is not correct.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The message was laid on the table by the Government.

Mr. KENNEDY.—If the Government desire to expend money for any particular purpose, they must get the authority of Parliament, and then take the responsibility.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — The Government had made up their mind to ask the Parliament for authority.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I contend that before it is justifiable to spend one shilling on a survey, there must be the consent of the States through which the line will pass.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — I think that is rather a narrow view.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The view is not so wide as the line, of course. It was commencing to dawn on the Prime Minister that he was dealing with rather an astute gentleman, and he sent the following telegram:—

Regret you appear unwilling to intimate probable attitude of your Government towards Kalgoorlie-Port Augusta railway until after considerable expense that survey will necessitate will have been incurred. May I take it that unless survey discloses facts not now known, involving very substantial increase on present estimates of cost, you will advise your Parliament pass Bill conferring necessary authority on Commonwealth to construct line, in accordance with promise of South Australian Government when Mr. Holder was Premier? You will readily perceive that Federal Parliament may naturally be reluctant to authorize substantial preliminary expenditure unless they have some assurance that such expenditure will not be rendered resultless by your subsequent unwillingness to act in accordance with promise referred to. In reference to latter part of your telegram. The question of adopting or modifying the policy of our predecessors is a matter for this Government to determine.

The latter portion is in exact agreement with the position I took up in justification of the attitude of Mr. Jenkins. The honorable member for Bland, who was then Prime Minister, said that he was not tied by the determination of his predecessors, except in so far as the policy of his Government determined he should go. It will be seen that the attitude of the then Prime Minister was that the Government should not move at all, and although they did submit a proposal to the House to spend money on the survey, he intimated to the Premier of South Australia that the Commonwealth Parliament could not be asked to authorize the expenditure until the assent of the South Australian Parliament had been obtained. I contend that we are in exactly the same position to-day. I venture to say that the honorable member for Bland should, in fairness, and in consequence of that undertaking, conveyed to the Premier of South Australia, oppose the expenditure of even one shilling on a survey, until the consent of South Australia is obtained.

Mr. FOWLER.—The Premier of South Australia expressed to me months ago the opinion that there would be no opposition.

Mr. KENNEDY.—What is the use of coming here, and saying what the opinion of the man in the street is, when we have an official statement from the Premier of South Australia?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Does the honorable member mean in reference to the survey, or the railway?

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am dealing with the survey. The reply to that query was this:—

Replying to yours of 13th, I have nothing to add to mine of 12th inst., further than to state that survey and reliable estimates are always prepared before we ask Parliament by Act to sanction the construction of any line of rail-

We have in the telegrams and correspondence which passed between the Prime Minister and the Premier of South Australia, a clear indication that the Premier of South Australia refused point blank, in the first instance, to acknowledge any obligation to be bound by any promise made by his predecessor with regard to the construction of the line. Even should the report be favorable, we have no intimation from him that he will ask the South Australian Parliament to consent to the construction of the line.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We take that risk.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I venture to say that we cannot, under the Constitution, take that risk. The first absolute essential before we spend any money is to obtain the assent of the Parliaments of the States through which the line is to be constructed. What right have we to spend money upon a survey? Is it not part and parcel of the expenditure debited to the construction of the line?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The honorable member is now dealing with the railway, not with the survey.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We certainly cannot construct the railway unless South Australia assents.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No; and I go further, and say that we should not be justified in spending money on a survey until we have authority to construct the line. What is the position of the people of Western Australia? There is a tendency on the part of some persons to rush to their friends when they have a "good thing" instead of taking advantage of it themselves. They seem to be anxious to hand it over to the first man they meet in the street. Go into any of our trading marts, and you will meet many persons who have "good things" to dispose of. Go to the Stock Exchange amongst our mining community. There are always men who have "good things" to dispose of. Go to our stock saleyards. There are persons there who have the "cheapest and finest" stock in Australia to sell; but if you take the stock at their price you are "left" every time. I agree with the man who once gave a piece of advice to the respected Judge of our Insolvency Court in Victoria. as regards accepting these "good things" from friends. After the man's case had been heard, and his certificate granted, he said, "Take this from me, your Honour. If a friend comes to you with a 'good thing,' club him; knock him down." That is the position the Commonwealth Parliament should take to-day with respect to this "good thing." The best thing the Commonwealth Parliament can do is, to say most emphatically and conclusively to Western Australia, "If this is such a 'good thing' take the whole benefit of it to yourselves."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Hand it over to a private company.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No, I have always been opposed to the construction of railways by private enterprise in Australia. I have always been an advocate for the State ownership of railways. If there is warrant for the construction of a railway, the State can construct it, and work it as economically, and as much in the interests of the people concerned, as any private company can.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member must be a Socialist. He should come over here.

Mr. KENNEDY.—There is not a man on God's earth who is not a Socialist to some extent. I have no dread of the word "Socialism." I have no fear of being called a "Socialist." There are various interpretations of the word. Where is the man who is not a Socialist to some extent, as we understand Socialism in the every-day sense of the word? He is not to be found.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The honorable and learned member for Werriwa says he is not a Socialist.

Mr. KENNEDY.—But the honorable and learned member for Werriwa takes advantage of our postal facilities, and other Government agencies. What is the use of trotting out that boggy? If there is to be no loss, why does not Western Australia construct the line? If there is to be a loss, what proportion of it is Western Australia prepared to pay? The late Prime Minister made an inquiry on this subject in a telegram dated 6th May, 1904. He telegraphed to the Premier of Western Australia—

Representations made to me, feeling of members of Federal Parliament towards proposal favours belief that opposition would be materially lessened if your Government indicated willingness contribute stated proportion of loss, if any, during the first ten years. As matter under consideration of Cabinet, early reply desired.

That was a line of inquiry for which the late Prime Minister is entitled to great credit. It showed a desire on his part to deal with a business matter in a business-like way. But what do we find on the part of the Premier of Western Australia? We find the same astuteness and slipperiness displayed again.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There was no slipperiness about him.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That may be, but the astuteness is there. He was asked point blank to state what proportion of the loss his State was prepared to bear—10 per cent., 20 per cent., or one-half, as the case might be. He was requested to make specific proposals as to what proportion of the loss his State would bear over and above the per capita share. What was his reply? His telegram is dated 18th May. Therefore he had given due consideration to the subject. He had taken twelve days to reply.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — He might have been away.

Mr. KENNEDY.—But the Premiers of States do not usually go away from telegraphic communication.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I happen to know that he was away in a distant part of the country at the time, and that he had to consult his colleagues and others.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is evident he did not reply without giving due consideration to a matter of such importance. What was his reply?

On condition that Commonwealth is allowed a free hand as to route and gauge of railway, this State will be prepared for ten years after line constructed, to bear a share of any loss in excess of our contribution on a population basis. It would be premature to fix exact proportion we are prepared to pay at this stage, but I am confident that it will be liberal, and satisfy the Federal Parliament of our sincerity in this connexion, and our belief that the work will soon be a paying one.

He was asked to name a fixed proportion in clear and definite terms. He evaded that question, and answered in general terms that his State was prepared to pay a share under certain conditions. That illustrates the absurdity of relying on promises of this kind unless they are made officially as between recognised governing authorities or corporations. What would have been the value of such a promise made at that time? The then Premier of Western Australia has gone out of office. He was honest, and if he had remained in power it would have been all right. But, as is proved in the case of South Australia, his successor could act at his own sweet will as to how far he would respect the promise of his predecessor. In face of what has actually occurred in South Australia—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Very discreditable.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That may or may not be so, but there are the facts, and that is what we have to deal with. Therefore, I urge that this Parliament is not justified in spending one shilling of money, even on a survey, until the assent of the States through which the line will pass has been obtained. Then will be the time to talk of the merits and demerits of the line, and the basis upon which tests are made. There is no fixity of route yet. Then we have Mr. O'Connor basing his estimates on money borrowed at 3 per cent. How can any man think of going into the markets of the world to-day and borrowing money at 3 per cent. on even gilt-edged securities?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member need not go further than the survey. He need not apply Kyabram principles on that point.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member is not justified in accusing me of being a Kyabramite. Why does not the State which is going to get the whole benefit from the line, go to the expense of the survey, and then come with a clear case on reliable authority, and ask this Parliament to obtain the consent of South Australia to the construction of the line? If there is to be any development, will not Western Australia derive the benefit? Who else is asking for the construction of this line to-day?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That does not prove that the benefit will be all one way.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The right honorable member has to prove that those who are not asking for the construction of the railway, and will have to find the greater portion of the money, or accept a liability, will derive some benefit. What an absurdity it is to talk about the graziers or producers of Victoria or New South Wales sending produce by land for 1,100 miles, when there would be sea carriage parallel with the railway!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It would not be parallel.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Surely the right honorable member does not think that he is talking to an assembly of lunatics, when he submits a proposal of that sort. We have some sane men in our midst.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member does not know the facts. It has to be brought back 400 miles.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is because of the rabid conservatism of the people of Perth and Fremantle. Instead of allowing the miners on the gold-fields to get direct communication to the seaboard, and cheaper access to the eastern States, they compel them to go to Perth and Fremantle. The right honorable member talks about the advantages which the eastern States would derive from the construction of this railway. We might have a few wealthy persons, to whom occasionally the saving of a day would be a matter of consideration, and who, under such circumstances, might take advantage of a railway journey of three days from Adelaide, or four days from Melbourne, or five days from Sydney.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It will not take so long as that.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It spoils a day now to get from Melbourne to Adelaide or Sydney, and the engineer, to whom the right honorable member has referred, gives 36 hours as the time likely to be occupied in travelling between Port Augusta and Kalgoorlie.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is a very slow rate.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It may be slow.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The distance is only 1,100 miles, and the train could travel at the rate of 40 miles an hour.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is the statement of a very able authority, and I am prepared to accept it until I can get something better. The right honorable member talks about the great advantages which the producers in the eastern States would derive from a railway traversing this uninhabited and waterless country, by getting produce carried more cheaply by land than by sea. But why do not the legislators of Western Australia do their duty to the people of its great mining centres, in which there are, I admit, many and profitable consumers of our produce, and give them direct communication to the seaboard?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does the honorable member think he knows better than they do?

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is the opinion I have expressed, and it has been expressed here, too, by an honorable member representing the gold-fields.

Mr. FOWLER.—Who was thrown out on that very account.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Still, it is quoted in the pamphlet which has been distributed, with the compliments of the Premier of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think that the honorable member should bring in local politics.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am not bringing in local politics. But when this issue is raised, and the right honorable member has quoted western authorities, surely he cannot take exception to me when I meet him on his own ground.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member does not know much about the matter?

Mr. FOWLER.—He is a discredited authority.

Mr. KENNEDY.—But the statement has also been made in the Parliament of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In Parliament there are always partizans.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am not questioning that view. If the honorable member for Perth says that this gentleman is a discredited authority, I am prepared to accept his assurance. But, would it not be to the material advantage of the miners in Kalgoorlie and Coolgardie if they had direct communication with Esperance, instead of having to go round by Perth and Fremantle?

Mr. FOWLER.—They do not wish to go to Esperance.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Of course they do not, because it might affect the vested interests of Perth and Fremantle.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It would cost nearly a million of money to make that railway.

Mr. KENNEDY.—We have the same thing in Victoria, and I venture to say in every other State of the Commonwealth. On the eastern and western coasts of Victoria our railways compete with water carriage. Expensive railways, constructed from Melbourne to western districts, are starved, so to speak, and their services are starved because they are brought into competition with water carriage. Will any one who is acquainted with the cost of produce, perishable or otherwise, argue for a moment that it can be carried as cheaply by railway as by water? That should, I think, settle for all time the question of the great advantage which the producers in the eastern States would derive from the construction of a railway to Kalgoorlie.

Mr. FOWLER.—Their produce would not be carried by water altogether. There would be first a railway journey, next a water journey, and then another railway journey.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Not necessarily. But take Melbourne as a centre.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The gold-fields are 400 miles closer than Fremantle. The produce has now to go to Fremantle, and come back to the gold-fields.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am aware of those facts. But take Melbourne as a shipping port, and say there is a line from the gold-fields of Western Australia to the nearest seaport, which is unquestionably on its south coast, and a line from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—A line from Esperance would cost £1,000,000 to construct. The honorable member wants us to spend that, I suppose?

Mr. KENNEDY.—£1,000,000 is not so much as £5,000,000.

Mr. FOWLER.—That line would have been constructed long ago if circumstances had justified its construction.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am now dealing with the alternative proposal of spending £1,000,000 on one line, as against spending £5,000,000 on the other line.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No, £4,000,000, if the honorable member pleases.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I shall take that sum for the present time, and deal later on with the estimates, and see how they have been arrived at. Will any sane man argue for a moment, that, under the conditions I have stated, it would be possible to send produce from Melbourne as cheaply by railway to Kalgoorlie as by ship to Esperance, and thence by railway to Kalgoorlie?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is no railway from Esperance, though.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I know that there is not; but I have submitted a proposition.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It would cost £1,000,000 by the time the harbor was made.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The cost of this Transcontinental Railway is given by this authority at £4,400,000. But that estimate includes no provision for contingencies.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Very much more than is necessary for water, though.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The estimate includes no provision for interest during the period of construction.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes; I think there is some interest included.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I shall be delighted to have it pointed out to me from his report.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I think he does mention interest.

Mr. KENNEDY.—He does mention interest, and he states what the 3 per cent. interest will amount to, provided that the line be made within a certain period.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But the honorable member said that there was no interest included?

Mr. KENNEDY.—No interest is included in this sum of £4,400,000. But, taking the sum total, his estimates amount to practically £5,000,000, and are based on the assumption that the money would be obtained at 3 per cent. No one will venture to say, for a moment, that it could be obtained at that rate to-day, even with gilt-edged securities. Then, with regard to his estimates of revenue, what does he say? He states the number of passengers travelling per week, and he calmly assumes that if the railway were constructed, every one of them would travel by railway instead of by boat.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not all of them.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Yes; he says—

The average number of passengers each way per week, between Fremantle and the eastern States, for the last three years, has been about 400, and it has been fairly uniform for each of the three years. Counting both journeys, this means 800 passengers per week, viz., over 40,000 a year, the majority of whom reside upon, or are connected with the gold-fields, and would consequently probably go by overland railway in order to save time and to keep in touch with their business, unless it involved considerable extra expense.

Mr. O'Connor then deals with the question of stock traffic. I wish to again illustrate the position in that regard. In Victoria, when stock conditions are very favorable in Queensland, we have one of the largest fat stock markets to be found in Australia. At seasons of the year a proportion of the fat stock coming into our market come from the north of New South Wales, the south-west of Queensland, and even from the Northern Territory of South Australia. Would any stock-owner attempt to send any stock by train for more than 200 miles to our fat stock market? Only an absolute necessity such as the saving of stock from starvation will impel a stock-owner to allow stock to be more than twenty-four hours in a train. And no man will leave fat stock in a railway truck for that length of time. What an absurdity it is, then, to talk about sending fat stock into Kalgoorlie!

Mr. LONSDALE.—They send fat stock long distances by train in New South Wales.

Mr. KENNEDY.—They do under certain conditions, but where stock have been more than twenty-four hours in a truck, I venture to say that the owner has known beforehand that he could paddock them to freshen them up.

Mr. FOWLER.—Do not stock carried on a boat fare worse?

Mr. KENNEDY.—When stock fare worse on a boat than they do in a railway truck they go overboard.

Mr. FOWLER.—Does not that count?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Of course it does. It accounts for the stock not being trucked on the railways. It is beyond my comprehension how any sane man can talk about getting a revenue from the carriage of live stock by railway from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie. With regard to perishable produce, the position is practically the same. The only revenue that would be obtainable from traffic over the railway would be from the carriage of passengers and mails.

Mr. FOWLER.—The honorable member is too pessimistic.

Mr. KENNEDY.—How is the railway from Melbourne to Sydney—a line only 600 miles in length, which is not more than half the distance from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie, leaving out of account the distance from Adelaide to Port Augusta—to be regarded as a commercial undertaking? It must be remembered that in Melbourne and Sydney we have two cities with a population of about 500,000 each, while the intervening country is closely settled throughout, and devoted to farming and pastoral pursuits. Yet, notwithstanding these enormous terminal populations, which should insure a large revenue from the carriage of passengers and mails, and the enormous traffic to be picked up at intermediate stations, due to the agricultural and pastoral pursuits followed in the intervening country, that line to-day, after having been open for traffic over twenty years, barely pays interest on the cost of its construction? That being so, I ask what hope is there that a line connecting a town like Adelaide with the mining centres of Western Australia will pay?

Mr. FOWLER.—Western Australia is the best market in the world for farm produce.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The whole population of the State is only about 250,000.

Mr. FOWLER.—There will be millions of people there in a few years.

Mr. LIDDELL.—It will be the most prosperous State of them all.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Undoubtedly; and when it has a population of millions the construction of the proposed railway may be justified. But why should we spend money now to make a line across 600 miles of what, according to Mr. O'Connor, is uninhabited, uncultivated, and waterless country? I understand that on the southern coast of Western Australia there is a fair shelter for steamers of moderate draught; but how is it that there is not even pastoral settlement there?

Mr. WILSON.—Because there is neither water nor feed for stock.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Men have gone from the settled districts of Victoria to the Ord River, and the Cambridge Gulf country; but surely they would have taken up the country on the south coast, which is so much nearer, if it were of any value. The representatives of Western Australia speak of the great advantages which the eastern States will derive from the construction of the proposed Transcontinental Railway; but if the country through which it would pass is so good, why has not its proximity to the sea coast brought about its development? The reasons are that the limestone crops out on the surface; that, according to the information available, the rainfall is only about five inches per annum; and that the country will not keep a rabbit. No matter how many railways were constructed there, that country would never support settlement, unless Nature became more bountiful.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Millions of acres along the route of the proposed line have been applied for, but the land is being withheld for settlement until the construction of the proposed line is authorized.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I see there the hand of the gambler and the land shark again.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The applications I speak of have been made by pastoralists.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Pastoralists are as human, and just as likely to gamble in land, as are other people. Why was not this land taken up twenty years ago, if it is good land? Why was it not taken up as rapidly as the country in the more remote north-western parts of Western Australia, or as rapidly as the dry country in western New South Wales and Queensland? That country is practically waterless for great portions of the year; but it gives good pasture for stock, and the pastoralists who took it up, have been able to make provision for the conservation of water in it. But, although bores have been put down to a depth of 500 feet along the route of the proposed line, no water has been obtained.

Mr. FOWLER.—Yes; the operations have been very successful.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—The water is salt.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It certainly would not pay to condense salt water for stock. The country I speak of has not been settled, because it is unfit for settlement, and has no possibilities of development. I hope that before the discussion closes, other reasons beyond those given by the Government for the introduction of the Bill, will be advanced in support of this proposal to spend £20,000 without the consent of the States, which is required by the Constitution, on an undertaking of this kind. If the construction of a transcontinental line would be such a good thing for Western Australia as those who represent that State allege that it would be, surely so prosperous and wealthy a community could afford to spend £20,000 in surveying the route.

Mr. FOWLER.—The people of Western Australia have treated the people of the eastern States very well.

Mr. KENNEDY.—If they could have obtained better conditions in other markets, the people of Western Australia would not have hesitated to obtain their supplies elsewhere.

Mr. FOWLER.—No. We are patriotic.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Western Australia has been peopled by Victorians and New South Welshmen; but those who have gone there are only human, and if they could have got better treatment elsewhere, they would not have dealt with the traders and produce merchants of the eastern States. I should not have attempted to traverse the possibilities of the line, had it not been for the insistence of the right honorable member for Swan upon his view of the position; I should have been content to rest my case on the undesirableness of the precedent which it is sought to establish.

Mr. FOWLER.—It may be awkward for the honorable member when we come to deal with proposals for Commonwealth irrigation works.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I shall be prepared to deal with all such questions as they arise. I was twitted by some honorable members opposite as to my position in connexion with this proposal, but I told them at the time that I should be able to explain my position, if I were given an opportunity to do so. As I have some further remarks to make, and the hour is late, I ask the Minister of Home Affairs to allow the debate to be adjourned.

Progress reported.

House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

Senate.

Wednesday, 14 September, 1904.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PETITION.

Senator DOBSON presented a petition from the President of the Central Council of Employers of Australia, praying the Senate not to support certain amendments in the Trade Marks Bill.

Petition received and read.

PAPERS.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON laid upon the table the following paper:—

Report of the Royal Commission on the affray at Goaribari Island, British New Guinea.

The CLERK laid upon the table the following paper:—

Return to the order of the Senate of 7th September, 1904, as to the remarks of Major-General Hutton in regard to the Northern Territory.

CASE OF MAJOR CARROLL.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I beg to present the report of the Select Committee on the case of Major Carroll, but as it comprises seventeen or eighteen pages, I do not ask that it be read. I move—

That the report, together with minutes of evidence, appendices, and documents, be printed.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

CONCILIATION AND ARBITRATION BILL.

Bill received from the House of Representatives, and (on motion by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON) read a first time.

SELECT COMMITTEES.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I beg to give notice that to-morrow I shall move—

1. That, in the opinion of this Senate, it is the inherent right of any person, being a party to any matter remitted by this Senate to a Select Committee, to call witnesses in support of his contention, and to cross-examine witnesses who have given evidence against the case submitted by him.

2. That the refusal of any Select Committee appointed by this Senate to permit the calling or cross-examining of witnesses by or on behalf of any person, being a party to a case before such Committee, is a denial of justice, and a refusal of the rights universally accorded by Courts of Law and Parliamentary Committees.

3. That the interests of truth and justice demand that all evidence taken by Committees of this Senate shall be taken upon oath or affirmation.

Senator HIGGS.—I desire to know, sir, whether you can accept a notice of motion of that kind?

The PRESIDENT.—I do not see why I should not.

Senator HIGGS.—It seems to me that the honorable senator is endeavouring to take out of the hands of a certain Select Committee the conduct of its proceedings. The Senate knows nothing of those proceedings.

The PRESIDENT.—The honorable senator ought not to make a speech.

Senator HIGGS.—It seems to me that in this notice of motion the honorable senator is reflecting upon the proceedings of the Select Committee.

The PRESIDENT.—The Senate has a perfect right to reflect upon the proceedings of a Select Committee, at all events after it has reported, and to accept or ignore the report of a Select Committee. A Select Committee has only a delegated power, and I do not think that the notice of motion is out of order. It is general in its terms.

Senator HIGGS.—I submit, sir, that the honorable senator, in giving notice of a motion of that kind, has taken upon himself a duty which no honorable senator has a right to assume. The Senate knows nothing of the proceedings of this Select Committee. It has not yet made a report, but Senator Neild has undertaken to make certain observations concerning its proceedings.

The PRESIDENT.—That is a different point from the one which was originally raised.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—On the point of order, sir, I desire to state that the notice of motion is couched in the most general terms, and contains no reference to any particular Select Committee.

The PRESIDENT.—I think that the notice of motion is in order. At all events, at this stage I cannot interfere to prevent it being given; but when it is called on Senator Higgs can raise any point of order which he wishes to submit.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—May I be permitted, sir, to point out that this is entirely an abstract motion. I merely make this remark so that Senator Higgs need not take alarm at a notice of motion which, of course, very greatly concerns questions of parliamentary procedure.

Senator HIGGS.—Every one knows what is intended.

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION ACT.

Senator PEARCE asked the Attorney-General, upon notice—

Is it a fact that the officer administering the Immigration Restriction Act recently discovered nine Chinese stowed away in one of the regular trading steamers running between Fremantle and Singapore; if so, do the Government intend to take precautions to prevent the Act being evaded in the manner attempted?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is a fact, and the Government have taken, and are taking, every available precaution to prevent evasion of the law.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

Debate resumed from 9th September (vide page 4401) on motion by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON—

That the despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with regard to the adoption of the metric system of weights and measures within the Empire, be printed.

Senator CLEMONS (Tasmania).—I think that you, sir, will agree with me that in a debate of this character any criticism, however strong it may be, directed towards political acts or attitudes, is both reasonable and appropriate. I think also that you, and an overwhelming majority of the Senate, will agree with me in condemning any sort of abuse that is wholly personal in its intent, and in expressing disgust at any exhibition of such execrably bad taste, such as we have heard during the debate, not only in set speech, but by way of interjection. And when such abuse and such an exhibition comes from the honorable senator who, in a very egotistical way, drew attention to the duties and responsibilities of the Vice-President of the Executive Council, I venture to think that our feelings are necessarily all the more intense. The personal references which were made by Senator McGregor to the Vice-President of the Executive Council, and in a lesser degree to the Attorney-General, ought very properly to have excited a considerable disgust in the minds of every honorable senator who heard them.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Cannot the honorable and learned senator allow them to defend themselves?

Senator CLEMONS.—They are better able to defend themselves than I am to defend them.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Then the honorable and learned senator should not take on the job.

Senator CLEMONS.—I am not making these remarks in order to defend either of the Ministers, but because I feel that the honorable senator has done a lot to drag into the mud our ordinary procedure. Could anything have been more feeble and more contemptible than his personal references to the Ministers? Has the Senate ever heard an interjection so disgusting, so absolutely revolting, as the one which was made by Senator McGregor while an honorable senator on this side was speaking—an interjection which was heard on all sides of the Chamber, but which very fortunately for the good credit of the Senate does not appear in Hansard. I do not wish to dwell long on Senator McGregor. But there is another question affecting him that I shall briefly draw attention to. He denied explicitly in his recent speech that he ever announced that he was up for sale. I admit that subsequently he tried to explain the remark away by saying that it was made purely as a joke. Of course it is a very easy exit for a public man when he is challenged with having made a remark which contains absolute evidence of disgrace, to say that he made it jokingly. Such an exit is perfectly easy. But it is not one which a man will use if he wishes either to retain his own self respect or to gain the respect of others. I, as one who heard that remark, say unhesitatingly that the day the honorable senator spoke recently was the first time I ever heard that it was made in a joke. The context, which any honorable senator can read on page 131 of Hansard, contains nothing, either before or after the words he used, which could make an ordinary man understand that they were used in joke.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable and learned senator say that seriously?

Senator CLEMONS.—I do. The remark can be read by any one on page 131 of Hansard, and if time permitted I should be very glad to read the whole of what Senator McGregor might call the context of the remark. So far from regarding the remark as a piece of jocularity, Senator McGregor has, in his subsequent political career, given evidence more than once that it was not made by way of a joke, but in earnest. I have finished with the honorable senator, and if either he or any of his friends choose to indorse the remark, or to justify it, an opportunity will be afforded presently, I have no doubt.

Senator HIGGS.—But the honorable and learned senator does not interpret that remark to mean that the Labour Party was up for sale for money?

Senator CLEMONS.—I am not talking of money. Is there nothing else but money to consider?

Senator HIGGS.—Does not the honorable and learned senator understand the remark to mean that the Labour Party was up for sale for legislation?

Senator CLEMONS.—If the honorable senator is desirous of explaining the remark I shall be extremely glad if he will do so before the debate is concluded. I take this opportunity, however, to prevent him challenging me unfairly. I have dragged in no question of money, but I repeat that if we follow the subsequent career of Senator McGregor we have every reason for believing that the remark was made, not in joke, but in earnest. I hope that what I have said is clear to Senator Higgs, and if he is going to defend Senator McGregor, I invite him to do so during the course of this debate.

Senator HIGGS.—Yes; but is the honorable and learned senator going to show what Senator McGregor did say?

Senator CLEMONS.—I am not going to deal with the subject any more. I have wasted too much time on it. One of the chief objections which have been raised by many honorable senators on the other side against the combination they look at on this side is based, I believe, on that well-known phrase, "fiscal truce." In the first speech I ever made here—before the Tariff was introduced—I stated most distinctly that, while I, as a free-trader, was afraid that, in the hands of a protectionist Government, we should find that it would be a protectionist Tariff, yet I declared, even at that early stage, that I should be no party to re-opening the discussion for many years to come, no matter in what form the Tariff might emerge from the Parliament. My conscience is perfectly clear on the question of a fiscal truce. I am still against re-opening the discussion on the Tariff.

Senator GIVENS.—No matter how bad it may be?

Senator CLEMONS.—I admit that it is bad, and I do not think that any one holds that opinion more strongly than I do. I shall state the reason why I object to re-opening the discussion. Let us admit, for the sake of argument, that we, on this side of the Chamber, are all born dullards. But will not my honorable friends opposite recognise that dull as we may be, our source of instruction is a very good one? We have excellent teachers on the other side, and is it wonderful that we have learnt their lesson? Having such instructors, is it a source of astonishment even to honorable senators opposite, that we have decided to adopt their own methods? What has been the position during the history of the Federal Parliament? We have been forced to recognise this—that my honorable friends opposite, with all their profound investigation of questions of economy, have decided in their wholly indifferent way that the Tariff is a mere detail to them.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Did the honorable senator tell the electors of Tasmania, when he was before them, that he would take up that attitude?

Senator CLEMONS.—At the time when I sought election, I undoubtedly stood as a free-trader. Previous to the last election, when the Tariff debates were all over, I said at every place where I spoke that it was my intention to go for what we called fiscal peace, and that, so far as I was concerned, the Tariff discussions were at an end. I do not pretend that I do not regret the Tariff that was passed, but while it must not be imagined that I deviate a hair's breadth from my opinions on free-trade, I do not intend to depart from the view which I expressed previous to the last general election, that, so far as I was concerned, the Tariff was out of the way. I said just now that dull as we may be, we are capable of learning from our opponents when we have in them such excellent teachers. Every one has seen in the present Parliament that the Labour Party, being able to set aside the question of free-trade and protection as one of comparative indifference, has gained great strength thereby. We propose to learn a lesson from their book. If they object, they must object to their own teaching first before they object to the lesson which we have learnt.

Senator MCGREGOR.—When the honorable and learned senator loses free-trade, where is his policy?

Senator CLEMONS.—We have other matters to consider besides protection and free-trade, and we do not intend to allow a division of opinion in our own ranks to throw greater strength into the hands of the party opposite. That is the view of honorable senators on this side. While I am discussing fiscal peace, it may not be inappropriate to make some remarks about the new alliance, about which we hear and read so much. If any one party is going to get an advantage from that alliance, it must be from a fiscal surrender on the part of a section. The proposition is that certain disaffected protectionists shall join in alliance with the Labour Party. I am not going to credit an astute man like Mr. Isaacs with a desire for self-annihilation, nor do I imagine that he is anxious to be absorbed wholly into even such excellent ranks as I see opposite. That being so, the position is not the acceptance of fiscal peace on the part of members of the Labour Party, but an absolute fiscal surrender on the part of men like Senators Pearce and Dawson.

Senator DAWSON.—Why?

Senator PEARCE.—There is no surrender of principle on my part.

Senator CLEMONS.—I have not said that. I have not such a mean opinion of Senator Pearce as to think that he is going to surrender his free-trade principles. But I put the point before him as a possible proposition, not as an insult.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator has used my name in connexion with a fiscal surrender. I ask why?

Senator CLEMONS.—The honorable senator's previous record during the Tariff discussions justified me in the assumption that he was a free-trader.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable and learned senator has no justification for saying so.

Senator CLEMONS.—Then I withdraw the remark with the greatest pleasure; and it shows how easily Senator Dawson can deceive us, because so far as his votes were concerned—so far as they could be taken as an indication of his views—I submit that on analysis they would make it clear to an ordinary man that he was rather a free-trader than a protectionist.

Senator DAWSON.—I said over and over again that I did not believe in any of your shibboleths.

Senator CLEMONS.—I know that some of the honorable senator's party rejoice in the name of "fiscal atheists." I am sorry, however, that Senator Dawson should take such a very poor view of questions of political economy as to set up the absolute negation of a fiscal atheism. But let me go back to the proposed alliance. To my mind it involves on the part of the free-trade members of the party opposite, not merely an advocacy of a fiscal truce, but a positive change from free-trade to protection.

Senator GIVENS.—How does the honorable and learned senator make that out?

Senator CLEMONS. — Surely Senator Givens has followed my argument. I have pointed out that if such an astute man as Mr. Isaacs—and though Senator Givens is a new member of this Parliament, I have no doubt that he knows that Mr. Isaacs is generally spoken of as an astute man—is going to allow himself to be absorbed in the party of which Senator Givens is a member, that process of absorption will not take place unless Mr. Isaacs gets something in the nature of a quid pro quo. We all know what he wants. The thing is as plain as anything can be. The letters are in large type. Mr. Isaacs wants a protectionist revival. How is Mr. Isaacs going to hope for that if he is to look for support for that movement from members like Senator Pearce, and half a dozen others in the House of Representatives who hold similar principles? I do not wish to labour that point, but side by side with it stands another matter which has been mentioned in the course of this debate. That is the question of preferential trade. The present Government has been ridiculed—I do not say that the ridicule was effective, but I have heard attempts to ridicule it—because of its attitude on that question. Any one who is conversant with the present state of the movement for preferential trade in England will know that the most recent development in connexion with it has taken the form of a proposition for the holding of a Colonial Conference. To go back a little, I may say that one of the initial difficulties on the part of the Commonwealth of Australia in the matter of preferential trade is this: that there is no authority in England at the present time that the Federal Parliament could approach. The author of the scheme is Mr. Chamberlain. The scheme has not been supported by the Ministry in the House of Commons, and it could scarcely be urged, I suppose, that this Parliament or the Commonwealth Government could approach a private individual, who is not even a Minister at present, with regard to the scheme. But what I wish to draw special attention to is this fact—and I do not suppose it will be denied—that the present view of England on this question is strongly favorable to free-trade. On the other side, we are confronted by the fact that the present view of the Commonwealth, as exhibited by its Tariff, is favorable to protection. Now, it has recently been urged in England, with a great deal of force, that there are two ideas involved in this preferential trade scheme. One—and the dominant one, the ostensibly dominant one, at any rate, and I believe, really, the dominant one in Mr. Chamberlain's mind—is the idea of Imperial unity. Side by side with that we find, of course, the idea of an economic revolt—a change from one fiscal scheme to the other. I admit that freely, but I do say this—and I suppose that no one in the Senate will deny it, whether he be a protectionist or otherwise—that of those two schemes—the one of Imperial unity and the other the change from free-trade to protection—the more important is the former, the principle of Imperial unity. So far as Great Britain is concerned, it is fairly safe to prophesy that at the next election the result will be that the free-traders will come into power. But I do not say, therefore, that the scheme of preferential trade will be finally disposed of. We must, however, recognise the fact that it necessarily—absolutely necessarily—implies a sacrifice. If we are going to realize the great idea of a power binding the whole Empire together in commercial bonds of peace, we must also recognise, whether we live in England or Australia, that some sacrifice must be made to insure it. The sacrifices to be made in a bargain between England and Australia—because, after all, it will be in the nature of a bargain—would not be one-sided. Surely the strongest protectionists amongst us are not going to insist that there shall be no surrender as far as we are concerned, and no sacrifice? Are we going to say to the people of England, who, as we know, cherish so strong a determination to have free food and free raw material, that if we do make a sacrifice in order to realize this idea of Imperial unity by consenting to the taxation of their food and raw material, we, on our side, will make no sacrifice whatever? And this is the root of the whole matter—the sacrifice that will have to be made. Senator Styles has more than once spoken upon this subject in the Senate. He has endeavoured to assure us that he is dominated with the idea of Imperial unity, and Imperial expansion. But at the same time we know—some of us to our cost—that he is a very hearty protectionist.

Senator Clemons.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Why must there necessarily be a sacrifice on our part?

Senator CLEMONS.—I say that if we are going to realize this idea of Imperial unity there must be sacrifice on both sides.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Cannot we have preferential trade by raising our duties against the foreigner?

Senator CLEMONS.—I do not think it is difficult to answer a question of that sort. But let me go back a little. If the English Parliament in a few years is going to attempt to bring about this idea of Imperial unity by means of preferential trade, I say again that a sacrifice will inevitably be necessary on the part of the British people. Because no protectionist, even in Australia, will, for a moment, think that the British people will consider that the taxing of food and of raw material is not in the nature of a sacrifice. Even protectionists in the Senate will remember that some of their number, like Senator de Largie, when we were discussing the Tariff, regarded taxes on food which affected the gold-fields as in the nature of a sacrifice. Protectionist as he may call himself, he never failed to vote for free food whenever he had an opportunity.

Senator DE LARGIE.—If I were in the old country to-day, I should take up the same attitude with regard to duties on food.

Senator CLEMONS.—That is what I am saying. I am putting this as an example. When protectionists, even in Australia, object to taxing food, surely it will be recognised that the mass of the English people will regard the taxing of food and raw material as a serious sacrifice on their part.

Senator STYLES.—Mr. Chamberlain says that there will be no loss.

Senator CLEMONS.—It is clear that a sacrifice on both sides is necessary if this scheme of preferential trade is going to eventuate. And if we recognise that a sacrifice has to be made by Great Britain we must also recognise that a sacrifice must be made here. Is there any possible sacrifice except that which is to come from the reduction of duties? I see none. Senator O'Keefe has asked why we could not raise duties against the foreigner. We might by that means accord an infinitesimal preference to Great Britain. But it cannot be claimed that we are making any sacrifice in that direction; and if the demand for Imperial unity has any weight or force, it cannot be met merely by increasing duties against the foreigner.

Senator GIVENS.—Is the honorable senator in favour of preferential trade?

Senator CLEMONS.—If Senator Givens has not been able to gather my opinions from the remarks which I have made I am afraid that I shall have to leave the subject. I am going to deal with other questions, which more closely concern him. I do not know whether Senator Givens professes to be a protectionist or a free-trader, but I am going to deal with subjects that perhaps will interest him more closely. I have noticed several times in this chamber that members of the Labour Party have endeavoured to cause something like ridicule, or to bring into contempt some of us on the other side, by applying to us epithets such as "conservative." That is a common gibe.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Do not the honorable and learned senator's party adopt the same tactics?

Senator CLEMONS.—I do not. Is there any more justice in calling me a conservative than there would be, from my point of view, if I called Senator Guthrie an anarchist? But I do not do that.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Because I am not one.

Senator CLEMONS.—The truth of the matter is that one statement is exactly as true as the other would be; and while I should never attempt to cast ridicule at my opponents, or to bring contempt upon them by calling them anarchists, I certainly do object to being called a conservative. I resent it.

Senator HIGGS.—Does not the honorable and learned senator wish to conserve things which are good?

Senator CLEMONS.—I am not going into details. While an attempt has been made to ridicule us by calling us conservatives, I notice that honorable senators on the other side rejoice complacently in the title of democrat. Have they any private patent right to the use of the term "democrat?" What do they mean by calling themselves a democracy? They mean simply this: That if they know anything of our Constitution and our franchise, they express their loyalty to both. So do I. I recognise that we in Australia, living under the most democratic Constitution to be found in the civilized world, and having the widest franchise that any Constitution has ever put into legislative form—

Senator FINDLEY.—Thanks to the Labour Party, not to the Conservative Party.

Senator CLEMONS.—Does the honorable senator impugn my loyalty to the Constitution? Unless he does he must recognise that the title of democrat, as implying loyalty to the democratic Constitution under which we live, and consequently to the principles under which we think we ought to be governed, is as much mine as his. As to the principles under which our Constitution and franchise have been framed, and by which we think the people should be governed, that is quite another question. On that point we may get at issue. My honorable friends opposite, I believe, now admit that the principles by which they think the people should be governed are the principles of Socialism.

Senator FINDLEY.—Trust the people.

Senator CLEMONS.—Precisely. I hope that I can consider Socialism not as a crime, or as a political creed to be ashamed of. I do not look at it in that way. I may tell honorable senators what I think when I hear the word "Socialism" used. I recognise that if there is a persistent cry on the part of a large number of people for Socialism there must be either a real evil which requires redress, or an imaginary evil, in which case the imagination should be cleared. I am not prepared to say, in the state of politics in Australia at the present time, that there is a real evil. Honorable senators opposite say that there is an evil, and I admit that the cry for Socialism is an indication of it. They say further that the remedy and certain cure for the evil is Socialism, and there I fail to agree with them. I say it is not. I say that that remedy is as bad as the disease, if the people are diseased.

Senator DOBSON.—It is a great deal worse.

Senator CLEMONS.—I do not agree with Senator Dobson in taking an absolutely extreme view of these things.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Senator Dobson has no other remedy to offer.

Senator CLEMONS.—If I pride myself upon anything it is upon a willingness to frankly state my views. I pride myself upon being a Liberal. I prefer, as a remedy, for the evils of the State, whether real or imaginary, not merely the enunciation, but the practical operation also of liberal principles. I suppose that the cause of the cry of Socialism is in the minds of honorable senators opposite an idea that labour is unequally treated, that the distribution of the world's wealth is unfair, and that the capitalist gets more than he ought. The remedy submitted by honorable senators opposite for these things is Socialism, and I say that it is a bad one. Senator Guthrie has asked what other remedy might be suggested, and I venture to suggest one which might be found to be worth trying, and that is a system of co-operation.

Senator GIVENS.—That is Socialism.

Senator GUTHRIE.—What is the difference?

Senator CLEMONS.—I can tell the honorable senator what the difference is. Co-operation does this, at any rate: it respects and preserves the economic value of both capital and labour. Does Senator Guthrie differ from that? I know of no scheme of co-operation that would fail in that way. I can tell the honorable senator also what Socialism does, or tends to do. It tends, and I suppose honorable senators opposite will admit it at once, to destroy capital.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Not at all; merely to destroy capitalists. There is a great distinction.

Senator CLEMONS.—Very well, I will alter it to that. And I can show honorable senators that it comes to exactly the same thing. Socialism, then, tends to prevent the distribution of capital. It proposes, in the ultimate end, to put all capital into the hands of the State as a whole.

Senator GIVENS.—That is the whole people.

Senator CLEMONS.—The ultimate object of Socialism is to make the State the only capitalist. Honorable senators must admit that if that is the object it must necessarily follow, if it is pursued to its ultimate end, that the tendency must be to destroy capitalism in individual hands.

Senator HENDERSON.—Hear, hear.

Senator CLEMONS.—Very well, the that is what I object to. I say that if we confine all capital to the State, we shall be doing the State an irretrievable injury. I say that if we do not allow individuals fair and equal opportunity to become capitalists—and I am no advocate for the capitalist—we shall be doing the State an incalculable harm.

Senator DE LARGIE.—They could be wealth-owners without being capitalists.

Senator CLEMONS.—I have not yet finished with my explanation of the difference between co-operation and Socialism. I say that co-operation preserves the economic value of capital and labour. I may say that Socialism destroys the capitalist, and honorable senators opposite please. But I further say, that Socialism degrades labour.

Senator FINDLEY.—What evidence do you have, the honorable and learned senator for that statement?

Senator DE LARGIE.—The poor State servants, for instance.

Senator CLEMONS.—That is just the sort of interjection which Senator Findley should not have made. Suppose I ask the honorable senator, in return, what evidence can he find, in the whole world's history, of the success of a single socialistic system.

Senator FINDLEY.—The Post Office.

Senator CLEMONS.—I am not speaking of a single example of State Socialism in any community that is not socialistic. I ask the honorable senators opposite if they can tell me where in the history of the world there is to be found an example of a successful socialistic community?

Senator GUTHRIE.—There has been an opportunity to have the principle tried.

Senator DOBSON.—Any number of attempts made have failed.

Senator CLEMONS.—Perhaps I can tell Senator Guthrie that Socialism, which the honorable senator and his party have introduced to Australia as the new panacea for all evils, is older than almost any other scheme of politics which we can trace. It was exploded thousands of years ago.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Where?

Senator CLEMONS.—If Senator De Largie will read the history of Socialism affecting political legislation, he will find that it was tried thousands of years ago.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The honorable senator is referring to Communism, and not to State Socialism.

Senator CLEMONS.—I am referring to Socialism in all its various phases, and to the various attempts made during the history of the world for thousands of years to establish it. Wherever such an attempt has been made, it has been a disastrous and ghastly failure. Though it has been a failure in the past, it is just possible that our honorable friends opposite have some new form of Socialism which will be a success, but I venture to think that they have not made such a discovery.

Senator HIGGS.—Would the honorable and learned senator mind describing for honorable senators a socialistic State in the sense in which he understands the term?

Senator CLEMONS.—That is not my particular province. Why should I anticipate the remarks of Senator Higgs? The honorable senator is especially well qualified, not only to describe a socialistic State, but to paint it in beautiful colours, and I must hesitate to undertake a task to which I am sure I could not do the same justice.

Senator HIGGS.—We desire to know whether the honorable and learned senator's ideas of a socialistic State is the same as ours?

Senator CLEMONS.—I have not any idea of a socialistic State.

Senator GUTHRIE.—The honorable and learned senator has pictured one.

Senator CLEMONS.—I have not pictured any. I have made some simple statements with respect to the theory of Socialism, which, for the most part, have been admitted by honorable senators opposite. My object has been to come to level terms with honorable senators, in order that we may not be at cross purposes.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Where have the failures occurred to which the honorable and learned senator has referred?

Senator CLEMONS.—Where have been the successes? That is a sufficient answer to the honorable senator. I say that, from the earliest history of the world down to 1904, honorable senators can find no instance of a successful socialistic community.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Where have been the failures?

Senator CLEMONS.—They are to be found on almost every page of history.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Will the honorable and learned senator point to one.

Senator CLEMONS.—I do not propose to do so.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Because the honorable and learned senator cannot do so.

Senator CLEMONS.—Does Senator Guthrie say that no previous attempts have been made?

Senator GUTHRIE.—No.

Senator CLEMONS.—Then the honorable senator is sufficiently answered when he can point to no successful attempt. If there have been successful attempts made, where have they been made?

Senator DAWSON.—Where has an attempt been made?

Senator CLEMONS.—If Senator Dawson will only read history he will find that a number of trials of the principle have been made. What we propose to do now is to prevent honorable senators opposite making this old experiment in Australia.

Senator PEARCE.—Does the honorable and learned senator object to the socialistic railway system?

Senator CLEMONS.—I have laboured the point long enough, and if Senator Pearce will allow me I shall deal with other matters.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is not socialistic.

Senator CLEMONS.—If Senator Pearce wants an answer I may tell him that I have always recognised that in certain matters the State may properly interfere. It may do so, for instance, with respect to questions of public health and disease.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—We cannot employ private enterprise for railways of development.

Senator DE LARGIE.—That is our policy.

Senator CLEMONS.—If honorable senators opposite will stick to that, and will allow the State to interfere only with regard to questions of public health and disease, I shall be with them all the time, and they will have no more active co-operator in that kind of Socialism than they will find in me. I propose now to deal with another question. We have had a great deal of talk with regard to the caucus. Senator McGregor has given us the planks of the present platform of the Labour Party. Other honorable senators have indignantly denied that the caucus does anything. The contention is that the platform of the Labour Party is well established, and that the planks with regard to the present Parliament are seven. It has been argued that they received the approval and indorsement of a large number of electors outside, and that there was therefore nothing for the caucus to do. First of all, I do not believe that the caucus does nothing. There must be a flaw in the argument somewhere.

Senator MCGREGOR.—It has to watch the honorable and learned senator.

Senator CLEMONS.—I know what the caucus has to do. It is easy for honorable senators to say that they have got their direction. I admit that that is so when they say it. They say that they require no caucus at all, because the labour organizations outside have indicated the direction in which they must go.

Senator PEARCE.—We do not say that the caucus has no work to do.

Senator CLEMONS.—I propose to give honorable senators my idea of what the caucus does.

Senator GIVENS. — The honorable and learned senator is going to draw upon his imagination.

Senator CLEMONS.—If what I say is only imagination I hope that Senator Givens will correct me. I desire that there should be a clear understanding between us. I take it that the caucus is not required in the least degree to give effect to the policy of honorable senators opposite, so far as the seven planks of the labour platform to which I have referred are concerned.

Senator PEARCE.—That is not so.

Senator CLEMONS.—Is there not a higher authority than the caucus?

Senator PEARCE.—Yes; the people outside.

Senator CLEMONS.—That is exactly what I am saying.

Senator GUTHRIE.—The electors.

Senator CLEMONS.—Yes, I am content to make the term as wide as honorable senators please. The electors have directed seven planks of the labour platform.

Senator PEARCE.—They have not dealt with any details.

Senator CLEMONS.—Senator Pearce has only anticipated what I proposed to say. The electors have indicated directions, but I wish to emphasize the fact that between direction and distance there is a vast difference. The electors may tell the members of the Labour Party that they desire them to legislate with regard to seven definite principles, and the Labour Party agree to do so; but do the electors tell members of the Labour Party how far they wish them to go with each of the measures introduced to give effect to the seven planks of the platform?

Senator DAWSON.—No; they trust us in the matter.

Senator GIVENS.—We told the electors how far we would go when we asked them for their votes.

Senator CLEMONS.—I say that the caucus determines the distance to which honorable senators opposite shall go.

Senator PEARCE.—Hear, hear.

Senator CLEMONS.—That is the sort of thing we object to. I draw this distinction that when the main principles of a Bill are settled, we do not submit a draft of the measure to any electors, and yet, as every honorable senator knows, in the framing of a Bill there is immense scope, subject to its title, for divergence with regard to detail. Take the instance of the Labour Party's view of a White Australia.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Take the instance of the Trade Marks Bill, which now provides for a trade union mark.

Senator CLEMONS. — I take the strong instance of the "six hatters" provision in the "White Australia" Act. We know that the Labour Party did not intend that the six hatters provision should be included in that measure.

Senator PEARCE.—Yes, they did.

Senator CLEMONS.—I admit that I have not quoted the title of the Act, which did not contain a word about colour.

Senator GUTHRIE.—It is an Immigration Act.

Senator CLEMONS.—It used to be called the "Alien Immigration Act," but it subsequently received a title which is absolutely repulsive in many aspects, and which would appear to be an absolute absurdity when we consider the condition of affairs in Australia at the present time. It was subsequently called the "Immigration Restriction Act." If this Parliament had passed an Immigration Encouragement Act, it might have been proud of it.

Senator STYLES.—What is meant is only the restriction of undesirable immigrants.

Senator CLEMONS.—I propose to deal with the question of undesirable immigrants, but I am now dealing with the six hatters provision. We all know the history of it. The desire for it arose from a determination, which was not limited by any means to honorable senators opposite, to prevent the importation into Australia at the time of a strike of any body of labourers—in other words, to prevent any capitalists using an unfair weapon. Every member of the Senate was with honorable senators of the Labour Party in that desire, but the section did not ultimately have only that effect. As we all know now, its effect is to absolutely prohibit any ordinary working man from coming into Australia under contract unless there is a special exemption in his favour on the ground that he is a representative of skilled labour required in the Commonwealth.

Senator O'KEEFE.—Did not every member of the House of Representatives know that when the proposal was made?

Senator CLEMONS.—I am concerned only with what occurred in the Senate.

Senator O'KEEFE.—But the honorable and learned senator says that we did not know what the effect of the section would be.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—I ask the honorable and learned senator whether any person on this planet has been kept out of Australia by reason of that particular section of the Act?

Senator CLEMONS.—I have no positive information from any person in England that he has been prevented from coming to Australia by the existence of the section, but I am still absolutely certain that hundreds, and possibly thousands, of persons have been deterred from emigrating to Australia by the section.

Senator GUTHRIE.—That is in the pages of history, too, I suppose?

Senator CLEMONS.—That is an ordinary sort of inference which even a man of Senator Guthrie's mental capacity might be expected to make. I say that we know what the effect of the six hatters section has been. I believe that the original object was merely to prevent any number of men being introduced in the case of a strike.

Senator PEARCE.—It was intended to prevent men coming out under contract—just what it says.

Senator CLEMONS.—I accept the honorable senator's statement gladly. The real object of the section was to prevent men being introduced at the time of a strike, but some honorable senators, including Senator Pearce, further intended that it should be used to prevent men being introduced under contract.

Senator O'KEEFE. — And that was endorsed by members of all parties in the House of Representatives.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Nothing of the kind.

Senator CLEMONS.—I have dealt with the first object which the section was intended to secure, and so far as that is concerned, I say that there was absolute unanimity in the Senate. We are now told that it was also the object of the section to prevent people being introduced under contract.

Senator TURLEY.—Hear, hear.

Senator CLEMONS.—I ask Senator Turley why he objects to men being introduced under contract? I know the honorable senator will answer that we desire that only free men should come here. What does the honorable senator mean by that? Does he mean that we do not want anything in the nature of slavery.

Senator GIVENS.—We do not want men under a bond.

Senator CLEMONS.—I accept that.

Senator GIVENS.—We want them to make their bargains when they know the conditions.

Senator CLEMONS.—That is not what honorable senators wanted. They desired that men should not be brought out to Australia under contract. From the legislative point of view is there anything objectionable in a contract?

Senator GIVENS.—If the parties are not aware of the whole of the circumstances, there is.

Senator CLEMONS.—Will honorable senators opposite say that a man living in Australia, and entering into a contract, has put himself into bonds, or has done anything to interfere with his freedom?

Senator GIVENS.—He knows the conditions.

Senator CLEMONS.—Honorable senators admit that he does not. Yet some of them, who speak of Imperial unity, and of their loyalty in connexion with preferential trade, will contend that, while a man in Australia, who enters into a contract to do work, does nothing to affect his independence, or to make him less respected in their eyes, that that which is in every sense right for a man in Australia, becomes in every sense wrong, if it is a man in England who makes the contract. The whole essence of their contention is that a contract made elsewhere is bad, and that all contracts must be made here.

Senator O'KEEFE. — The honorable and learned senator is not stating our contention fairly.

Senator CLEMONS.—I am stating the case absolutely fairly. The Labour Party say that a contract made here is right and defensible, but that a contract made in England is wrong and indefensible, and that the contractee puts himself in the bonds of slavery. Their argument is sheer nonsense.

Senator PEARCE.—We say that the contract is wrong, because the man does not know the local conditions.

Senator CLEMONS.—Why should he not take that risk?

Senator PEARCE.—Because it is not fair either to himself or to the men with whom he has to compete.

Senator CLEMONS.—A proposition was made in the Senate to modify this provision. It was urged that if it was intended to interfere with the right of contract simply because it was going to be made in England and not in Australia, at any rate honorable senators, on the other side, could have no fair reason to justify them, in the eyes of Australia, in refusing to insert a proviso that men of forethought and prudence who wished to secure themselves from starvation or the risk of it, could make a contract in England, but that in order not to injure any working man in Australia, it should be subject to this express condition that the rate of wages to be paid should be the highest rate paid in Australia in connexion with that particular employment. That proposition was made here, and rejected by the Labour Party. If they say that it was not made, and was not rejected, will they consent to have the section so modified now?

Senator PEARCE.—The rate of wages is not the only condition.

Senator CLEMONS.—Then there are other conditions.

Senator PEARCE.—Yes, for instance the hours of labour.

Senator CLEMONS.—Surely the honorable senator does not imagine I am quibbling in regard to the terms of the contract. I am perfectly willing to agree that it should be made subject to, not only the rates of wages paid here, but also the hours of labour worked here. Did the Labour Party refuse to insert that proviso in the measure? And if they did, will they accept such a proposition now?

Senator GUTHRIE.—Let the honorable and learned senator introduce a Bill, and then we shall tell him.

Senator CLEMONS.—Have not my honorable friends the pluck to say what they think on the subject? Why do they ask me to introduce a Bill? Why do they masquerade before the people of Australia as persons who are desirous of encouraging immigration when their policy is to restrict it?

Senator GUTHRIE.—Because we have had experience of men who have fallen in under the contract system.

Senator CLEMONS.—I shall tell the Labour Party exactly what I think of their notion about immigration. I could point to many more cases which have the direct effect of restricting rather than encouraging immigration.

Senator DAWSON.—Do I understand from the honorable and learned senator that if he had an opportunity he would vote for the repeal of the provision relating to contract labour?

Senator CLEMONS.—I should not allow any men to be brought in here for the purpose of settling a strike, but as in the meantime the Labour Party have taken other precautions to prevent strikes, perhaps they do not consider that important. As that proviso is not in the Act, if I had the opportunity of voting with a majority I should do my best to repeal that provision, and if ever a chance comes I shall.

Senator FINDLEY.—Does the honorable and learned senator think that persons ought to be allowed to come in under contract, when Australians are walking about and eating the bread of idleness?

Senator WALKER.—Because they will not work for less than 7s. 6d. per day.

Senator CLEMONS.—I wish to deal with a plank of the Labour Party's platform that we have heard much about. It struck me as very curious that it is called the restriction of borrowing. I understand that if they are restored to power they will introduce a Banking Bill, and that it will provide for taking 40 per cent. of the fixed deposits of the banks. Is that quite consistent with the plank which is called restriction of public borrowing?

Senator GUTHRIE.—That is not borrowing.

Senator CLEMONS.—What is it? If it is not borrowing it must be a forced loan. It is either taking or confiscation. Let my honorable friends make their choice.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It is making use of idle capital.

Senator CLEMONS.—If my honorable friends wish to be consistent they have to say that it is not borrowing, because they intend to restrict public borrowing.

Senator PEARCE.—It is not the kind of borrowing that the banks practised in 1893 anyhow.

Senator CLEMONS.—We are not dealing with that question, but with this prominent plank in the platform of the Labour Party. Are they not ridiculously inconsistent when they talk about restricting public borrowing, while they intend to borrow millions from the banks? Or do they not stand absolutely exposed before the people as being anxious for confiscation? Which of the two is it? It must be either one or the other, for there is no alternative.

Senator DAWSON.—Oh, yes, there is.

Senator CLEMONS.—I should be very glad to hear what it is.

Senator DAWSON.—It is the density of the men on the other side.

Senator CLEMONS.—I am very pleased that we have cleared up that little point. I wish to explain why I am sitting on this side, and why, generally speaking, I am against honorable senators on the other side. I have already indicated that if I have any ambition it is to realize as fully as I can the idea of a Liberal. I intend to support the present Administration because I believe that it is a Liberal Government. And not being a member of a caucus, I intend not to support the Government if ever I find that it is attempting legislatively to do anything which I consider is not liberal. I do not contemplate that contingency arising, but not being a member of a caucus, and being a member of a party which supports the Government, because we believe in its principles, I, to a certain extent, am independent. I regard Liberalism first of all as essentially a political creed of expansion. The main object of every Liberal is to adapt himself to our always changing environment. Another feature of Liberalism, is that it holds out hope to everybody. It is full of hope, not to one class, but to every class. The chief merit of Liberalism is that it is ever expanding. But the creed of my honorable friends opposite means a retrogression towards notions which were exploded years ago. It is also to me a cheerless creed, because it destroys hope to the individual.

Senator PEARCE.—We can get up a lot of enthusiasm anyhow.

Senator CLEMONS.—In their misguided way my honorable friends can. It presents itself to me as a creed which destroys hope. It is also an endeavour to make political men mere peas in the same political pod. It is because I hold these views that I am forced to oppose my honorable friends on the other side, and I am glad to stand on this side, where I believe Liberal principles will have full play.

Senator DE LARGIE (Western Australia).—I notice that the last two speakers from the other side prefaced their speeches with a lecturette on bad taste. I do not know why honorable senators on this side should be continually lectured on that subject, because this debate, so far as it has gone, has shown that there is quite as much room for improvement on the other side as on this side. During this debate, we have had references made to honorable senators on this side, and even challenges thrown out to "come outside," with the very liberal saving clause, "if I were only younger."

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—There has not been a word of personality uttered on this side in this debate.

Senator DE LARGIE.—There has. Although an honorable senator on the other side used the words, "absolutely false," in reply to an interjection by Senator Henderson, which, I think, was absolutely correct, still it is only honorable senators on this side who have to be lectured on their bad taste. I do not know that any one of us has ever posed as a model of good behaviour.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Hear, hear.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I feel quite sure that we shall not take as our model the honorable senator, because all he can do is to lecture.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—God forbid that I should take the honorable senator as a model.

Senator DE LARGIE. — I am afraid that the honorable senator is a very poor practiser. He has not given any signs of ability to teach, but he is always very ready to lecture.

Senator PEARCE.—He always kept the State Legislative Council in order.

The PRESIDENT.—Order! I must ask honorable senators not to make so many interjections.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not desire to create any ill-feeling, but merely to point out that there is quite as much need for honorable senators on the other side to see to their behaviour. We are all more or less tempted to be personal at certain times, but I think that when our attention is called to our remarks, we can modify our language and express our views strongly enough without hurting the feelings of any one. I avail myself of this opportunity to discuss the policy of the Government. At this moment it is somewhat hard to say what it is.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is pretty plain.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The speech of the Attorney-General did not contain very much information about the policy of the Government, but the remarks made outside Parliament indicate what it really is. If it is a policy of one thing more than another, it is a policy of anti-Socialism. Time and again the Prime Minister is reported to have said that the policy of the Government and the cause of its existence is to fight Socialism. I hope that we shall have that straight-out issue placed before the country. There can be no doubt that, sooner or later, it must be remitted to the electors, and the Labour Party are very anxious that they shall be asked to vote on Socialism versus anti-Socialism. There is no indication, however, at the present time that, in their legislation, the Government intend to be anti-Socialistic. But I hope that their proposals will bear that hall-mark. I hope that the new Postmaster-General will attempt to repeal the provision which provides for the employment of white labour on our mail boats. And I trust that when he is finished with that little job he will attempt to anti-Socialize the Post Office, because there was a time when it was run by private enterprise.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Not in Australia.

Senator DE LARGIE.—No; in England. Let the Government show that they have the courage of their convictions by proposing to hand over the Post Office to private enterprise. And when that is done perhaps our attention may be directed to the removal of all kinds of bonuses.

Senator DOBSON.—Does the honorable senator think that the control of the Post Office is really at issue between the two parties?

Senator DE LARGIE.—It is for the honorable and learned senator to say what anti-Socialism is. If he is a Christian Socialist, as he has said, he cannot support this Government.

Senator DOBSON.—No Government would suggest such a thing as having anti-Socialism in connexion with the Post Office.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I wish the Government to give their definition of what anti-Socialism is. I know what the honorable and learned senator's definition is, because he has said that he is a Christian Socialist. If he subscribes to that policy he must sooner or later find himself within the ranks of the Labour Party. I also hope that the new Minister of Trade and Customs will give the gentlemen in Flinders-lane a free hand to practise the form of private enterprise which was so much in vogue before Mr. Kingston took charge of the Department. I hope that he will have the Customs duties farmed out in such a way that the private enterpriser will be able to work his own sweet will again in that direction.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Does the honorable senator really hope that?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I hope that the Attorney-General will give them an opportunity.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Oh, no.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I hope that the honorable and learned senator will bring forward measures which will give us an opportunity to resist the Government's policy of anti-Socialism. I also hope that the new Minister of Trade and Customs will give a free hand to the butter enterprisers—Bartram and Co., Dunn and Co. I hope that the control of private enterprise will be again restored to these firms. If I were a private enterpriser I should object very much to the policy of the Government as announced. The private enterprise of the butter-bonus agents is quite as important as private enterprise in other branches of industry. A significant feature is that neither the Prime Minister nor the Minister of Trade and Customs has referred to Old-Age Pensions, but it has been hinted by the Attorney-General that some consideration is to be given to that subject. I do not take that to be anti-Socialism.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Does the honorable senator think that the Government are in earnest?

Senator DE LARGIE.—Whether they are in earnest or not, I suppose we shall hear something about the subject from them. I wish also to say a few words in reference to compulsory arbitration, especially in reply to the remarks made by Senator Gray. I am pleased that we are to have an opportunity to consider the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. I thought that, considering the attitude of the Government upon this question, they would have dropped that measure. But they have gone on with it in opposition to their proclaimed political principles.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator's leader dropped it.

Senator DAWSON.—Our party did not drop it, but said that they washed their hands of it.

Senator DE LARGIE.—That is a distinction without a difference. Senator Gray said that the English trade unionists were opposed to the principle of compulsory arbitration, and he seemed to think that that is a reason why we should follow their example. But he ought to know that there are many great principles with regard to which we differ from the leaders of the English trade unionists. The fiscal question is a case in point. The majority of the trade unionists and of the working classes in England are in favour of free-trade. I dare say that if I were in Scotland again I also should be opposed to any duties upon the food of the people. The situation is altogether different in Australia. While I might be a free-trader in the old country, I am a protectionist here, and I believe that the majority of the workers of Australia are also protectionists. We must especially bear in mind that there are good and sufficient reasons why the trade unionists in England are opposed to compulsory arbitration. Those reasons are well known to those who have lived in England, and who are aware of the prejudice against trade unionists whenever they go into a Law Court. If the workers of Australia were in the same predicament as are the English trade unionists, they also might be opposed to compulsory arbitration. Professor Thorold Rogers, in his well known work, Six Centuries of Work and Wages, a book that for historical research may very well be described as one of the great historical classics, written by a man who is an acknowledged authority on the subject, gives good reasons for the prejudice which exists in the minds of English working people against the Law Courts. He points out that the English working classes have had centuries of compulsory arbitration. Compulsory arbitration laws were in force in England from about the middle of the sixteenth century, right up to the beginning of the nineteenth century. During the whole of that time those laws were, in their administration, utterly unfavorable to the workers. It is no wonder, therefore, that to-day they are suspicious about having anything to do with the Law Courts.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator is referring to compulsory wage laws.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It was compulsory arbitration in the worst form. The workers were not admitted into the Courts to which their employers had access. The employers had the fixing of the wages, with the assistance of their friends in the Courts, and the workers were never allowed to enter the Court to say a word in their own behalf.

Senator PEARCE.—Then it was no arbitration.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It was compulsory arbitration with all the compulsion on one side. The Courts enforced their powers in as drastic a manner as could be. It is because of that lingering prejudice against the Judges that the workers in England are opposed to putting into the hand of any Judge the fixing of their rates of wages.

Senator GRAY.—They do not give that reason themselves.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I beg the honorable senator's pardon; that is the reason they invariably give.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—These are old and obsolete laws.

Senator DE LARGIE.—But, unfortunately, the prejudice still exists—perhaps not to the same extent as in by-gone days.

Senator DOBSON.—The reason given by the English trade unionists for opposing compulsory arbitration is that they do not wish to give up the power to strike.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Because they have not sufficient confidence in the Courts. But the honorable and learned senator must not imagine that the English working man is so much in love with so barbarous a method as a strike that he will not give it up if he can get something better.

Senator DOBSON.—They say that compulsory arbitration is not better.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Let me quote from Professor Thorold Rogers' book, in order to show what I mean. On page 398, of Volume II., he says:—

I contend that from 1563 to 1824 a conspiracy, concocted by the law, and carried out by parties interested in its success, was entered into to cheat the English workman of his wages, to tie him to the soil, to deprive him of hope, and to degrade him into irremediable poverty. In a subsequent chapter, I shall dwell on the palliatives which were adopted in order to mitigate the worst and most intolerable burdens of his life—palliatives which were rendered necessary by no fault of his, but by the deliberate malignity of Governments and Parliaments. For more than two centuries and a half, the English law, and those who administered the law, were engaged in grinding the English workman down to the lowest pittance, in stamping out every expression or act which indicated any organized discontent, and in multiplying penalties upon him when he thought of his natural rights. I am not deceived by the hypocrisy which the preamble of an Act of Parliament habitually contains, and the assertions which are as habitually contradicted by the details of the measure.

Senator GRAY.—That was class domination.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Yes, with a vengeance! Those are not the words of a labour man or of a trade union leader, although I suppose that the working classes in England never had a better friend than Professor Thorold Rogers. He was no paid agitator, but the Professor of Political Economy in Oxford University. These are the conclusions which he came to after a lifelong study of industrial affairs. There is another sentence from his book which I will quote. He says at page 507—

But from the days of the Stuarts, the judges were servile, timid, and the enemies of personal liberty. Over and over again Parliament has interposed to sweep away precedents which have coerced natural liberty, and interpretations which have violated justice. For generations it seems that the worst enemies of public and private liberty were those courts whose duty it was to adjudicate equitably, and to state the law with fairness.

Further on, at page 508, he says—

For nearly five centuries law after law had been passed under which the workman's wages had been regulated, for the reputed advantage of their employers.

Lower down he speaks of—

The ingenuity of the judges, always interested in the defence of property and very little friendly to that of liberty.

I dare say that no stronger indictment has ever been made against Judges than is contained in this book against the Judges of the English Law Courts.

Senator DOBSON.—Does he give any evidence that such a state of things existed?

Senator DE LARGIE.—The two volumes are crowded with evidence. I should advise my honorable and learned friend to read this book. He will get from it far more of the real history of England than he could get from a dozen of the ordinary historical novels which contain accounts of the lives of Kings and Queens and descriptions of battles. In Professor Thorold Rogers' work we have the real kernel of the history of the English people. In the face of these facts no one need be astonished that the workers of England are opposed to compulsory arbitration, because there is no getting away from the fact that the workers are still hopelessly in a minority in the English Parliament, and cannot therefore expect that any compulsory arbitration laws would be framed and administered in their interests. In one House, the House of Lords, they are totally unrepresented, whilst in the House of Commons, out of nearly 700 members, there are only about a score who can be said to be in any degree representative of labour. Until such time as the English working classes are able to make their political power felt in Parliament I believe they will continue to be opposed to compulsory arbitration. It is altogether different in Australia, where the workers have political power, where they exercise it, and where they are in a position to secure justice, and to see that the Judges who are appointed are fit for their positions.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator surely does not say that the Judges in England are not fit to deal with these matters?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not think it needs any testimony of mine. If the honorable and learned senator will read Professor Thorold Rogers' book, he will get a better idea than any words of mine could give.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator does not say that the Judges of England are not impartial?

Senator DE LARGIE.—It was my experience when I lived in the West of Scotland, that the moment a man was described in Court as a trade unionist, there was a prejudice against him, and justice was to some extent denied to him. If the same state of things prevails throughout the length and breadth of England, I do not wonder that there is such opposition to compulsory arbitration.

Senator DRAKE.—The state of things which the honorable senator has described applies only to a period—from the time of Charles II.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It applies from 1568 to 1824—extending over some hundreds of years.

Senator DOBSON.—The book is of no use, unless it deals with matters later than 1824.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I should now like to turn to the anti-socialistic part of my remarks, and to leave the subject of compulsory arbitration for another occasion. I shall be able, perhaps, to deal more thoroughly with it when the Bill is before us. As the members of the Government have not taken the opportunity to discuss their anti-Socialism, I am obliged to criticise the remarks of some of their supporters. The leaders of the Government have kept clear of that very touchy subject. I should have thought that those who were opposed to Socialism would have wished to point out what, in their opinion, is bad about it. But we have had mere general statements against it. Senator Dobson has spoken of "the wicked ideas" of the Labour Party. Of course, we know that he used those words in an economic sense.

Senator DOBSON.—How often have I said that the word "wicked" was applied to Mr. Tom Mann's idea of taxing people out of their property? The honorable senator's ideas of Socialism are simply wrong, not wicked, any more than mine are.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I am using Senator Dobson's exact words, as reported. He spoke of the "wicked ideas of the Labour Party."

Senator DOBSON.—It is not wicked to suggest a remedy that is wrong; it is wicked to suggest a remedy that is unjust.

Senator DE LARGIE.—It is for Senator Dobson to say what he means; I am taking the words which he used. It is only right that we should criticise these general condemnations of Socialism. We contend that the present system is wasteful and cruel. It is cruel to the most useful section of the community who are the greatest wealth producers; and it is also unjust. Holding these views, as we do, and aiming at the removal of the injustices due to the present system, when we put forward our case it should receive impartial consideration instead of general abuse. Misrepresentation and abuse will not do our cause much harm. We have been subjected to that kind of thing for a very long time, but it has not prevented the progress of our cause. We at present form the only political party in Australia that is increasing in numbers. The supporters of our party are spreading outside the ordinary ranks of labour. Hitherto it was understood that we could count upon support for the Labour Party only from manual workers and the trade unionists of the community, but the last election showed that there are to-day a very great many supporters of the Labour Party who cannot be included amongst the ordinary trade unionists in the community. Honorable senators opposite who, for want of a case, abuse the other side, are playing a losing game. If they were wise in their generation, believing our principles to be wicked, they should expose them, and show in what way they are wicked. If they did that they might indulge some hope of augmenting their numbers, but merely to say that our principles are wicked will not add to their numbers in any way. We have given every opportunity for the discussion of our principles in this Chamber. The principles of the Labour Party have been published broadcast throughout the Commonwealth. The representatives of the press are admitted to our annual conferences, and give reports of their proceedings. When the work of the conference has been completed, and the platform has been framed, it is published throughout the land. On the election platform in every State we advocate the same principles. At the late Federal elections the same principles were being advocated by labour candidates in Western Australia, in Northern Queensland, and throughout all the States of the Commonwealth, at the same time. Two of the most important planks in our platform have relation to the nationalization of the tobacco and iron industries, and when the elections were concluded we took the earliest opportunity to place motions dealing with those subjects on the business paper of the Senate, and to have them discussed. I am pleased to say that they were not only discussed, but were carried by majorities in the Senate. This should show that we do not try to burk discussion, or to hide our real opinions. On the contrary, we avail ourselves of every opportunity to have light thrown upon them, and if our opponents are able to refute our arguments they at least have every opportunity to do so.

Senator DAWSON.—When they had the chance they could not do it.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Senator Dawson reminds me that when the two motions to which I have referred were being discussed there was very little opposition to them. Nothing has surprised me more than to find that honorable senators, who are so violent outside this Chamber in their opposition to Socialism, exhibit very little of that opposition inside its walls. Their courage appeared to "ooze out at their fingers' ends" when they had to meet the arguments of Senator Pearce on the motion for the nationalization of the tobacco industry, and my own arguments in support of the nationalization of the iron industry.

Senator PULSFORD.—This is very poor stuff.

Senator DE LARGIE.—The honorable senator is aware that what I am saying is true. He was one of the silent senators on the occasion to which I refer, and did not avail himself of the opportunity to refute the cases we submitted. Let us see what prospect is held out to us by the continuance of the system which honorable senators opposite desire to maintain. What prospect does it offer for enlarging the avenues of employment in this country? If the motion which I submitted in connexion with the iron industry were given effect to, it would find employment for a large number of people. That can only be done by the nationalization of the industry. We were able to prove that it could be effected without injury to any individual or to any interest, vested or otherwise. We were able to show that if the iron industry were established as a national undertaking, it would be the means of establishing other branches of industry, because one result would be that manufacturers would be enabled to obtain the raw material they require at a cheaper rate than they can procure it at the present time. Notwithstanding all this, honorable senators opposite appear to be as far as ever from being convinced of the benefits of Socialism. The only prospect which they hold out to us for the establishment of industries in the future is outlined in the free-trade essays of the present Prime Minister, from which I propose to quote. This is what the right honorable gentleman writes, with respect to the time at which industries are to be established in Australia, and the crop of misery we are to reap at the same time—

The PRESIDENT.—Is the honorable senator proposing to quote from a debate of the present session?

Senator DE LARGIE.—No, from prize essays written by the present Prime Minister, and published many years ago. The quotation I propose to make reads as follows :—

Raw material we possess in abundance. Machinery, skill, and experience can be bought, but it is the high wages and short hours of the workmen of Australia which checks the colonial capitalist who would become a manufacturer. The protectionist declaiming to the electors of Victoria from the hustings, beseeches them to provide employment for their children, but the secret prayer of the capitalist is: Reduce wages and increase the hours of labour. Give him labour at English rates, and willing to work English hours, and he will soon compete with the pauper labour of Europe. But so long as Australian labour remains at its present rates, which, all things considered, are higher than those in any other part of the world, and so long as eight hours for work, eight hours for recreation, and eight hours for sleep is the maxim of our labour councils, the capitalists know that the idea of a great colonial manufacturing interest—in the sense in which that of England or France or Belgium is great—is an idle and extravagant dream.

What prospect does the right honorable gentleman hold out for the establishment of industries in Australia? Honorable senators who oppose the common-sense practical proposals placed before them by the Labour Party see no prospect but this for the establishment of industries.

Senator PULSFORD.—Can the honorable senator give the date of his quotations?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I believe that what I have read was written many years ago.

Senator PULSFORD.—Twenty-five years ago, probably.

Senator DAWSON.—Have the views of the Prime Minister changed?

Senator PULSFORD.—The population of Australia has changed wonderfully.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Unfortunately for the honorable senator's argument, the population of Australia has not changed wonderfully. I can give Senator Pulsford a more recent quotation from remarks made by the present Prime Minister, when speaking on a want of confidence motion, in another place, during the existence of the late Parliament. This is the prospect which the right honorable gentleman then held out to the workers of Australia—

In the plenitude of time when our millions become tens of millions, we shall have a crop of misery which will solve the difficulty in regard to cheap manufactures.

What a beautiful prospect there will be for workers in the future, if the private enterprise principles of the present Government are given effect to! In the future, when we have ten millions of starving people in Australia, we shall have our industries established.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Ten millions?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I am quoting the words of the present Prime Minister. The right honorable gentleman speaks of the plenitude of time when our millions shall have become tens of millions of starving people, and he says that the problem as to how we are going to establish industries will then be solved. Under private enterprise we are to have none of these industries established until we are in a position of beggary and misery. I do not believe that the workers of Australia will wait so long for so poor a reward. We know what private enterprise has brought to every country in the world. Whether we consider England or any part of the continent of Europe we find the same desolate state of affairs in them all. We have it on the authority of no less a statesman than Mr. Campbell-Bannerman that at the present time there are no less than 12,000,000 of starving people in the United Kingdom.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—Mr. Campbell-Bannerman denied that he said that.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not know whether he denied it or not, but one thing is sure, and that is that the statistics from which he quoted are in black and white. The statistics are to be found in Rowntree's work on the city of York, and Booth's work on the city of London, and whether Mr. Campbell-Bannerman denied them or not his words remain true.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—The honorable senator has not given a fair quotation of what Mr. Campbell-Bannerman said.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Senator Zeal will be able to see later whether I have misquoted Mr. Campbell-Bannerman or not. The words of the late Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Right Honorable Joseph Chamberlain, should carry some weight in present-day politics, because his is one of the most active minds in the public life of the old country. This is what he says of the present position of affairs in England. I quote from page 24 of a work by Robert Blatchford, entitled Britain for the British—

The rights of property have been so much extended that the rights of the community have almost altogether disappeared, and it is hardly too much to say that the prosperity and the comfort and the liberty of a great proportion of the population have been laid at the feet of a small number of proprietors, who "neither toil nor spin."

Senator DRAKE.—What is the date of that speech?

Senator DE LARGIE. — The book in which it appears was published in 1902, but the date of the speech is not given. Mr. Chamberlain also said—

For my part neither sneers nor abuse nor opposition shall induce me to accept as the will of the Almighty, and the unalterable dispensation of His providence, a state of things under which millions lead sordid, hopeless lives without pleasure in the present, and without prospect for the future.

Senator PULSFORD.—Hear, hear; we can all say that.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Mr. Chamberlain also said—

The ordinary conditions of life among a large proportion of the population are such that common decency is absolutely impossible; and all this goes on in sight of the mansions of the rich, where undoubtedly there are people who would gladly remedy it if they could. It goes on in the presence of wasteful extravagance and luxury, which bring but little pleasure to those who indulge in them; and private charity is powerless, religious organizations can do nothing to remedy the evils which are so deep-seated in our social system.

The policy of honorable senators opposite would but bring about a similar state of affairs in this young country. When we are told that we are wicked in submitting proposals which would prevent such a state of affairs, honorable senators who hold that view should try to understand what Socialism is, and what it is not. Here is a quotation taken from a leading article appearing in a recent issue of a Glasgow single-tax newspaper—

Some may be disappointed and dismayed at the fact that more than fifty years after the repeal of the Corn Laws, and just as we are about to celebrate Cobden's centenary we are face to face with a determined attempt to reverse the enlightened policy that Cobden championed. They may be disconcerted to find that even under a system of free imports of food some 30 per cent. of our people are chronically underfed. This, Mr. Chas. Booth tells us is the case in London; this Mr. Rowntree tells us is the case in York; while Sir John Gorst, ex-Minister for Education in the present Government, stated, in an interview published in the Daily News, that some months ago two doctors examined 300 children from the public schools of Edinburgh and Aberdeen, and of these children they found that 17 per cent. were diseased, 30 per cent. of them being diseased because they were unfed.

That is the state of affairs existing in the England and Scotland of to-day. That is a condition of affairs which we desire to avoid in this fair young land of ours. I have no doubt that, so long as we have in operation the system of private enterprise, the same results will follow from it as have attended its operations in the past. No doubt compulsory arbitration, anti-sweating laws, and such legislation may do much to remedy the evils of the system, but they can never wholly remove them. What we desire is not to apply a little ointment to ease the sore, but to cut it clean out of the body politic, that we may have a healthy state of public affairs. How is it that in a country like Great Britain such a state of affairs as is pictured in the quotations I have made can exist? Is it because the country is poor? Every one will admit that Britain is one of the richest countries on the face of God's earth. There is wealth there in abundance, storehouses and granaries are overflowing with wealth of every description.

Senator FRASER.—The result of private enterprise.

Senator DE LARGIE.—And prevented from being used by private enterprise. Great as is the amount of production under private enterprise, it would be still greater under the co-operation represented by State Socialism. The secret of the whole matter is that, while under the present system the production is all right, the consumption is all wrong. Private enterprise produces for profit, and, while I do not blame individuals, I blame the system, which is what we desire to alter. Production for profit is the kernel of the whole problem, and the desire of the Socialists is to produce for use, so that when there is an abundance it may be consumed, and thus create further demand and employment. At present when workers are industrious and produce in abundance they are only preparing a time of starvation for themselves. As they fill the granaries and warehouses, there looms ahead a time of unemployment and starvation—as in England, for example, of 12,000,000 people—as the result of over-production, or rather of under-consumption. I wish to take this opportunity to contradict a few of the charges commonly brought against the principle of Socialism. I do not know that any honorable senators are guilty of using the argument that Socialism means confiscation.

Senator MCGREGOR. — Senator Dobson does.

Senator DE LARGIE.—At all events the charge has no foundation. Senator Dobson lectured the good dames of Toorak and Caulfield on the wicked ideas and proposals of the Labour Party. It will be remembered that when Senator Pearce introduced his motion to nationalize the tobacco industry, neither he nor those who supported him mentioned the word "confiscation" from beginning to end of the debate. Senator Pearce showed that a certain amount of money would have to be provided to buy up plant and property, because there was no desire to destroy vested interests without paying 20s. in the £1.

Senator FRASER.—But how are we to provide the 20s. in the £1?

Senator DE LARGIE.—If the honorable senator had listened to the debate, or if he takes the trouble to consult Hansard, he may ascertain how it is proposed to raise the money.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—It is proposed to take the money from the banks.

Senator DE LARGIE.—And I do not know that we should be doing wrong in taking the necessary money from the banks, in the strong-rooms of which at the present time many millions are lying absolutely idle, and of no use.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—The honorable senator does not know anything about the matter.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I am willing to sit at the feet of the honorable senator.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—At any rate, I know more about banking than does the honorable senator.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I never said anything to the contrary; and if the honorable senator can throw any light on the subject, I am not too proud to learn.

Senator PULSFORD.—Is money doing nothing when it acts as a guarantee?

Senator DE LARGIE.—The money could be used and a guarantee given. In reply to Senator Clemons, I may say that there is no desire to injure any one in using money at present lying idle. In 1893 the States Governments had to stand behind the banks with a guarantee, and surely in return the people have a right to some reward, more especially, when no harm can follow. Dr. Parkyn, a Canadian gentleman, was in Australia some time ago in connexion with the Rhodes Scholarships, and I had a long chat with him in Western Australia on the matter of the Canadian Banking Law. Dr. Parkyn assured me that there was no law of which he knew in Canada, that had given such general satisfaction.

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. — Many people rob other people with great satisfaction.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I can see no robbery or ill-doing in using money that would otherwise be idle. Dr. Parkyn informed me that the Canadian Banking Law had been in operation for something like thirty years, and had given unqualified satisfaction to all concerned; and, in reply to a question from me, he added that there was no likelihood of any attempt to repeal the measure. I am sure honorable senators will admit that no Australian Socialist has ever advocated anything in the nature of confiscation. But it is said that confiscation is advocated by Socialists of other countries. What have we to do with what is advocated by people in other countries? Surely our load of crime is heavy enough without being called upon to answer for others? No Socialist, parliamentary representative, or political organization connected with the workers, has ever proposed anything in the nature of confiscation, and in my opinion there is just as little ground for saying that there is advocacy of the kind by Socialists of standing in any part of the world. I have here a pamphlet by one of the foremost writers on political economy from the socialistic stand-point—Karl Kautsky. In that pamphlet it is shown that confiscation is no part of the policy of Socialism, and I shall give honorable senators the benefit of Kautsky's words as follows:—

The enemies of Socialism, who, to hear them talk, one would imagine know better than the Socialists themselves what these are after, and who assume to forecast the Socialist Republic with greater accuracy than Socialists do, also declare that Socialism can never come into power except through a wholesale confiscation of property, including the furniture and the small savings of the industrious poor. Next to the charge of contemplating the "abolition" of the family, this one of "confiscation" is a favorite one with the mouth-pieces of capitalism. Confiscation is not at all essential to Socialist society.

It will be seen that there is just as little authority to say that the continental Socialist is in favour of confiscation as there is for the similar charge against the Australian Socialist. Another favorite old "chestnut" advanced against Australian Socialism—though the charge has lost its sting—is that of advocating free love. I should say that this particular charge has been dropped more readily in Melbourne than elsewhere, because we find Mr. Walpole, the mouth-piece of the Employers' Federation, placed on record as having held that it is unreasonable for workers to think that capitalists should pay wages high enough to provide workers with the luxuries of wives and children. If there is one public man in Australia against whom it can be urged that he has advocated something in the nature of free love it is Mr. Walpole, the paid agitator of the Employers' Federation, because he regards marriage as a luxury. His statement is that capitalists cannot afford to pay wages high enough to enable the workers to marry; and if they cannot marry they do something else. The present commercial system is the greatest encourager of free love possible.

Senator DRAKE.—Has the honorable senator the exact words used by Mr. Walpole?

Senator DE LARGIE.—No; but the sense of the words are burned into the minds of every man in Australia, and it will take some time for the Employers' Federation to remove the impression. Here is a quotation from another pamphlet by Carl Kautsky, entitled The Working Class:—

Hand in hand with the accusation on the subject of the family bonds goes the accusation that Socialists aim at a community of wives. This charge is as false as the other. Socialists, on the contrary, maintain that just the reverse of a community in wives, and all sexual oppression and licence, to wit, ideal love, will be the foundation of matrimonial connexions in a Socialist Commonwealth, and that pure love can only prevail in such a social system. What, on the other hand, do we see to-day? The irrational system of modern production tears the sexes apart. It builds up she-towns in New England, and he-towns in the mining districts of Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, and the farther West, thereby directly promoting and inciting prostitution as a natural and inevitable result.

I think those remarks apply very directly to the condition of affairs in Australia. In Victoria we see the same results, and Melbourne is what may be described as a "she town," whereas in Western Australia we find "he towns" just as depicted in America. Kautsky proceeds:—

Furthermore, helpless women, forced to earn their living in the factories, shops, and mines, fall a prey to capitalist cupidity; the capitalist takes advantage of their inexperience, offers them wages too slight for their support, and hints at, or even brazenly refers them to, prostitution as a means of supplementing their income.

I think we had a controversy in the press some time ago on this very subject.

Everywhere the increase of female labour in industry is accompanied by an increase of prostitution. In the modern State, where Christianity is preached, and pioussness is at a premium, many a "thriving" branch of industry is found, whose working women are paid so poorly that they would be compelled to starve unless they prostituted themselves; and, wonderful to say, in such instances the capitalist will ever be heard to protest that these small wages are indispensable to enable him to compete successfully in the market, and to maintain his establishment in a "thriving" condition. Prostitution is as old as the contrast between rich and poor. At one time, however, prostitutes constituted a middle-class between beggars and thieves; they were then an article of luxury which society indulged in, but the loss of which would in no way have endangered its existence. To-day, however, it is no longer the females of the slums alone, but working women, who are compelled to sell their bodies for money. This latter sale is no longer simply a matter of luxury; it has become one of the foundations upon which production is carried on. Under the capitalist system of production, prostitution becomes a pillar of society. What the defenders of this social system falsely charge Socialists with, is the very thing they are guilty of themselves: community of wives is a feature of capitalism. Indeed, such deep roots has this system of community of wives cast in modern society that its representatives agree in declaring prostitution to be a necessary thing.

A la Walpole—

They cannot understand that the abolition of the proletariat implies the abolition of prostitution. So deep are they sunk in intellectual stagnation that they cannot conceive a social system without community of wives.

But, be it noted, community of wives has ever been an invention of the upper layers of society, never of the proletariat. The community of wives is one of the modes of exploiting the proletariat; it is not Socialism; it is the exact opposite of Socialism.

I think that is sufficient to prove that there is just as little truth in the charge of advocating free love as there is in the charge of advocating confiscation. A third argument against the Labour Party is that we promote class hatred. We are told that our paid agitators stir up strife, where previously there has been peace between employers and employes; but as to a charge of that kind, I find that Senator Dobson lays himself open to be accused. At Caulfield, only last month, he was reported to have said—

... a fight between class and class was coming, and it would be suicidal folly if organization was not pushed on. It would be necessary at election time to combine with the Employers' Federation and Reform League in the selection of candidates.

To combine with Walpole, for instance—

It was going to be all classes against the Labour Party.

Senator GRAY.—Did not Senator Dobson say he was not against labour, but against the Labour-caucus-Party?

Senator DE LARGIE.—I am sorry I cannot enlighten the honorable senator on the point.

Senator GRAY.—Senator Dobson has stated over and over again in this Chamber that he is not against labour, and Senator de Largie ought to accept his word.

Senator DE LARGIE.—I do not know exactly what Senator Dobson did state—he says so many things which are hard to believe; but I have yet to learn that he did not make use of the words I have quoted.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Senator Dobson said that the Labour Party are “most dangerous men.”

Senator Sir WILLIAM ZEAL.—So they are.

Senator DE LARGIE.—And the honorable senator is a perfect gentleman! So far as Australia is concerned, I am quite satisfied that in Socialism there will be no turning back; we have gone on the track too far. We have in our public institutions too many demonstrated proofs that Socialism is for the advantage of the country, and I have very little fear of this new-born anti-Socialistic agitation. The agitation will fail, and Socialism will go on extending until, at all events, the Socialism advocated by the Labour Party in the near future is an accomplished fact. I believe that honorable senators who now oppose the Labour Party will, before many years are over, be forced by circumstances to adopt and pass into law the ideas advocated to-day by that party. Senator Clemons said he had learned from the Labour Party in certain directions, and I hope and believe that he will go on learning, and be further influenced by their ideas. Compulsory arbitration, old-age pensions, and other humane legislation will extend instead of diminishing. We are, I believe, in this class of legislation, the most advanced people on the earth to-day; I know of no country in the world with such fine codes of social law as are found in Australia and New Zealand. But we have not got to the end of our tether; and I am sure that any Government which may be in power in the future will, by necessity, be forced to pass the legislation which is to-day advocated by the Labour Party.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I wish to make a few remarks on some phases of the policy of the Government as recently enunciated, and particularly to address myself to the announcement with regard to old-age pensions. I regret that at this very early stage of their existence, the Government should have acted in a manner which appears to me to be, to say the least, wanting in courtesy—I might almost say wanting in candour. Certainly, it was ungenerous for the Government to adopt the policy of the Senate without acknowledgment. When an author copies something from another source he is called by an ugly name if he does not acknowledge the source of his inspiration. However, I do not intend to use any ugly names, but merely to make a passing observation. I find that the Government tell us that their policy of negotiation with the State Governments is the only possible policy. If that is the case, why not acknowledge that that policy was enunciated by a unanimous vote of the Senate in September, 1903?

Senator FRASER.—No Government ever took it up, though.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I cannot say that, because the then Prime Minister, Sir Edmund Barton, told me that he was going to act at once on the resolution of the Senate.

Senator FRASER.—It was never acted on, nevertheless.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The honorable senator perhaps possesses Ministerial secrets which are not in my keeping. I cannot say what the Government did.

Senator FRASER.—It is a matter of public notoriety.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I really do not see the appositeness of the observation. On the 2nd September, 1903, I submitted the following motion:—

1. That in the opinion of this Senate it is desirable that a system of old-age pensions be established by and throughout the Commonwealth.

2. That the Government of the Commonwealth be requested to enter into negotiations with the Governments of the States constituting the Commonwealth, with a view to giving effect to the foregoing proposal.

The representative of the Government—Senator Drake—spoke in support of the motion; it was briefly spoken to by various honorable senators, and unanimously adopted. Subsequently Sir Edmund Barton, the Prime Minister, told me that he would certainly at once act on the resolution. Whether he communicated with the Governments of the States or not, I do not know. Senator Fraser says that he did not. We know that he remained in office a very short time after that date.

Senator FRASER.—I did not say that; I only said that there was no public notice that he did.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—No; though there might have been some private action taken. It would have been only courteous to the Chamber for the Government to acknowledge the source of the inspiration of this item of their policy.

Senator GRAY.—Do Governments ever do that?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I think so. Possibly it was through an oversight that it was not done. But I think I am justified in mentioning the matter without any more than an expression of regret that the action of the Senate was not recognised in this important detail. Another matter has been mentioned, and that is the appointment of a High Commissioner. I am very happy to be able to entirely agree with the intention of the Government to take no action in the making of what, to my view, would be at the present time an expensive and needless appointment. If the Agents-General are got rid of, or transposed into general agents, there might be scope for some work for a High Commissioner, provided that the States required his assistance.

Senator FRASER.—There should be only one representative, as in the case of Canada.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I am quite in accord with my honorable friend's view. But if we appoint a High Commissioner we cannot compel the States to make use of his services. Until they are willing to utilize his services we have no need, I think, to make such an expensive and unnecessary appointment. It is proposed to spend a considerable sum on the survey of a route for a transcontinental railway. It seems to me that that proposition is uncommonly like the action of a man who engages the services of an architect to design a house when he does not know whether he intends to build, and when he has not the money to build. Until there is an alteration in the policy of this Parliament on the subject of borrowing it is quite useless for us to be spending money on a survey for a railway that we have not the money to build. We cannot build the line out of revenue, because it is estimated to cost £5,000,000, and unless the policy of this Parliament is changed we cannot borrow. I believe that in New South Wales there must have been spent at least £500,000 on surveys for railways which have not been built. I am sure that I am within the mark when I say that that immense sum has been wasted on useless surveys which were undertaken merely to placate somebody.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Mr. O'Sullivan did not do it all, then?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—No; it has been done by all sorts of Ministries and all sorts of Ministers during the last thirty years. I do not wish to see a similar course initiated here. If we have made up our minds to build this railway, if it can be constructed at a reasonable cost, then get a survey made, but do not get it made if nothing else is to follow. There are many points in connexion with the proposed railway. One point is that it is required for the purpose of defence. Surely we might, in the meantime, mount the gun which is lying somewhere about Fremantle? I read the other day that the folks at Fremantle do not want the gun, because they are afraid that if it were fired the windows in the town would be broken. It does not seem to me to be a very wise act to build a railway at a cost of millions to defend a place in which even a gun is not wanted. There was a deputation from the Chamber of Commerce about the gun, or the position of the fort. The General Officer Commanding has told us in two reports that there are no troops to take the field, and that we have no equipment for any field force. He has told us plainly that it is of no use to make this railway for defence purposes unless we have the troops to send by it. These are all propositions that have to be considered. Another question is, are we going to make a survey through the territory of a State which we are given to understand is opposed to the construction of the railway? I do not wish to be a party to blocking any useful public work, but I certainly must see that we intend to do something more than make a survey just to placate some State. If it is to be a bonâ fide railway construction, that is one thing, but if it is to be merely a survey to compensate for the loss of a portfolio in the Cabinet, then I do not believe in it. I did not intend to speak for many minutes; but there is one matter that I must mention before I sit down. The other afternoon, Senator Styles, apparently for the purpose of making an attack on the Prime Minister, dragged in my name, and I did not know anything about his reference to me until my attention was drawn to it at luncheon to-day. I do not think that he intended to do me any injury.

Senator STYLES.—Certainly not.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I accept the honorable gentleman's assurance. I shall not refer to the matter at sufficient length even to quote the passages, but they appear in Hansard, and I think that it is incumbent upon me to make a few observations. If Mr. George Reid in 1896 did anything which was deemed unsatisfactory that is his business. I do not stand here as his apologist; he can apologize for himself and fight his own battle. In making his quotations, Senator Styles overlooked, unintentionally, I am sure, some of the most important features of this little matter. In 1896 I was sent for, and asked if I would undertake as Commissioner certain very important inquiries in Europe, on the subject of the provision made by English and Continental nations for old-age and accident casualties. I undertook, without emolument, or out-of-pocket expenses, to make the inquiries as completely as any other man ever did, and it was not until I completed my report about two years later that any question of payment arose. I may say, in passing, that there has been no Commission ever appointed on the Continent or in England that reported in less time, and yet I had to go to the other end of the world for nine months of the period. Well, having completed my report, Mr. Reid called me into his room at Parliament House one night, and said to me, "I had no idea that you were going to do such monumental work, and I do not consider that the Colony should be at so great an advantage to the detriment of a single one of its citizens," and he asked my permission to place a sum on the Estimates to recoup me for part of my outlay. Following the practice of every Government for the previous twenty-five or thirty years, a sum of £350 was paid to me on account of out-of-pocket expenses, leaving over the question of honorarium for Parliament to vote on the Estimates. The question of payment was raised, and by a special vote of the Legislative Assembly the members of the Elections and Qualifications Committee—whose report would have been final—were appointed as a Select Committee to inquire into the matter. My seat was challenged very unnaturally. What I regret is that Senator Styles did not catch sight of the report, which is to be found in Hansard, volume 100, and which was entirely in my favour.

Senator STYLES.—I scarcely mentioned the honorable senator's name.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD. — My name was introduced so frequently into the extracts that I feel compelled to briefly state the facts of the case, and leave it at that. I bear no ill-will to the honorable senator for what he said, but one story is good until the other is told. The whole point was, that after the Committee had unanimously decided that there was nothing in my action that called for any kind of intervention, I paid the £350 back into the Treasury—not before, but after. I would not take the money on the terms. To-day I stand in this position—that the New South Wales Parliament has paid £181 5s. for translations of foreign documents, which it has never recouped me for purchasing. It has never paid me for my ink used in writing the report, nor has it recouped me the sums charged against my London banking account for documents which could not be obtained from diplomatic sources. I say nothing of the value of my report, and of the work which I did. That work has been pronounced upon by some of the highest authorities in the world, from the present King of England, downwards. As Prince of Wales, His Majesty took an active part upon the Royal Commission in England which dealt with this subject, and has shown in his regard for the sufferings of his people in connexion with the hospitals of England an example that entitles him to our highest admiration as a humanitarian, entirely apart from his distinguished position as the head of the Empire. But, as a matter of detail, I pay more attention to the communication received from such an authority as the Commissioner on Labour in the United States of America, and from men like Sir Charles Dilke and Henry Broadhurst, in England. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain is, I suppose, recognised as one of those principally concerned in the Old-Age Pensions movement. I might refer to his correspondence. But I will let these things pass. I have made this statement in order to put myself right with the Senate. I merely wish, as these matters affecting me have been mentioned to the Senate, to have it clearly understood that I have not received one penny piece—not even the price of a postage stamp—in connexion with the whole affair; and that New South Wales stands my debtor even for cash paid out of pocket for the very documents which the Parliament of that State voted £181 5s. to have translated. I am not sufficient of a linguist to translate from sixteen European languages. I may also refer to the fact that some of the largest public meetings ever held in Australia, in the Sydney Town Hall, have in the most enthusiastic manner recognised my services in this cause, when I have not been present, as well as when I have been present. There cannot be any possible ground for any imputation of any sort against me in the matter, considering the manner in which, three years ago, my fellow men in New South Wales, and at a later date, last December, my fellow men and women, treated me when I was a candidate for membership of this distinguished Chamber. Merely in order that there may be a brief explanation, as well as to remove the possibility of misunderstanding—not in consequence of anything that Senator Styles said, but on account of the extracts which he read—I have made these personal references. It was painful to me to make them, but I deemed it to be necessary to do so, for those who come after me.

Senator FRASER (Victoria).—I do not often speak, so that I have no apology to offer for rising on this occasion. I should not have spoken, except for the pressure that I feel is upon me to explain some matters that have occurred during the last three and a half years.

Senator GIVENS.—They require some explaining.

Senator FRASER.—Not so far as my own conscience is concerned. That is quite clear. I am responsible to my conscience, not to a caucus. There will be no hauling down of my flag in that respect. I have been challenged with having deserted a former Government. Mr. President, it pained me very much to do so. It has been said that I came into this Senate as a supporter of the Barton Government. I certainly did support, and was willing to support, the first Government of this Commonwealth in many respects. I agreed with the Maitland speech, on the whole, and I was upon the platform to hear the Melbourne Town Hall speech of our first Prime Minister. I listened with pleasure to his statement. I was a supporter of the policy of revenue without destruction. I said then and I say now that it would not be right and proper for the Commonwealth Government to destroy wealth that had been created under State laws, or to take a man's bread and butter away when his means of livelihood had been created under an Act of Parliament. I said that wherever I spoke at the elections, and I spoke in all parts of this State. I am prepared to say the same thing to-day.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator left the impression that he was a protectionist.

Senator FRASER.—I supported native industry wherever I could see that an industry was going to succeed, but I would not support duties for the benefit of an industry for all time where I could see that it would not succeed. I am more inclined to bonuses than to any other method of assisting industries.

Senator O'KEEFE.—The butter bonuses?

Senator FRASER.—What has happened in connexion with the butter bonuses is a revelation to me. Those who are guilty of wrong practices should suffer. No one in this Senate, on either side, is inclined to take the part of a wrong-doer. The wrong-doer should suffer, no matter on what side of politics he may be. But there is not a vote which I gave upon the Tariff which I would alter to-day if I had the opportunity. The first item in the Tariff, as will be remembered, was that relating to ale and porter. Upon that I supported my honorable and learned friend, who is now the leader of the Senate, in reducing the high duty that was proposed, to the level of the duty imposed under the Tariff of the State of Victoria. That duty was high enough. I knew then, and I know now, that had a very high duty been imposed, with a small excise, the big, wealthy breweries of Sydney and Melbourne would have been able to crush out the breweries in the smaller States. When the import duty was excessively high the imports would naturally be diminished, and the great brewing establishments of Melbourne and Sydney—I am proud of them and wish them to succeed, but I do not wish them to succeed by crushing the breweries of Tasmania, or Queensland, or Western Australia—would have been able to import their beer at a cheap rate into the smaller States to the injury of the breweries there. It was purely out of consideration for the smaller States that I was induced to vote for a duty such as had been imposed in Victoria before the establishment of Federation. It did not require much pressure to induce me to do so.

Senator HIGGS.—What caucus supplied the pressure?

Senator FRASER.—The only pressure exercised upon me was the arguments of the present leader of the Senate. No other pressure would have been effective. A caucus would have no effect upon me.

Senator DAWSON.—Was not that after the honorable senator fell out with the Barton Government?

Senator FRASER.—No; but I may as well clear up this matter. I may as well read what I said about another item of the Tariff—the wheat and fodder duties. I invite honorable senators—I do not say I challenge them, because I do not wish to be offensive—to look through the Tariff debates, and challenge me upon any vote which I gave in regard to revenue without destruction. When the duty with regard to wheat and fodder was before the Senate I used these words—

Then what is the use of pretending to bolster up the farmer, and to give him assistance by imposing a duty upon wheat? It is neither more nor less than throwing dust in the eyes of the farmer. We might just as reasonably propose to put a duty upon merino wool. It is only 100 years ago since McArthur imported three rams and six ewes into New South Wales, and now we are exporting millions of pounds of wool. Our wool industry is only one of yesterday in the history of the nation, but it is a huge industry nevertheless. I do not suppose there is any country on the face of the earth that per head of population exports as great a quantity of wool, meat, and wheat as Australia.

Senator HIGGS.—If the duty will be inoperative, why get so excited about it?

Senator Higgs admitted that the duty would be inoperative. He agreed with me, though he did not like to say so. I replied—

It will be inoperative except at a time like the present, and such a time has never before been known in Australia. God knows what the result will yet be.

Since then £600,000 has been paid in duty on wheat and other produce coming into Victoria, New South Wales, and Queensland. Let it be remembered that 60,000,000 sheep out of the 100,000,000 which we once had in Australia have died from the effects of drought.

Senator DAWSON.—And the honorable senator is supporting the Government who refused to lift the duties on fodder.

Senator FRASER.—I am giving the reasons why I thought fit to change my views, and I think they are reasons which should have appealed to any honorable senator. I saw that the price of fodder was going up right and left, and that starving stock were dying wholesale. God knows, they did die wholesale, and that was only to be expected when millions of acres could not feed a sheep. I say that 60,000,000 sheep have died. It must be well known to representatives of Queensland that even within thirty or forty miles of Brisbane settlers suffered enormous losses. Dairy-men and farmers also suffered losses in Queensland. It is this dire loss of stock which is the cause of the present depression.

Senator PEARCE.—I thought it was the Labour Party.

Senator FRASER.—I do not say so. I do not believe it, and therefore I do not say so. It is the drought that is the cause of the depression, and it will continue to operate as the cause until we recuperate.

Senator DAWSON.—The question I desire the honorable senator to answer is, whether he is not now supporting a Government that is precisely the same Government as that which refused to lift the fodder duties?

